'Project Rehab' Aids 4,000 N.Y. Workers

REPORTS ON THE achievements of a five-year labor rehabilitation project highlighted the New York City AFL-CIO's annual community services institute attended by nearly 1,000 persons.

Launched by labor here in April 1963, "Project Rehab" has been financed by grants of $550,000 from the federal Vocational Rehabilitation Administration and $280,000 from the city labor federation.

Project Dir. Gerald R. Waters, Sr., reported that in its five years of existence the program has processed over 4,000 cases involving physical, mental, emotional and social problems that jeopardize workers' employment.

He described a "broadening" of the project over its lifetime in aiding union members and their families, as well as rendering service to retired workers.

Other reports dealt with the work of the project's staff—including physicians, counsellors, nurses, social workers and job developers—and the cooperation of AFL-CIO locals in extending the rehabilitation services to their members.

Federal funding for the program ended on Apr. 30, but the labor movement "is considering ways and means of continuing this vital service to its membership," the city AFL-CIO announced.

Representatives of unions and social, health and welfare agencies who attended the institute participated in panel sessions devoted to the project and a job development program also being carried out by labor here.

At a commencement exercise held in connection with the institute, 275 persons from 70 unions received certificates as graduates of a 9-week course in union counselling conducted by the New York AFL-CIO.

The institute also presented a number of special awards, including one that went posthumously to William K. Kirane of Transport Workers Local 100, who had referred more than 100 cases to the rehabilitation project.

Rhode Island's New Health Plan Praised

THE RHODE ISLAND legislature voted unanimously to charter a comprehensive group health program sponsored by the State AFL-CIO, with both Democratic and Republican leaders joining in praise.

Gov. John H. Chafee (R) signed the bill at a ceremony attended by state labor and health leaders. He termed the proposal "a very exciting plan."

The legislation establishes the Rhode Island Group Health Association as a nonprofit, tax-exempt corporation to provide prepaid health services for its subscribers.

Labor Day of 1969 has been set as the target date for opening of a modern medical center stressing preventive health care. The legislation cuts through cumbersome red tape and permits the program to be directed by an all-consumer board, including representatives of unions and the public.

House Speaker John J. Wrenn (D) termed the legislation "one of the most important acts" ever considered in the state.

The state labor federation said in sponsoring it that union members have not been getting adequate medical care even though health benefits negotiated in collective bargaining have steadily increased.

Hits Liberal Party 'Mismanagement':

Canadian Labor Chief Urges Stepped Up Political Action

By Robert B. Cooney

Toronto—Donald MacDonald, head of the Canadian Labor Congress, opened the CLC's 7th convention by calling on the labor movement to commit itself more fully to political action to meet Canada's economic crisis and solve mounting social problems.

Attacking the governing Liberal party for "mismanagement," MacDonald reminded the 2,000 delegates of the June 25 general election as he declared:

"We are now confronted by a crisis in our economy, a high level of unemployment, a drastic reduction in the gross national product, a threat of wage controls, the failure in real terms to make medicare universally effective, a catastrophic failure to build enough houses and an alarming trend in anti-labor legislation.

"What more justification need there be for a new political mandate by organized labor? And what better time can there be for it?"

While the coming general elections gave a political flavor to much of the convention debate, the delegates also had before them major issues relating to the unity and structure of the Canadian labor movement.

At the midway point in the convention, the delegates were scheduled to debate the vitally important report of the Commission on Constitution & Structure.

This report, the result of a two-year cross-Canada study authorized by the 1966 CLC convention, proposed changes aimed at modernizing the labor movement and making it more efficient and effective. It would encourage mergers, set up a system for handling jurisdictional disputes, put into effect a code of ethical practices, expand the executive council, reaffirm the "unique" role of international unions within the CLC, and strengthen provincial and local labor councils by making affiliation to them mandatory on the part of CLC unions.

Earlier in the convention, a last-minute compromise averted a floor fight in a dispute considered one of the most serious in the 12-year history of the CLC. The Quebec Federation of Labor was set to appeal to the convention a ruling by the CLC executive council that the QFL had lacked authority to enter into a draft agreement on raiding and transfer of members with the independent Confederation of National Trade Unions (CNTU).

An emergency resolution unanimously approved by the delegates authorized the CLC and the QFL "jointly to continue discussions with the CNTU and the CEQ [Quebec Teachers Association] with a view to preventing and regulating inter-union conflicts in the best interests of the workers we represent."

In a policy statement adopted Apr. 9, the CLC executive council pointed out that jurisdictional matters are the prerogative of the CLC. It said a provincial federation cannot assume constitutional authority over or place in jeopardy the jurisdiction, collective bargaining, organizing or any other rights of the affiliate.

Separatist Tendencies

This issue and attempts by Quebec labor to achieve greater autonomy over its own affairs—expressed in a minority dissent to the report on structure—are manfestations in the labor movement of the French separatist tendencies now surfacing in most reas of this predominantly English nation.

In his keynote to the convention, acting Pres. MacDonald reported the CLC membership at an all-time high of more than 1.5 million, with total union membership in Canada at nearly 2 million.

MacDonald welcomed delegates of the 100,000-member Public Service Alliance to their first CLC convention and pointed to them as evidence that labor can attract the expanding white collar and technical groups which now make up a majority of the nation's workforce.

Turning to the state of the economy, MacDonald stressed the direct link between union growth and economic conditions.

Canada is in an economic slowdown, he said, due largely to "government mismanagement."

He said unemployment is the highest in years. The gross national product grew only 2.5 percent in 1967—"a catastrophic drop" from the goal of 5 percent set by the Economic Council, he added.

The government response to higher unemployment and rising prices, MacDonald said, is to consider a wage and price review board implying a freeze on wages.

Organized labor will use its economic strength at the bargaining table to win higher wages, MacDonald pledged, and will continue to seek a national income policy to achieve a more equitable distribution of Canada's wealth.

On medicare, MacDonald charged the federal government has deliberately created obstacles to its implementation.

He urged labor to press provincial governments to meet the federal standard for grants-in-aid and predicted comprehensive medicare for all Canada will soon be achieved.

MacDonald then turned to the general area of social security and delivered a slashing attack on Pierre Trudeau, the new Prime Minister. MacDonald said Trudeau had, while seeking the leadership of the Liberal party, spoken "in favor of selectivity, which is a euphemism for the means test."

MacDonald said Trudeau was quoted as saying "We have had enough of this free stuff."

"What free stuff?" MacDonald asked the delegates. "Free for whom? Was he talking of unemployment insurance? We pay for it in full measure. Was he talking of old age security? We pay for that; more than our fair share. Was he talking of the Canada pension plan? We pay for that, too. We will most assuredly pay for medicare and for every other kind and form of social benefit that has been or ever will be enacted.

"If there is any 'free stuff' around, it comes not to us but to those others who have always received more than their fair share of the benefits of our society."

MacDonald observed that the Liberal party campaign will use the slogan "the just society" in the coming campaign. In an aside, he noted the slogan was first used by labor a dozen years ago and added:

"You cannot at one and the same time accept a market economy, think of social security as 'this free stuff,' reduce medical benefits for Indians in order to save money, and at the same time promise to achieve a 'just society'."

"A just society can be achieved, but not without the will to create it," MacDonald said.

Turning to a problem which is straining the fabric of Canadian society, MacDonald reiterated the CLC's support of the principles of bilingualism and biculturalism. The quest of French Canada for equality in these respects has become an issue in all national institutions, labor included, and its true depth is expected to be measured in June's elections.

Other Actions

In other actions early in the convention, the delegates:

- Adopted a motion from the floor to honor the memory of Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr., by standing in silence for one minute.
- Passed as the first regular order of business a resolution of gratitude to Claude Jodoin, president of the CLC since its founding in 1956, who was incapacitated by a stroke a year ago.
- Called for a $2 an hour minimum wage for men and women across Canada.
- Adopted a policy statement on medicare which called for comprehensive health services under public auspices for all Canadians. Meanwhile, labor would press for medicare in the provinces under the present program which is similar to the Kerr-Mills federal-state program in the U.S.
- Approved a 16-point program to meet the housing crisis. The chief points called for creation of a federal Dept. of Housing & Urban Affairs, massive land assembly programs, subsidized mortgages for low-income families, greater emphasis on multiple units and an expanded effort by labor and cooperative housing groups.
- Nailed down the readmission of the 7,500-member Seafarers Union by defeating a resolution aimed at reversing the CLC executive council's decision to accept the SIU application last January. The readmission was opposed by the 550-member Canadian Maritime Union.

Unions Set Up College Fund In Montana

Kalispell, Mont. — Unions in northwest Montana have established a fund at Flathead Valley Community College here to aid deserving students who may encounter temporary financial difficulties.

The fund was initiated by the Northwest Montana Building & Construction Trades Council after it was proposed by Painters Local 975. Since then unions and their members have made steady contributions to the fund.

Recently, Pres. James N. Wehr of the council and Mrs. Wilma Christopherson of the Flathead County AFL-CIO joined in presenting the first installments in the fund to Dr. Larry J. Blake, president of the college.

An advisory committee, representing unions in the area, is to be selected soon for the purpose of regularly consulting with college officials in administering the fund and its use.

In a letter of appreciation to contributing unions, Dr. Blake commended organized labor "for this further manifestation of interest in the progress of the college."

The college, Montana's newest, was established by a public vote in 1967 with strong support from unions. Several locals also have granted scholarships to the college. Pres. Perry S. Melton of the Montana B&CTC was elected to its board of trustees.

Masters-Mates to Vote On Consolidation Plan

New Orleans—Members of the Masters, Mates & Pilots will vote at the end of May on the principle of consolidating their nationwide local units into four divisions. The balloting will implement unanimous adoption of a consolidation resolution by delegates attending the 88-year-old union's 58th biennial convention here.

If the union's 11,500 ship captains, licensed deck officers and other officer personnel ratify the proposed consolidation in 90 days of secret mail balloting, a constitutional convention will be called to establish the new structure.

Largest of the four divisions would be a single "offshore division" combining the 24 semi-autonomus deep sea locals in all major ports of the East, Gulf and West Coasts, the Great Lakes, Hawaii and Puerto Rico. Some 8,000 of MM&P membership who command or otherwise direct the navigation and cargo operations in over 90 percent of all American flag merchant ships are dispatched to the ships from these 24 port units.

Two other MM&P groups comprising about 3,500 members would also be consolidated, later, into their own respective divi - sions—rivers and harbors marine officer personnel into an "inland division" and pilots into a "pilot division." The fourth division would comprise government employes associated with the maritime industry.

In proposing the consolidation of the offshore locals into a single nationwide division, the union's leaders said the move would be a major step towards uniform national collective bargaining contracts, guaranteed pensions under uniform pension rules administered by a consolidated pension plan, and uniform national shipping procedures, among other objectives.

The convention wound up its affairs with 12 nominations for its three key posts for four-year terms beginning Jan. 1, 1969. Nominees will have until midnight, May 13, to accept the nomination for a specific post.

Incumbent officers are Captains L. W. Sheldon, president; C. M. Crooks, vice president, and T. F. O'Callaghan, secretary-treasurer. Each has been nominated to succeed himself.

The delegates voted to hold the union's next convention outside the continental United States for the first time. It will be held in Panama, starting Apr. 20, 1970, and will honor the MM&P local of about 150 Panama Canal pilots.

Leighty Cites Progress In Rail 'Harmony' Talk

Chicago—Chairman George E. Leighty of the Railway Labor Executives Association, addressing the 14th convention of the AFL-CIO Railway Employes Dept., said he was "greatly encouraged" by two meetings that have taken place between representatives of the carriers and a committee of the RLEA to promote harmony and cooperation in the industry and said a third conference is scheduled later in May.

Leighty said he was hopeful that the talks would lead to a program for expansion in the railroad industry.

He dealt briefly with the gains won in health and welfare benefits in the fully carrier-paid plan that now covers all railroad union employes under one policy. He also called attention to the improvements won in the Railroad Retirement Act.

Leighty thanked the shopcraft unions and their members for their cooperation and aid to the Transportation-Communication Employes in that union's one-day strike against the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad.

Among the resolutions adopted at the closing session of the convention was one calling for the formation through the AFL-CIO of a Transportation Conference. The measure supported the intent and principles of the resolution along these lines passed by the 1967 Maritime Trades Dept. convention.

The delegates referred the proposal to the department executive council for action.

Other speakers at the closing session included Hugh Murphy, administrator of the Dept. of Labor's Bureau of Apprenticeship & Training; A. E. Lyon, labor member, Railroad Retirement Board, and Clarence Mulholland, general counsel for the shopcraft unions.

Headquarters Established by Consumer Unit

The Consumer Federation of America has set up national headquarters in Washington to serve as a unifying force for all consumer organizations in the country.

Elected as full-time executive director of CFA was Erma Angevine, presently women's activities director and consumer specialist for the National Rural Electric Co-ops.

About 150 representatives from 56 affiliated organizations voted for officers, naming the Rev. Robert J. McEwen as CFA president. McEwen is chairman of the Boston College Dept. of Economics and has been the leader of organized consumers in Massachusetts.

Other Officers

AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept. Administrative Dir. Jacob Clayman was elected one of five vice presidents. Others are Jerry Voorhis, president of the Illinois Federation of Consumers; Harold Ostroff, president of the New York City United Housing Foundation; William Hutton, executive director of the National Council of Senior Citizens, and W. Palmer Dearing, executive director of Group Health Association.

Robert L. Smith, assistant director of Consumers Union in Mount Vernon, N.Y., was elected secretary-treasurer.

Father McEwen told the CFA delegates, "we hope to stimulate consumer groups and consumer action in every city and state in this land. We shall make forceful demands for economic change so our economic system can better serve the needs of our people, black and white, rich and poor."

Among the measures endorsed by the first meeting was a call on congressional conferees to break the deadlock in committee on the truth-in-lending bill.

Labor Dept. Calls for Pension Safeguards

The Labor Dept. has asked Congress for legislation to guarantee that workers do not lose earned pension benefits because of default by an employer or the shutdown of a plant.

The draft bill, based in large part on the 1965 recommendations of a Cabinet-level committee, would set up a federal insurance program to guarantee payment of benefits.

It would also write into federal law minimum standards of vesting and funding of benefits.

A worker with at least 10 years of service after the age of 25 would be given permanent right to benefits based on his service. And, after a transition period, assets in a pension plan would have to be sufficient to meet the benefit obligations of the plan.

No distinction is made in the Labor Dept. bill between single-employer plans and broad-based multi-employer pension plans.

The AFL-CIO convention last December stressed the need for such a distinction and Bertrand Seidman, the federation's social security director, termed its absence in the bill a major defect.

Seidman welcomed the proposal to set up a federal insuranc system to safeguard all workers against a default on their earned pension benefits.

But he stressed that funding and vesting standards which may be necessary and desirable for single-employer plans can be both unnecessary and unduly burdensome for multi-employer plans.

"Here," he said, "with many employers participating and guaranteeing payments, the risk of default is negligible."

As the AFL-CIO convention resolution noted, "such plans provide continuing coverage for workers remaining in the plan's jurisdiction regardless of where they work. Moreover, the bankruptcy of one employer in a multi-employer plan does not affect the solvency of the pension trust."

Seidman said the AFL-CIO will urge Congress to amend the Labor Dept. bill to retain "meaningful, effective protection for workers' pension rights, but to differentiate in the legislation between the types of plans to be covered."

The proposed legislation would provide transitional standards to allow plans to meet federal standards by gradual steps. It would also allow the secretary of labor to approve alternative vesting or funding standards "where he finds that these standards result in unreasonable cost or impose unreasonable administrative burdens on a plan or certain types of plans."

In the case of multi-employer plans, involving at least five employers and a substantial portion of workers in the industry either locally or nationally, the secretary of labor would have authority to allow a 15-year vesting standard instead of the 10 years applied to single employer plans.

The proposed legislation would also authorize the Labor Dept. to conduct studies in a number of areas, including the operation of "portable" pensions involving exchange of credits when a worker moves from one employer or industry to another.

Criminal penalties would be assessed for willful violations of the law and fraud.

All plans covered by the law would be required to participate in the insurance program.

Minority Groups Gain In Federal Employment

The number of Negroes and other ethnic minority groups employed by the federal government continued to increase during 1967, the Civil Service Commission reported.

Its survey of minority group employment also showed an increase in percentage of the federal workforce. As of last Nov. 30, 497,000 of the 2.6 million fulltime government workers were Negroes, Spanish Americans, Orientals or American Indians. In numbers, this was an increase of 74,100 since June 1966; in ratio, a rise from 18 to 18.9 percent of the workforce.

Most Negroes and Spanish Americans—a group which includes Mexican Americans and Puerto Ricans—were in the lower pay grades, but both the number and percentage in the higher grades rose significantly.

Throughout the government, Negro employment reached a new high of 391,000 or 14.9 percent. This compares with 320,000 or 13.9 percent in June of 1966 and 309,000, 13.5 percent, in the 1965 survey. Over a 29-month period, total Negro employment in the federal government rose 26.5 percent, while the federal workforce increased only 14.5 percent.

The 1967 survey marked a return to the visual identification system used in Civil Service Commission surveys through 1965. Under this system, supervisors indicate the number and pay grades of the specified minority groups in their units. In 1966, the commission substituted a card questionnaire which employes were asked —but not required—to fill out. About 8 percent of employes did not do so, and the government abandoned the self-identification experiment.

The 1967 survey found 69,000 Spanish Americans employed by government agencies—2.6 percent of total employment and 10 percent of federal employes in Arizona, California, Colorado, New Mexico and Texas.

Leaflet Describes On-the-Job Diseases

"Occupational Disease . . . The Silent Enemy" is the title of a new Public Health Service pamphlet which stresses that the hazards which strike more than 330,000 workers each year are preventable.

It describes some of the industrial threats to health and says that a massive effort by government, industry, workers and research scientists will be necessary to overcome them.

UTW Convention:

Textile Union Votes To Back Humphrey

Miami Beach—Vice Pres. Humphrey's "dedication to the principles of liberalism" won him the support of the United Textile Workers of America at its convention here.

Delegates to the UTW convention passed a resolution pledging the union's "united support to secure the election of Hubert H. Humphrey to the presidency of the United States."

Delegates representing the 51,000-member union at its 17th convention also heard a Dept. of Commerce defense of the government tariff philosophy. This was shortly before they demanded—via another resolution — continued control of cotton textile and apparel imports by "firm enforcement" of the long-term cotton arrangement, and the inclusion within the agreement of woolen synthetic fibers and fabrics and apparel.

UTW would "provide for import quotas by country and category for all segments of the textile and garment industries."

Pres. George Baldanzi presided over the meeting which also passed a series of resolutions that:

- Condemned black power, by deploring discrimination, adding: "There are those who have abandoned the struggle for equality to embrace a regressive and self-defeating racial nationalism. Such acts can serve only to comfort the bigots and segregationists."
- Called for enactment of the truth-in-lending bill and urged union members "to shop as carefully for credit as they would for any other major purchase."
- Backed a program of adequate housing for all, a center to study air pollution, minimum federal standards on unemployment insurance, a $2 minimum wage and a 35-hour week, and an overhaul of workmen's compensation laws.

Stanley Nehmer, deputy assistant to the secretary of commerce for resources, presented the government side of the Geneva Long Term Agreement. He conceded imports of cotton textiles reached a peak of 1.7 billion square yards in the fourth LTA year, but said, "imports declined last year"—the fifth—because of the general decline of the market.

Some of the increases, he said, came from "new starter" countries, but that category of beginning manufacturing has since come under control. Now, when "new starter" trade threatens to disrupt the domestic market, "we are resolved to take action to regulate it," Nehmer stated.

In man-made fibers and blends, imports have grown more than four times in the last five years—from 213-million square yards in 1962 to more than 933-million square yards last year.

Thus, the UTW resolution "reaffirms the union's opposition to excessive imports . . . and we condemn those who under the guise of improving reciprocal trade . . . jeopardize the jobs of tens of thousands of textile workers in the U.S. and Canada."

The resolution "insists on programs based on quota by country and categories."

Jobless Rate in Slums Twice National Average

compared to 5.7 percent—and in the remaining neighborhoods—6.5 percent as compared with 3.1 percent.

"Significantly, the widest gap existed between the jobless rates for adult males—usually family breadwinners—in poverty (5.5 percent) and in the remaining neighborhoods (2.3 percent)," BLS said.

The bureau also reported that teenagers "fared poorly" in poverty neighborhoods where 20 percent of them were unemployed compared with an 11 percent rate in the other urban neighborhoods.

15% in Slums

About 15 percent of the nation's total unemployed workers lived in poverty neighborhoods of large cities, the survey by the Bureau of Labor Statistics disclosed.

"Reflecting the disproportionate concentration of Negroes in these neighborhoods," it added, "about half of the unemployed were nonwhite—237,000 out of 457,000."

BLS Commissioner Arthur M. Ross concluded that although Negroes have made some gains in jobs in recent months it was "a matter of running pretty fast to stand still."

As for the April report, it showed that the number of unemployed persons fell 150,000 more than seasonally from March to 2.5 million, while total payroll employment rose 110,000, seasonally adjusted, to 67.9 million.

Over half the April improvement occurred among teenagers, where the unemployment rate dropped from 13 to 11.9 percent. The rate for adult men was 2.1 percent, down from 2.2 percent. For adult women it remained unchanged at 3.7 percent.

The unemployment rates for both white and non-white workers continued declines begun late last year. But the non-white rate in April of 6.7 percent was still more than double the white rate, 3.1 percent.

The department said that much of the April increase in payroll employment was due to the termination of strikes in the copper mining and glass container industries.

April employment figures, seasonally adjusted, were:

Manufacturing, 19.5 million, up 73,000 from March; transportation and utilities, 4.3 million, down 2,000; wholesale and retail trade, 14 million, down 22,000; finance, 3.3 million, up 13,000; services, 10.4 million, up 13,000; government, 12 million, up 39,000, and construction, 3.4 million, down 22,000.

The department said that hourly earnings for workers on private payrolls averaged $2.79 in April—two cents higher than in March. As a result, their average weekly earnings advanced to $104.63, up 20 cents from March.

Average weekly hours declined in most major industry groups. The department attributed this partly to religious observances and to civil disturbances in several major cities during the survey week.

Ross said the main reflection of the civil disturbances was a statistic showing a reduction of 35,000 jobs in retail trade in April, marking the first time in many months that employment has not increased in that category.

Meany Stresses Urgency of Jobs Plan

Calls on Congress to Move 'Now' On Million Public Service Posts

which followed. GOP members defended their rival tax-incentive plan to encourage business to hire unskilled, hard-core jobless, and Democratic congressmen backed the Meany and O'Hara thesis that the government must become the employer of last resort.

Chairman Carl D. Perkins (D-Ky.) of the full Education & Labor Committee joined the subcommittee session at the start of the hearings to welcome Meany and pledge "to do all in my power to assist in getting such outstanding legislation through Congress."

Meany dealt scornfully with opponents who claim that "America can't afford it" or that "It will cost too much."

Such people, he declared, "never discuss how costly it is to do nothing. They are the ones who fail to realize that a jobless man is a liability to this nation while an employed man is an asset."

He expressed conviction that a nation that is producing more than $800 billion a year in goods and services "can do every single thing that is necessary to solve the problems of America."

Meany read to the subcommittee a statement issued by the AFL-CIO Executive Council in 1964, after passage of the first Civil Rights Act.

It stressed that "for equal rights and equal opportunity to be meaningful, there must be full opportunity as well" and that "the right to be hired is empty indeed when there are no jobs to be had."

He told the committee members, "That was the simple truth then; it is the simple truth now, nearly four years later."

He expressed "complete and utter confidence in the ability of our democratic process to solve all our problems, including the problem of unemployment." Otherwise, he said, "I wouldn't be here today."

But, Meany emphasized, "the time has long since passed when Congress can afford just to study, debate, discuss, deplore — and do nothing."

The most realistic solution to poverty "is the opportunity for a regular job at decent wages," he said.

Unemployment in the United States is "far more serious than it looks on the surface," Meany declared, both because of undercounts in the census and because "it is concentrated—with dire social implications—in the slum districts of our urban centers and in depressed rural areas."

The people who need the stepping-stone of a government-provided job have little, if any, education, training or regular work experience, Meany pointed out. Many are rural migrants from the South, or the children of such migrants, who are "ill-equipped to compete in the regular labor market."

With regular employment, on-the-job guidance and training, they can gain basic skills and move up "to better-paying and more-skilled jobs in public and private employment," he said.

Meany quoted Urban Coalition Chairman John W. Gardner, the former secretary of health, education and welfare, as reporting that surveys show "at least 141,000 persons could be employed almost overnight" in 130 major cities, and that 500,000 could be put to work in needed jobs within 6 months. Within a year, the million-job mark could be reached.

In a supplementary statement, Meany criticized a bill sponsored by a number of Republican congressmen aimed at creating 220,000 jobs in the private sector through tax incentives and 80,000 in the public sector as inadequate to meet the needs.

He welcomed the concern shown by the GOP congressmen but cautioned that the tax credit program could end up as a "windfall" to employers for hiring workers to meet normal needs.

Even at best, he said, the number of new jobs created "would hardly make a dent in the problem."

The hard-core unemployed need jobs now, Meany declared.

"Public institutions, in both urban and rural areas, "have an urgent need for the services that these people can perform."

Therefore, Meany urged, "let us put these two needs together constructively—and get this program on the road, now."

Biemiller Sees Chaos If Foreign Aid Is Halted

The AFL-CIO urged Congress to support Pres. Johnson's foreign aid request and warned that abandonment of American aid would lead to "chaos" in many of the developing nations.

Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller said both the moral obligations falling on the world's richest nation and the self-interest of the United States call for continued help to nations in Latin America, Africa, Asia, and the Middle East.

The conditions which produce disorder at home are present in vastly greater proportions in the poor nations of the world, Biemiller noted in a statement to the House Foreign Affairs Committee.

"Recently we have seen in this country the results of generations of impoverishment, lack of adequate schooling, of jobs, poor housing, and an incomplete participation in the political process," he said.

"The disorder and unrest evident in the United States arise from only a small portion of the population. But imagine if you will, the potential for violence and chaos in the majority of the developing countries where 80 percent to 90 percent of the people are burdened with these same conditions . . ."

Biemiller acknowledged that many Americans are "disheartened" because progress "is a slow and arduous process." But in view of the alternatives, he said, "the AFL-CIO believes that the American people can and will meet this challenge."

He stressed the importance of the development and use of democratic institutions in the assistance program, including trade unions. "Too often," he said, the "trickle down" effect of aid programs serves to widen the gap between rich and poor in the countries being helped.

Biemiller reported on the programs of the American Institute for Free Labor Development, the African-American Labor Center and the newly-formed Asian-American Free Labor Institute. With help from U.S. assistance funds, he said, they have sponsored programs which have brought visible, direct assistance to local self-help projects.

The foreign assistance program, the AFL-CIO statement emphasized, "has been an indispensable part of America's foreign policy for preserving world peace, promoting freedom and fostering economic programs based on social justice. Any reduction of this program below its present modest level would seriously handicap this country's pursuit of vital foreign policy objectives."

Revised Handbook On Medicare Issued

The Social Security Administration has started mailing copies of a revised booklet, Your Medicare Handbook, to the homes of 19.6 million elderly Americans. The new edition includes changes made by the 1967 social security amendments and is easier to read, Social Security Commissioner Robert M. Ball said.

One change is a provision for a "lifetime reserve" of 60 additional days of hospitalization for those who have used more than the 90 days previously provided in each benefit period. Another section tells how the law makes it easier to claim medicare benefits for doctor bills.

Rustin Calls for Action On Basic Negro Needs

New York—The recent death of Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr. may further "polarize" the Negro community unless Congress enacts the programs of jobs and housing he advocated, Dir. Bayard Rustin of the A. Philip Randolph Institute warned here.

Rustin spoke to more than 600 persons at a luncheon during the 63rd annual conference of the League for Industrial Democracy.

The employment, housing and other progressive measures urged by Dr. King were directed toward helping both "the black and white poor"—just as his life was dedicated to helping both races, Rustin said.

At the time of the assassination, he said, Dr. King was pointing his efforts in a new direction—"toward uplifting the black and white poor through trade union organization."

He suggested that Dr. King's activity on behalf of striking garbage workers in Memphis, Tenn., "were even more significant than his leadership of the Birmingham and Selma struggles against segregation."

The victory of strikers in Memphis for union recognition will be repeated throughout the South "and this will become the greatest memorial to Dr. King," Rustin predicted.

A highlight of the luncheon was the presentation of the league's annual award to Ralph Nader, auto-safety critic, for championing consumer rights "and his reforming zeal in the muckraking tradition of Upton Sinclair, a league founder."

Pres. Paul Jennings of the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers, a member of the league's board of directors, presented the award to Nader.

"He has placed the blame for defrauding the consumer squarely where it belongs at the door of the legitimate businesses which place profit above public interest," Jennings said.

Accepting the award, Nader urged labor, religious groups and other voluntary organizations to mount new pressures against corporations "to make them responsive to consumer interests."

The league, a national organization of trade unionists, civil rights leaders and writers, also presented special awards to Albert Shanker, president of Teachers Local 2, and Adolph Held, retiring president of the Jewish Labor Committee.

League chairman Michael Harrington opened the conference by stressing the organization's determination to assist in solving problems of race and poverty.

"We must change the nation's priorities," he said, "to insure that the underprivileged rather than the overprivileged become the prime beneficiaries" of the nation's economy.

State, County Union Wins Campus Pact

Ann Arbor, Mich.—The State, County & Municipal Employes won bargaining rights for more than 2,600 service and maintenance employes at the University of Michigan by a four-to-one margin.

The vote for the union in an election conducted by the Michigan Labor Mediation Board was 1,451 to 324.

The union now holds collective bargaining rights at all 11 state-supported colleges and universities in Michigan, AFSCME Council 7 Dir. Robert C. Grosvenor reported.

Jewish Labor Body Elects Zimmerman

New York—Charles S. Zimmerman, a vice president of the Ladies' Garment Workers and member of the AFL-CIO Civil Rights Committee, has been elected president of the Jewish Labor Committee.

The JLC, which has union affiliates representing more than 500,000 workers, serves as a link between the nation's Jewish community and labor in fighting all forms of totalitarianism and bigotry.

Zimmerman, who has been serving as chairman of JLC's National Trade Union Council, was elected by the organization's national executive committee to succeed Adolph Held, who recently retired as general manager of the Jewish Daily Forward.

The executive committee also elected Isaiah Minkoff, executive vice president of the National Community Relations Advisory Council, as JLC's treasurer.

He succeeds David Dubinsky, honorary president of the ILGWU, who retired from the post. Dubinsky was one of the founders of JLC and served as treasurer from its inception.

House-Senate Conference:

Meat-Ax Budget Cut Tied to Tax Increase

ury Sec. Henry H. Fowler stalked out of the conference committee with a terse, "no comment." Budget Dir. Charles J. Zwick said a cut of that magnitude would hit heavily at aid to education, pollution control, help to the cities, school lunch programs, child welfare and other programs launched with such hope and fanfare in recent years.

As the AFL-CIO News went to press, the Administration had not yet indicated whether it would mount a floor fight to overturn the conference report and substitute a smaller budget cut.

Part of the budget cut, the conferees directed, would be achieved by leaving one out of four vacancies which occur in government employment unfilled until total employment is reduced by 240,000.

The bill would also cut by $10 billion the amount of new obligation and loan authority given government agencies—money which is committed but not actually spent during the fiscal year. And it directs the President to report to Congress next January plans to rescind $8 billion in funds previously authorized by Congress.

Other Features

In other features of the conference bill:

- A Senate provision ending the tax-exempt status of industrial bonds was limited to bond issues amounting to more than $1 million. While this closes a tax loophole for a number of big corporations, it does nothing to stop the tax inducements to small plants—a category which includes most "runaway" shops seeking low wages, low taxes and a non-union workforce.
- The scheduled freeze in the number of children who could be helped under the aid to families with dependent children program was postponed a year—until June 30, 1969.
- The 10 percent tax surcharge on individual incomes was made retroactive to Apr. 1, 1968; the surcharge on corporations to Jan. 1, 1968.

In effect, this means that individuals will add 7.5 percent to their tax bill for this calendar year. As an example, if the regular tax on a person's earnings comes to $500, he will pay an additional $37.50. The tax was made temporary—expiring June 30, 1969. So, if it is not extended, the actual surcharge on 1969 taxes would be 5 percent.

In an apparent contradiction, on the same day that the conference committee reached agreement on the heavy budget slash, the House beat back with surprising ease Republican attempts to slash funds for model cities grants and rent supplements.

Both programs have been major targets of the conservative coalition and were heavily cut back last year. In fact, the House on one occasion voted to kill the rent supplement program completely.

This year, the House Appropriations Committee sent to the floor a money bill providing substantial increases over the current level of spending, although less than the President had asked.

Its figure for model cities grants and additional urban renewal money earmarked for model cities programs added up to $500 million, as compared with $312 million appropriated last year. And more urban renewal funds may be voted later in the year after the housing bill moves through Congress. It contains authorization for an additional $350 million.

The House money bill also contained $25 million for the rent supplement program, more than double the $10 million grudgingly approved last year, although again under the Administration request.

In quick order, Republican motions to slash the amounts were defeated. The House shouted down on voice vote a move to drop the model cities money to the current level. It beat by a nearly 2-1 margin on a non-record vote a proposal to cut the rent supplement money down to $10 million. And, on the only rollcall vote, it rejected by 216-173 a Republican motion to cut an overall $372 million from the $13.7 billion omnibus spending bill which covered appropriations for a number of agencies and programs.

The Senate, meanwhile, was approaching a key vote stage on a controversial crime control bill it has been debating for more than a week.

There was general agreement on the action part of the bill—an Administration proposal to make federal grants to cities and states to improve local law enforcement.

And a very limited restriction on mail order sale of handguns was considered at least a small step in the direction of gun control legislation the President has sought.

But the Senate Judiciary Committee had added to the bill provisions that are vigorously opposed by civil liberties groups, the AFL-CIO and the Justice Dept.

These include authorization for widespread wiretapping and electronic eavesdropping by federal, state and local law enforcement officers, nullification of key Supreme Court decisions which affirmed constitutional rights of defendants in criminal cases, and a vague bar on any requirement for police forces to achieve racial balance.

CONFIDENCE IN South Viet Nam's ability to survive as a free nation was voiced by Dr. Phan Quang Dan in a speech to the National Press Club. The leader of his nation's Free Democratic Party is in the United States at the invitation of AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany and the Asian-American Free Labor Institute. At the Press Club welcome are, from left: Ambassador Henry Cabot Lodge, Meany, Dr. Dan, and Press Club Pres. Allan W. Cromley.

Communist Terrorism Backfires, Viet Nam Political Leader Says

and is a veteran in the fight against both French colonialism and communism. He was once jailed for three years for his efforts on behalf of democracy.

Dr. Dan told his audience—which included representatives of labor and government—that he accepted Meany's invitation "because I thought the American people, deeply involved in Viet Nam, might be interested in listening to a Vietnamese voice."

He described the situation in South Viet Nam on the eve of the Paris peace talks and he analyzed conditions as they exist in other nations in Asia.

Contrary to reports circulated in many newspaper stories, the South Vietnamese army and police were not infiltrated during the Tet offensive, Dr. Dan said. "There was not a single unit surrendering or going over to the enemy."

Residents of Saigon and other cities struck by the offensive "manifested strong anti-Communist feelings," he pointed out, adding:

"There was no popular uprising, no street demonstrations to welcome the Communist invaders, no red flags waved in sympathy with the National Liberation Front."

Instead, he continued, the offensive stirred up among the people a "growing feeling of disgust and revolt against Communist atrocities and the treacherous Communist violation of the Tet"—a religious holiday in Viet Nam.

South Viet Nam's constitutional government "remained stable," Dr. Dan said, "and there was widespread realization that national unity should be crystallized around it."

By all measurements, he concluded, the Tet offensive amounted to "a military victory for our side and the worst defeat the Communists have so far suffered."

Dr. Dan contrasted the situation in Viet Nam with what it was 14 years ago when the French colonial control collapsed with the fall of Dienbienphu.

Then, he noted the Communists "sailed on the rising tide of nationalism;" whereas today Vietnamese are angered by their "violence, cruelty, indiscriminate terrorism and wholesale murders."

While in 1954 "there was nothing but destruction," Dr. Dan said, South Viet Nam today is the scene of constructive work being carried on "quietly, but steadily and efficiently" by both the United States and South Vietnamese governments.

On the other side of the picture, he conceded that the South Vietnamese government "still lacks a sufficiently popular base," the country does not yet have strong political parties and its leaders "still make mistakes."

"Corruption remains a most serious problem to be tackled," he said, "and social reforms, especially land reforms, have not yet been carried out vigorously."

Dr. Dan praised the AFL-CIO as "the first organized group to support the fight for freedom" and lauded U.S. labor, particularly the Longshoremen, for help in modernizing Saigon's harbor.

He singled out the Vietnamese Confederation of Labor by saying, "South Viet Nam can be proud of its trade union movement, one of the best organized in Southeast Asia."

As for Asia, Dr. Dan said the whole context of that continent has changed since 1954 "in favor of the free world." He described Red China as rapidly slipping in influence and Japan as the "emerging" power, industrially and politically.

Taiwan, South Korea, the Philippines, Thailand, Malaya, and Singapore "are stable and strongly anti-Communist," he said, while India and Burma "are closer to the free world than to Red China."

"There is no room for complacency and over-optimism, but there are plenty of good reasons for confidence in the future of Viet Nam and Southeast Asia," Dr. Dan declared.

In answers to questions ranging over all facets of the Viet Nam issue, Dr. Dan told the Press Club:

- The peace talks coming up are "tremendously" important but everyone should understand that they "will be tortuous." If they break down, the door to peace "should still be left open for Hanoi."
- He does not oppose talks in which the National Liberation Front participates but he does oppose NLF having any role in a coalition government as long as it resorts to "wholesale murders."
- There was "no justification" for the recent arrest of three labor leaders, since released from jail. He said that such arrests should stop "and I hope they will stop very soon." He blamed them on a "young, inexperienced government."
- Red China is in "deep trouble;" its government is imbued with "insane" views and there is a possibility that it may fall in the not too distant future.
- America should be able to reduce its forces in South Viet Nam by one-half "within two or three years," but the presence of some U.S. military strength will probably be needed for many years, even if peace comes.

Earlier, Dr. Dan told a group of labor editors in New York that the people of South Viet Nam "deeply want peace" and fervently hope that when it comes "it will be a real, enduring, honorable peace with freedom."

He predicted that when peace does come "it will be the South Vietnamese who will help build the labor movement because they are the only ones who now have a genuine, democratic trade union movement."

Dr. Dan also addressed delegates attending the 14th convention of the Building Service Employes in Washington. He has been in the United States for several weeks and will visit other areas of the nation.

NMU Signs Up Canadian Affiliate

The Canadian Maritime Union, with 650 members employed on Canadian Great Lakes and deep sea vessels, has joined with the National Maritime Union as an autonomous affiliate, the two organizations announced.

NMU Pres. Joseph Curran said the affiliation will strengthen the union's organizing efforts and its ability to protect "the advanced labor standards" of the two nations "against cut-rate foreign-flag competition."

Labor Group for Humphrey Formed

Nationwide Campaign Launched

By John M. Barry

Formation of the National Labor Committee for Humphrey, made up of more than 150 trade union leaders from all sections of the country, was announced at a press conference, May 17, by Steelworkers Pres. I. W. Abel and Sec. Joseph D. Keenan of the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers.

Abel is chairman of the new group and Keenan is secretary-treasurer.

"Our objective," their joint announcement said, "is to assist Vice President Hubert H. Humphrey secure the nomination of his party for President of the United States; our further objective is the election of Hubert H. Humphrey as President of the United States next November."

Abel and Keenan stressed that members of the committee were taking part as individuals and not as representatives of their organizations. The founding members (listed on Page 5) make up a broad cross section of the American labor movement and include key officials of the AFL-CIO, national and international unions, trade and industrial departments and state and city central labor bodies.

Both AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany and Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler are among the founding members.

The announcement by Abel and Keenan expressed the belief, "shared by the overwhelming majority of our brother and sister trade unionists," that Humphrey's nomination and election are "vital to the unity of our country and to the welfare of the entire nation."

The statement cited Humphrey's "sympathy and keen understanding" of the problems of workers.

"We have known him," it said, "as an imaginative and creative statesman with an extraordinary capacity for anticipating problems and formulating sound and workable programs for their solutions."

Abel and Keenan listed the Vice President's accomplishments in the fields of civil rights, medicare, peace, the rights of organized labor, education, youth and economic progress.

Calling Humphrey "the man to trust for our times," they concluded:

"Every individual in our coun-

Strong Credit 'Truth' Bill Nears Vote

By David L. Perlman

A strong truth-in-lending bill—a major labor goal for the past eight years — emerged from a House-Senate conference committee and moved towards final passage.

Its key provisions were closer to a House-passed bill, which the AFL-CIO Executive Council had termed "obviously superior," than to a loophole-ridden Senate version.

The Executive Council statement strongly backing the House bill was issued the day before conferees broke a months-long deadlock to give what Pres. Johnson termed "a great victory for the American consumer."

Rep. Leonor K. Sullivan (D-Mo.), who early this year led a successful

Council Calls Action Same as Withdrawal

By Saul Miller

The AFL-CIO Executive Council, terming the decision of the Auto Workers to default on its per capita payments to the AFL-CIO "an act tantamount to withdrawal," called for the suspension of the union under the automatic provisions of the AFL-CIO Constitution.

In a unanimously adopted resolution the council voiced its regret at the UAW's action, asserting that the attempt to "coerce the decisions of a representative body of American trade unions is unworthy of the avowed standards of the UAW." (Text, Page 6.)

The council stressed that it had no choice under the federation's constitution but to suspend the UAW for non-payment of per capita, pointing out that there are no provisions for an "escrow account."

The recent UAW convention adopted a resolution declaring that it would not pay per capita to the AFL-CIO unless the federation would call a special convention to discuss changes in programs and policies and that the per capita funds would be set aside in a special escrow account until December 1968 unless a special convention were called.

The council held a special meeting in March to consider a UAW request for a special convention and unanimously adopted a resolution declaring it would call such a session if the UAW would abide by the decisions reached. The Auto Workers refused to make this commitment.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, announcing the council's decision at a press conference during the two-day spring meeting in Washington, termed the resolution adopted by the UAW convention "another ultimatum" to the AFL-CIO. He said he regretted the suspension action "very much," adding:

"I can say to you (reporters) that I know of no action that we took to try to bring it on. This has been a one-sided barrage now since May 1966."

The UAW, the Industrial Union Dept. and all AFL-CIO state and local bodies were officially notified on May 16 by Meany that the Auto Workers had been "automatically suspended from membership in the AFL-CIO, effective May 15, 1968, for non-payment of per capita tax for the months of February, March and April 1968."

Citing the pertinent provisions of the federation's constitution, the letter said that effective May 15 the UAW "shall no longer, while it remains suspended, be allowed representation or recognition in any AFL-CIO trade or industrial department or state or local central body."

'Unalterably Opposed':

Slash of $6 Billion Held Path to 'Chaos'

The AFL-CIO is "unalterably opposed" to a "meat-ax approach" to cutting the federal budget and will urge Congress to reject a House-Senate conference committee proposal to add a $6 billion spending slash to the Administration's tax increase bill.

The federation's Executive Council warned that heavy, "indiscriminate" budget cuts "can only lead to chaos."

Some budget expenditures can be postponed or trimmed, "but essential programs must be maintained and expanded," the council said.

"America's urban crisis, its housing shortage, its educational needs, its pockets of poverty-stricken citizens and shortages of health-care and anti-pollution facilities require expanded action, not slashing cutbacks.

"If Congress rises to its responsibilities," the AFL-CIO declared, "it will increase—not cut—appropriations for such efforts."

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany told newsmen that it might be possible to cut $2.5 billion to $3 billion by postponing some spending in the military budget.

But "the things that help people," Meany said, "should not be postponed."

He said the AFL-CIO "will do everything we can" to urge Congress not to accept the conference committee's budget slash formula.

The Executive Council reiterated labor's support for "a fair and equitable temporary tax increase" and said "continuing efforts should be made to eliminate the types of wasteful expenditures that develop in all large enterprises, both private and government."

But, the council members stressed, "we are appalled by the recent action of the House-Senate conferees in slashing the budget without regard to the merit, need

Workers in Eastern Europe Hailed In Struggle to Gain New Freedom

The democratic forces behind the Iron Curtain "deserve our full sympathy and support," the AFL-CIO Executive Council declared, "especially the embattled workers of Czechoslovakia."

The council adopted a statement reviewing the struggle for freedom in Eastern Europe and called on the Intl. Confederation of Free Trade Unions to "lose no time in developing a program of active support" for the workers in these countries. (Excerpts, Page 7.)

"American labor hails" the valiant efforts of the people in the Iron Curtain countries "to re-establish truly representative trade unions and assures them of our warmest solidarity," the council declared.

It called on the U.S. government to protest the "anti-Semitic course pursued by the Polish regime" and if it is not ended to terminate the favored nation trade treaty between the two countries.

The council urged the government also to initiate a move in the UN Human Rights Commission to investigate the "promotion of anti-Semitism in Poland and recommend appropriate action" for ending this violation of the UN Charter.

The statement called on all friends of democracy and academic freedom in the United States to initiate "through public appeals, newspaper advertisements and resolutions a worldwide protest by their counterparts abroad against this scourge of government-instigated anti-Semitism in the universities and among the people of Poland."

Reviewing the recent developments in East Europe—especially

THE SITUATION IN VIET NAM is analyzed for the AFL-CIO Executive Council by Dr. Phan Quang Dan, leader of the Free Democratic Party in South Viet Nam, a guest in the United States of the Asian-American Free Labor Institute.

National Boycott Asked Of California Grapes

The AFL-CIO Executive Council called on every affiliated union and every officer and union member to join actively in the national boycott against struck California grape growers.

The council, rallying full labor support for the "newest and neediest" member of the family of organized workers—the United Farm Workers Organizing Committee—reported that the organizational strike against grape growers in the San Joaquin Valley of California is now in its 33rd month.

UFWOC has gained recognition, collective bargaining rights and a standard union contract in 12 situations, the council said in a report on the strike against the Giumarra Co., and allied growers.

"This substantial progress in union organization and structure has occurred for the first time in history," the statement related. "That it has occurred in an atmosphere devoid of legal organizational rights and protection afforded nearly all other workers and amidst hostile elements, both in the public and private communities, makes the progress even more dramatic."

For over 9 months, virtually all UFWOC organizing efforts have been directed against Giumarra at Edison, Calif., near Bakersfield. The statement continued:

"The company has mounted the most massive union-resisting campaign yet encountered in farm organizing. It is currently facing government action for using Mexican green card holders illegally as strikebreakers."

There are good reasons to believe, the council said, that the agricultural industry is "now tightly united behind Giumarra, even to the extent of certain economic guarantees against losses incurred by continuing to hold the line against unionism."

In the boycott against Giumarra, table grapes were found being packed and shipped by Giumarra under competitors' labels as a means of frustrating the union boycott. The council said:

"As a result of such company tactics and industry collusion, the boycott against Giumarra grapes was developed into a boycott against all struck California grapes with the exception of DiGiorgio Co. products.

"The response of AFL-CIO unions . . . has been energetic and helpful. Wherever the Farm Workers have sought help, the warm and friendly hand of AFL-CIO affiliates has been available."

But in light of Giumarra's "determination to break the strike and deal the union a death blow, and in light of the California grape industry's announced support" of Giumarra's union-busting campaign, the "selective boycotting of the past is not enough," the AFL-CIO leaders said in calling for widening the Don't Buy campaign to include every union member and his family.

Aid Pledged To 4 Unions At Campbell

Four AFL-CIO unions will have the complete support of the federation's Executive Council in their efforts to win an equitable agreement from the Campbell Soup Co., a council statement pledged.

In the event the unions are forced to strike, the council said "we will support a consumer Do Not Buy campaign against Campbell products" with the following brand names:

Campbell soups and foods, Bounty, Franco-American, Pepperidge Farm, Swanson Frozen Foods and V-8 products.

Contracts Thwarted

Council members received reports from the unions on their so-far unsuccessful efforts to "achieve fair and reasonable new agreements through collective bargaining."

Despite the "patient negotiating efforts of the unions," management of the big food-processing company, with plants in every part of the country producing a wide variety of food products, "has firmly refused to raise wage standards to equitable levels or to agree to varied improvements" in working conditions.

Deploring the absence of the spirit of real collective bargaining on the part of Campbell management, the council said:

"Instead of collective bargaining, Campbell has attempted to use the obsolete and wholly unacceptable tactics of 'Boulwarism.' The company has made take-it-or-leave-it proposals admittedly based on management's unilateral view of what it believes is 'justified' for its employes."

The council assured the four unions—the Packinghouse Workers, Meat Cutters, Machinists and Retail, Wholesale & Dept. Store employes—they will get the full backing of AFL-CIO unions in their struggle.

Czech Workers Hailed In New Freedom Battle

Czechoslovakia and Poland, the council said it demonstrates the yearning for freedom and "hatred of Communist totalitarianism."

In Poland the revolt of students and intellectuals was "ruthlessly suppressed by the Gomulka regime," the council noted, but in Czechoslovakia the movement spread to other sections of the population, especially the workers.

The people in Czechoslovakia are not satisfied, the statement declared, with a "mere change of the Communist guard" but are seeking greater political and economic freedom.

The recent events in both countries, the council stressed, "provides a scorching refutation of the notion that there has been a genuine stabilized liberalization behind the Iron Curtain and that the people have become reconciled to the Communist regime and devoted to its 'socialist' system."

The council termed the rejection by Czech workers of their "so-called trade unions and officials" an "unequivocal disavowal" of the policies of those ICFTU affiliates which have engaged in visits "with Communist labor fronts."

It continued:

"The Executive Council of the AFL-CIO therefore calls upon the Executive Board of the ICFTU to reaffirm once more its policy opposing such exchanges—a policy which has been repeatedly reaffirmed."

The Czech press, the statement noted, has lately revealed the full extent of the "bankruptcy" of the economy including the low standard of living, poor working conditions, lack of democracy, show trials, torture of political prisoners and "the sinister role of the Soviet secret police and high Soviet personalities in the murder of political opponents."

These revelations, the council added "are much graver and more damaging to the Communist regime than anything that has ever been published in the free world press."

W. P. Kennedy Dies, Headed Trainmen

Minneapolis—William P. Kennedy, a former Railroad Trainmen president and a leader in the union for nearly 50 years, died here at 76. He headed BRT from 1949 until his retirement in 1962.

Prior to being elected president, he served in a variety of union posts going back to 1913—lodge president, head of the union grievance committee, international vice president and international secretary-treasurer.

Born in Canada, Kennedy went to work for the Great Northern Railway in the United States in 1909 as freight brakeman when he was 17. He worked as a brakeman and switchman for 16 years before devoting himself fulltime to BRT.

'Runaway Escalation':

7-Point Plan Urged To Curb Health Cost

Americans will soon be paying $100-a-day for hospital care unless steps are taken to halt the "uncontrolled runaway escalation of medical costs," the AFL-CIO warned.

An Executive Council statement termed national health insurance the "one ultimate answer to this problem." But it said immediate steps can be taken to hold costs down.

Prepaid group practice health care, greater hospital efficiency, use of lower-priced drugs and negotiation of physician fees in government-supported medical programs were all urged as part of a 7-point program in the council statement. (Excerpts, Page 7.)

The statement also suggested consideration of a plan for paying doctors to keep people well—regular fees which would cover the entire spectrum of health care through a single payment.

"Under such a system of payment," the council said, "physicians would have an incentive to practice preventive medicine and thus keep patients well and out of the hospital."

The Executive Council noted that doctor fees have been raised some 15 percent in the first two years of the medicare program and physicians' net income has gone up even more.

And "unions all too often have found that as soon as they negotiate for medical care, most doctors and other providers raise their fees and charges," the statement added.

"The AFL-CIO does not believe that Congress established the medicare and medicaid programs or that unions have sacrificed to win health protection for their members to enrich physicians and other providers of medical care," the council said.

It is not wage increases for low-paid hospital workers—still too low—which has escalated costs, the AFL-CIO noted. The statement put the responsibility on the inefficiency of hospital service and the lack of control over decisions of physicians on the type of treatment and length of stay.

The council suggested that hospitals be reimbursed under government programs on the basis of average costs, "thereby rewarding the efficient and penalizing the inefficient," or on the basis of a negotiated rate per patient.

Changes Urged

It said medical personnel should be utilized more efficiently, and that a single system of financing be established for both hospital and doctor fees, with "no additional out-of-pocket payment from beneficiaries."

The "best available means of obtaining better medical care at less cost," the council said. "is by the rapid spread of comprehensive group practice prepayment plans." The 3.5 million persons now covered by such plans have received "health services of high quality at substantial savings" over traditional fee-for-service practice, it asserted.

The council urged authority for the Food & Drug Administration to evaluate the relative effectiveness of drugs and make this information available so that physicians and hospitals can in many cases use lower-priced generic-name drugs for more expensive brand products.

Utility Controls Crumble Under Reagan Regime

Chicago—California is witnessing the collapse of utility regulation under Gov. Ronald Reagan's "business-oriented administration," a member of the state's public utilities commission charged in an address here.

William M. Bennett, a holdover member of the commission now dominated by Reagan appointees, spoke to a transportation seminar at the University of Chicago sponsored by the Railroad Trainmen.

"We are confronted with a governor," Bennett declared, "who sees nothing wrong in naming to his commission candidates approved by the industry that is supposed to be regulated."

As a result, he reported, a commission which previously refused to let the Southern Pacific Co. discontinue its Lark passenger train "was quick to permit the abandonment" once it became a "pro-utility" commission.

The railroads should understand, Bennett continued, that such neglect of the public trust will in the end reap for them "a whirlwind of public wrath and strict economic control."

The best case for public ownership of railroads "is coming from the failure of too many of America's railroad managers to meet the need of America for surface transportation," Bennett added.

Another seminar speaker, Philadelphia Mayor James H. J. Tate, called for more channels of communication between railroad management and labor, and placed major blame for the lack of them on carriers.

Tate said railroads "have too often been delinquent" in informing union leaders in advance about planned changes in operations and projects so that they in turn "can inform union members."

The three-day seminar, attended by representatives of labor, management, government and education, received numerous papers stressing the need for coordination among all forms of transport in meeting a transportation "explosion" that looms ahead.

Steel Union Wins Election In Mississippi

Jackson, Miss.—The Mississippi cooperative organizing program of AFL-CIO unions scored another success when the Steelworkers won bargaining rights at the Kosciusko, Miss., plant of Superior Coach Co.

The vote in a National Labor Relations Board election was 243 for USWA, 200 against, with one ballot voided for error and 20 ballots challenged—a clear majority for the AFL-CIO union.

Assistant AFL-CIO Regional Dir. Robert Starnes said several previous elections at the plant, whose main office is in Lima, O., were unsuccessful. This time the cooperative efforts of 15 unions and the AFL-CIO staff won the day.

Affiliated unions have won some 29 elections out of 44 since the cooperative program began in January 1967.

UAW Suspended for Per Capita Default

Regret Expressed Over Union's Decision

The council's spring meeting spoke out on a number of other matters, voicing its strong opposition to meat-ax budget cutting by Congress, calling for passage of the "truth-in-lending" bill, proposing a program for reducing soaring medical costs, and urging government action to stop runaway firms from exploiting poorly paid Mexican workers along the border.

It strongly affirmed its support for the workers in Eastern European countries in their struggle for freedom and democracy—especially in Czechoslovakia—and urged U.S. government action against the Polish government's renewed campaign of anti-Semitism.

It voiced its support also for the grape workers' strike against Giumarra and the boycott of growers against whom there are strikes and pledged its backing to unions currently in negotiations with the Campbell Soup Co.

Action Mandatory

The council's action on the UAW was taken under mandatory provisions of the AFL-CIO Constitution calling for automatic suspension if an affiliate is in arrears on per capita payments for three months. The UAW last paid per capita to the AFL-CIO for the month of January 1968 on Feb. 15, 1968. They were in arrears for February, March and April on May 15, the effective date of the suspension.

The council resolution, adopted on May 13, declared that if payment was not made by May 15 the provisions of the constitution would apply. There has been no response from the UAW or payment of per capita.

The council noted that "the president of the UAW is familiar with the terms of the AFL-CIO Constitution," that he participated in its drafting and approved its contents. He must know, the council continued, that "the constitution does not permit an organization to continue its participation in the subordinate bodies of the federation after it ceases to enjoy that right in the federation itself."

This means, Meany told reporters, that the UAW cannot participate in the activities of AFL-CIO constitutional departments such as the Industrial Union Dept. of which UAW Pres. Walter P. Reuther is president, or in state and local bodies of the AFL-CIO.

IUD Executive Dir. Jack T. Conway announced he has written all members of the IUD executive board asking approval of a meeting of the board on June 14 in Washington to fill the vacant post of president. He said he will submit his resignation so that that post also can be filled at the meeting.

Meany told reporters that the action represents the first time an affiliate has been suspended for non-payment of per capita, that the "case is unique" because "we have never had anyone tell us that they were going to stay in without paying dues."

The action does not help the federation, he commented, "but I think we have to go ahead and do our business in an orderly way. I don't think it helps the American trade union movement and I am quite sure it doesn't help the UAW."

Four members of the council were absent during the two-day session, Meany reported—Vice Presidents Ralph Helstein and A. J. D'Andrade are ill; John J. Grogan is representing the U.S. at a United Nations conference on human rights; Jacob S. Potofsky is engaged in negotiations.

In reply to a query, Meany noted that no member of the council defended Reuther or his actions during the discussion and stressed that the action taken was unanimous.

During its session, the council met with the members of the President's Council of Economic Advisers to discuss current economic policy problems and later with Pres. Johnson at the White House for further discussions.

At his press conference, Meany reaffirmed the AFL-CIO's position that if wage and price controls are needed the federation would go along if the controls are applied equitably across the board. He repeated also his belief that voluntary controls do not work in the type of industrial economy in the U.S.

Queried as to his views on the Poor Peoples' Campaign, Meany said "I am not opposed to what they are doing . . . I wouldn't do it that way . . . but they should have a try at it" if they think it's effective.

In speaking out on a number of pressing problems confronting the nation and the world the council said:

- Labor is "unalterably opposed" to the "meat-ax approach" to cutting the budget taken by a House-Senate conference committee. (Story, Page 1.)
- "Uncontrolled runaway escalation of medical costs must be halted and immediate consideration given to a program aimed at "reducing the cost while maintaining the quality of medical care." (Story, Page 2.)
- Prompt action is needed on a strong "truth-in-lending" bill now awaiting final passage by Congress. (Story, Page 1.)
- A meeting at the highest level of the government is critically needed to reach solutions to the problems of runaway U.S. firms exploiting low Mexican wage levels along the border and to the problems of "green carders" who hold papers allowing them to commute across the border and take jobs at depressed wage levels. (Story this page.)
- The "democratic forces behind the Iron Curtain deserve our full sympathy and support . . . especially the embattled workers of Czechoslovakia." (Story, Page 1.)
- All unions and their members should join actively in the national boycott against struck California grape growers. (Story, Page 2.)
- Four AFL-CIO unions seeking an equitable agreement from Campbell Soup Co. have the complete support of the federation in their efforts. (Story, Page 2.)

The council also heard a report from Vice Presidents Max Greenberg and Paul Phillips on their six-country trip to Africa in connection with the work of the African-American Labor Center.

It acted also to approve the recent merger of the Laborers and the Mail Handlers.

Appropriations were voted by the council to the Asian-American Free Labor Institute, the A. Philip Randolph Institute, the Smithsonian Institution, and the Citizens Committee for Peace and Freedom in Viet Nam.

The council set the next meeting for Sept. 16-17 in New York City and called a meeting of the General Board for Sept. 18.

THE EXECUTIVE COUNCIL'S unanimous resolution terming the decision of the Auto Workers to default on per capita payments "an act tantamount to withdrawal" is explained at a press conference by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany.

Cooperation of U.S., Mexican Unions Sought to End Border Exploitation

Close cooperation between United States and Mexican labor is imperative if answers are to be found to two problems that are undermining working conditions in both countries, the AFL-CIO Executive Council declared.

A report adopted by the council at its meeting in Washington urged further actions—"without delay"—by the U.S. and Mexican governments on the problems.

The report was submitted by a subcommittee of AFL-CIO Vice Presidents Joseph D. Keenan, David Dubinsky, Jacob S. Potofsky and Paul Jennings, which met earlier with delegates to the 9th conference of the Joint United States-Mexico Trade Union Committee.

The conference met in Washington at the invitation of AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, who was host at a luncheon attended by the delegates and federation leaders.

One problem, described in the subcommittee's report, was the hiring of Mexican "green carders" by U.S. employers. The "green carders"—getting their name from the color of a card issued to them—are admitted under immigration laws that allow them permanent resident status in the United States.

These "green carders," most of whom "commute" back and forth across the border to avoid higher living costs in the United States, have "little motivation to participate" in unions, the report noted.

'Commuters' Exploited

As a result, the report pointed out, they have been exploited by some employers in this country and have been used to "undermine organizing drives and break legitimate strikes."

The report called upon the Immigration Dept. to take administrative steps needed to prevent abuses of "green card" employment and the Justice Dept. "to administer the immigration law to restrain the green card influx."

The second problem cited by the report involves the effort of the Mexican government to lure U.S. companies to set up branch plants just across the border "to take advantage of low Mexican wage levels."

The companies, which then export their products back into the United States "not only pay wages far below U.S. standards but also benefit from U.S. tariff and Mexican tax treatment," the report said.

This program, it continued, damages the U.S. effort to improve living standards and wages along the border area—both of which are below national levels—and "also harms the Mexican drive to improve its own wage levels."

"The only beneficiaries," the report noted, "are profit-hungry companies which are seeking to improve their competitive position at the price of labor standards on both sides of the border."

One solution to this problem, the council said, lies in U.S. labor securing the cooperation of Mexican labor in pressing its government to boost the minimum wage in Mexico "closer to the U.S. level and to insist on effective federal enforcement" of it.

Other solutions, the council made clear, lie in action that can be taken by our government:

It urged the State Dept. to negotiate a trade agreement with Mexico to eliminate existing unfair competition with U.S. labor; the Treasury Dept. to enforce the duty of the Tariff Act on "subsidized exports" to the United States; Congress to tighten laws, including the Tariff Code, regarding the operation of U.S. companies abroad.

Meanwhile, delegates to the U.S.-Mexican Trade Union Committee conference adopted a resolution condemning employers use of "green card" holders for strikebreaking purposes.

"We urge that when any 'green card' holder engages in strikebreaking, his right to residence permit should be revoked, and sanctions be applied to the employer," the resolution stated.

Agreement Reached

The conference enacted a second resolution declaring that the U.S. and Mexican sections of the committee find themselves "in complete agreement" that Mexico's border program "should not become a means for exploiting workers," wages and working conditions.

The conference adopted a 13-point program that pledged US-MTUC to take steps to protect workers on both sides of the border and intensify cooperation between the labor movements of the two countries.

The program included calls for public relations and civic education efforts by workers in both countries, an emphasis on organizing, a "fight against any form of worker exploitation" and for leadership training.

These training programs, it added, should be jointly sponsored by state AFL-CIO units and the Mexican Confederation of Workers (CTM), with support welcomed from the American Institute for Free Labor Development and the Inter-American Regional Organization of Workers.

The council subcommittee—Potofsky, Jennings, Dubinsky, and Keenan—joined in stressing that the AFL-CIO supports the long-standing alliance between the workers of Mexico and the U.S. through US-MTUC "100 percent."

CTM Gen. Sec. Fidel Velazquez, who led the Mexican delegation, responded that Mexican labor regards the problems along the border "as gravely as you do."

"You may be sure that CTM will do all in its power to prevent exploitation of workers in the United States caused by the negative effects of border industrialization," he said, adding: "We will cooperate with the AFL-CIO to improve labor protection."

Velazquez announced he will appoint a CTM four-member subcommittee to meet with the AFL-CIO subcommittee in Mexico City, June 10, "as a first step" toward developing joint programs to seek solutions to border problems.

Labor Opposes Budget Slash Of $6 Billion or priority of individual programs."

The statement charged that the conferees disregarded Pres. Johnson's appeal for "legislative statesmanship" and instead "accepted the counsel of those who have little faith in America."

On Capitol Hill, meanwhile, both supporters and opponents of the budget slash formula were busy assessing probable voting strength and no immediate action was scheduled on the conference report.

Pres. Johnson on several occasions has warned that a slash of the magnitude imposed by the conference would hurt essential programs. He also sharply denounced as "blackmail" the attempt to force him to accept such a cut as the price of a tax increase.

EIGHTEEN JOURNALISTS from Asian countries learned American labor's views on domestic and international issues, including Viet Nam, during a two-hour "question and answer" session with AFL-CIO representatives at the federation's headquarters in Washington. The journalists toured 10 cities in the U.S. under joint sponsorship of the White House, State Dept., Defense Dept. and the U.S. Information Agency.

Industry-Linked Drive:

Hatters' Promotion Marked by Success

New York—The Hatters' union's efforts to improve business conditions in its industry so as to bolster the earnings of its members are paying off, delegates to the union's convention here were advised.

The convention, held at the Statler Hilton Hotel, concluded with the re-election of Alex Rose as president and Alfred Smoke as secretary-treasurer together with an executive board of 15 vice presidents.

The union's efforts to promote the wearing of headwear extends to all three branches in its jurisdiction—hats, caps and millinery, but it is in millinery that they are showing particularly dramatic results, according to a report presented by the Millinery Institute of America.

The institute is sponsored by the union and the industry and financed by a payroll contribution of the employers together with contributions from other business elements in the millinery industry. Its function is to promote the wearing of hats, encourage good style trends, and stimulate the attractiveness of headwear for all women, particularly for girls of high school and college age.

Similar success was registered in the field of men's headwear, the convention heard, through appeals to consumers to patronize union labeled merchandise. Smoke related that the Hatters had the aid of the labor movement in this effort and had registered marked success with merchants in industrial centers where the local labor movement made its pressure felt for union label hats and caps.

The Hatters' convention departed from the usual pattern of the triannual gatherings. Normally the union has prominent political and labor figures as featured speakers, but this time it conducted what Rose called an "austerity" convention. The only "outside" speakers were Charles Rothenberg, chairman of the Millinery Institute, and its director, Burt Champion.

Among the public stands taken by the convention in the form of resolutions were:

- A call on Congress and the Administration to insist on minimum wage and working conditions on all industrial products imported from abroad. The resolution declared that sweatshop production that would never be permitted to cross a state line in this country is admitted freely at points of entry if it comes from a foreign nation. These products then compete with American-made goods and deprive union workers here of their livelihood.
- A severe condemnation of the resurgent anti-semitism in the Soviet Union, Communist Poland and other Communist-dominated countries.
- An expression of amity and fraternal regard for Israel and its free labor movement.
- Support for an increase in the federal minimum wage to $2 an hour.
- A demand on Congress to implement the fair housing law it has already passed and implement more effectively other civil rights legislation. The discussion on this resoluton was concluded with a special tribute to the late Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr.

UAW Vows Support For Aerospace Units

Atlantic City, N. J.—The Auto Workers ended their 21st convention after voting full support for 750,000 aerospace and parts plants workers in negotiations just ahead and instructing UAW officers to "begin preparations immediately" for the next round of contract negotiations in 1970.

The convention declared "it is time to begin preparing our collective bargaining arsenal for the major struggles ahead. . . . We must build" on the achievements of 1967-68 bargaining "in order to cope effectively with managements that grow increasingly expert in their own preparations."

In major actions during the seven-day parley here, the 2,800 delegates re-elected all top officers; adopted wide-ranging legislative, economic and foreign affairs resolutions; heard Vice Pres. Hubert H. Humphrey and Sen. Robert F. Kennedy (D-N.Y.), but agreed to make no endorsement for President until after the political party conventions next summer.

The convention approved a resolution authorizing UAW officers to stop making per capita payments to the AFL-CIO and to put the money in escrow unless the federation agrees, by next Dec. 15, to a UAW demand for a special AFL-CIO convention.

Delegates also approved two constitutional changes. One authorized the board to take whatever action is required to enable the UAW to "mobilize, assist and work with" other organizations in meeting "urgent problems." The other asserted that, in the event of disaffiliation from the AFL-CIO, the board must require UAW local unions to affiliate with UAW Community Action Councils to "replace the current relationship with local and state AFL-CIO councils."

The convention also:

- Voted to keep strike benefits at the present level—$20 to $30 a week—until next April, when a special convention will be called to raise the benefits.
- Called for development of union leaders from the ranks of new young members and approved establishment of "family education centers" — the first in Michigan's lower peninsula.
- Renewed a pledge to keep backing the United Farm Workers Organizing Committee, AFL-CIO, in its struggle for contracts and legal protections.
- Stressed the need for continued coordinated bargaining efforts and for intensive organizing in all fields.
- Advocated "more vigorous administration and enforcement" of labor laws and urged stronger remedies and penalties against employers, including J. P. Stevens and Co., big government contractor, who "flagrantly and repeatedly violate national labor law, secure in their knowledge of the inadequacy of penalties" now existing.
- Expressed strong opposition to proposals for labor courts and condemned attacks by right-wing groups on the National Labor Relations Board and the act, which the convention said should be strengthened, not weakened or abolished.

Anaconda Still Holding Out in Copper Strike

Anaconda Wire & Cable Co. remained the only major holdout in the 10-month copper strike as two small firms agreed to terms and the Kennecott Copper Corp. agreed to a first contract for a newly organized plant.

More than 2,600 members of the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers and the Teamsters are still trying to win acceptable contracts from Anaconda at wire and cable plants in Hastings-on-Hudson, N.Y.; Sycamore, Ill.; Marion, Ind. and Muskegon, Mich.

Anaconda settled with unions representing more than 4,000 of its workers in March but remains "hard-nosed" about terms for the wire and cable plants, the unions said.

Cerro Corp. reached agreement with the Machinists on a pact covering 400 brass mill workers in Cleveland, O., and continued to negotiate with the Steelworkers for 250 employes at another brass mill in Stamford, Conn.

New Haven Copper Co. settled with the Auto Workers on contract terms for 125 brass mill workers in Seymour, Conn.

Hecla Mining Co., with 135 silver and lead miners at Wallace, Ida., still has not settled with the USWA. The USWA won a first contract for 80 Chase Brass employes at Montpelier, O., who will get wage hikes of 46 cents an hour over three years, and improvements in holidays, shift differentials and health benefits.

At its height the copper strike involved more than 60,000 workers all over the United States. It was settled after Pres. Johnson brought the interested parties to Washington for White House talks.

Ballot Drive Seeks Public Union Rights

Little Rock, Ark.—Arkansas labor has opened a campaign for an initiative measure that would spell out the right of public employes in the state to have unions and bargain collectively.

State AFL-CIO Pres. J. Bill Becker said that federation affiliates are now circulating petitions to put the measure on the state's Nov. 5 ballot. Petitioners must obtain 45,000 signatures by July 1.

The initiative, if approved by state voters, would declare the rights of public employes as "public policy," Becker said. Labor would then seek legislation in the state legislature to implement it, he added.

Strong 'Truth-in-Lending' Measure Cleared by House-Senate Conferees

floor revolt against weakening amendments to her bill added by the House Banking Committee, described the final version as a "good bill."

The legislation would require stores and lending institutions to inform buyers and borrowers what they have to pay in credit charges and interest. It is the first federal legislation in this field.

The full charge—including any compulsory insurance—would have to be stated both in total dollars and cents costs and in terms of true annual interest.

The legislation set no ceilings on interest rates or credit charges. But it would enable buyers and borrowers to shop for the best buy in credit because they would be able to make an easy comparison. Presently, in most states, credit terms can be stated in such flagrantly misleading ways that only a highly sophisticated consumer who is also a good mathematician can make an informed choice.

One of the major improvements the House made over the Senate bill, the Executive Council statement noted, was a curb on garnishment of workers' wages—a common weapon used by "easy credit" stores preying on low-income families.

The Senate bill contained no garnishment provision at all.

The conference agreed to limit garnishments to 25 percent of a worker's after-tax pay, compared to the 10 percent limit in the House bill. It exempted from garnishment, however, the first $48 of a worker's weekly take-home pay.

The $48 exemption would be automatically raised whenever the federal minimum wage is increased. The formula is 30 times the federal minimum wage.

In addition, the bill forbids an employer from firing a worker the first time his pay is garnisheed.

Wherever a state law provides stronger restrictions on garnishment, the state law would apply.

The Senate bill exempted revolving credit accounts, used by many department stores, from the requirement to disclose annual interest rates. This exemption had been described by the AFL-CIO Executive Council as "an enormous loophole" which would encourage other creditors to convert to revolving credit to evade the law.

The conference compromise eliminated the exemption but allowed stores using revolving credit to also list an "effective" annual rate, taking into account the "free time" given charge customers before interest or carrying charges become applicable.

The store would still have to list its "nominal" annual interest rate as well, however, and the dollar cost of the credit.

The Senate bill had exempted all transactions in which the credit charge was $10 or less—in effect exempting credit purchases of up to $100.

The compromise set up a sliding scale of exemptions. Finance charges wouldn't have to be listed if the cost of the item were $25 or less. Items costing $25 to $75 would be exempt only if the credit charge were $5 or less. For more expensive items, disclosure would be required whenever the finance charge came to more than $7.50.

Also in the conference bill is a rule intended to prevent home-repair salesmen from tricking customers into giving them second mortgages on their homes under a credit agreement they thought was a normal installment payment contract.

Not only would the homeowner have to be informed in advance that the paper he was asked to sign was a mortgage on his house, but he would have three days after signing to cancel the agreement.

The disclosure requirement applies to published or broadcast advertisments which include any dollar references to cost.

Thus a store might continue to advertise "easy credit." But it couldn't advertise "$1 down and $1 a week" without full disclosure of the credit terms and charges.

The bill also enables federal authorities to act against loan sharks under state laws when interstate traffic in loans is involved. Loan sharks are described as lenders charging more than 45 percent annual interest or using threats of violence to collect.

NLRB's John Fanning Sets Longevity Stint

Member John H. Fanning of the National Labor Relations Board has served longer than any other board member in NLRB history, the agency announced. In his 11th year of service, he surpassed the mark of 10 years and 138 days previously set by former member Abe Murdock.

Four of the seven NLRB members are serving a second or third term.

National Labor Group Formed to Back Humphrey

try, regardless of rank, is better off because of the public service rendered by Hubert H. Humphrey.

"This is the message we will carry to every international union, every state labor federation, every local central body and local unions. This is the basis upon which we urge all working men and women and their families to give their unstinting support to the nomination and election of Hubert H. Humphrey. This is the basis on which we call upon them to work as citizens toward this goal."

Establishment of the committee creates a vehicle for the swelling support within organized labor for Humphrey's candidacy. A number of union conventions and executive bodies have voted formal endorsement of the Vice President.

The latest union endorsement came from the Longshoremen, whose executive council said "the welfare of not only the labor movement but of the American people as a whole calls for the fullest utilization of Vice Pres. Humphrey's great abilities and unmatched experience in the highest office of this land."

Earlier, a number of union officials had joined in the formation of the Citizens for Humphrey Committee, a broad-based group including leading figures in business, labor, agriculture, education, journalism, the arts, entertainment, sports, Republicans, Democrats, Independents.

All of the unionists on the citizens' committee also are members of the labor committee. In addition, Meany was one of the founders of United Democrats for Humphrey, the principal campaign organization for the Vice President.

The United Auto Workers

Statement by the AFL-CIO Executive Council on the United Auto Workers, Washington, D. C., May 13, 1968.

We regret and deplore the reported decision of the UAW to default on its financial obligations to the AFL-CIO—an act tantamount to withdrawal from the federation.

This attempt to coerce the decisions of a representative body of American trade unions is unworthy of the avowed standards of the UAW.

Our regret stems, not from the sums involved, but from the fact that this action can only serve to deprive the members of the UAW of the right to participate and to be represented within the Federation or any of its subordinate bodies.

The separation of the working members of the UAW from their brothers in the American trade union movement is a real loss to all concerned.

Presumably, the president of the UAW is familiar with the terms of the AFL-CIO Constitution. He participated in its drafting and approved its contents. He must know that it contains no provision for the recognition of per capita payments to an "escrow account," or otherwise withheld, unless expressly waived by the Executive Council for "good cause".

He must also be fully aware that the Constitution does not permit an organization to continue its participation in the subordinate bodies of the federation after it ceases to enjoy that right in the federation itself. If the delegates to the recent UAW Convention acted, as their resolution indicates, on the premise that this was possible, they were misled and are the victims of misrepresentation.

We have no choice, therefore, if the UAW fails to meet its per capita tax obligation by May 15, 1968, but to apply the specific mandatory provisions of the AFL-CIO Constitution in this case.

Budget Slashing

Excerpts from statement adopted by AFL-CIO Executive Council on May 13, 1968, in Washington, D.C.

The AFL-CIO is unalterably opposed to the meat-ax approach to cutting the budget. We believe every federal expenditure must be considered on the merit, need and priority of individual programs.

Obviously some expenditure reductions are possible because they involve postponable items and less-urgent needs. Continuing efforts should be made to eliminate the types of wasteful expenditures that develop in all large enterprises, both private and government.

But essential programs must be maintained and expanded.

So it follows that we are appalled by the recent action of the House-Senate conferees in slashing the budget without regard to the merit, need or priority of individual programs.

America's urban crisis, its housing shortage, its educational needs, its pockets of poverty-stricken citizens and shortages of health-care and anti-pollution facilities require expanded action, not slashing cutbacks. If Congress rises to its responsibilities, it will increase—not cut—appropriations for such efforts.

As we have said before, we will support a fair and equitable tax increase on a temporary basis.

But the actions proposed by the conferees will set the United States on a course that can lead only to chaos in domestic and international policies.

Therefore, we intend to oppose with all our strength all indiscriminate budget slashing.

Running Wild

O'Hara Bill Supported:

Unmet Public Service Needs Termed Best Source of Jobs

The following is excerpted from remarks by Rep. William D. Ford (D-Mich.) at hearings before a House Labor subcommittee on the O'Hara bill to provide one million public service jobs in hospitals, schools, libraries, parks and other areas.

I BELIEVE that our National Business Alliance is going to be successful, and that private enterprise is making a substantial contribution toward meeting the problem. But we also recognize that every study has this much in common—that no matter how much private enterprise does, it is limited by the purposes that that corporation is designed to serve.

There is a whole area developing very rapidly in this country of deep need for public service that is not being met. There isn't a small city in the shadow of the large industrial areas that has adequate people even to pick up its rubbish.

We can't hire postmen in cities like Chicago and Detroit and Philadelphia, even though we have all these unemployed people.

We really don't have a way to make a transition from the person who is no longer a part of the public school system, from unemployment and unskilled employment, functional illiteracy, in many instances, to this first step in the job. And the other fellows are moving. Private enterprise offers jobs at the auto plant, and do you know who goes and gets them? Our low-paid postal workers, our rubbish collectors, the other low-paid public service people in the area are leaving their jobs, and creating more vacancies in that area, to go take the job, because this low-pay job has given them the kind of basic skills and experience that they need to hold it.

So we have to find a way to create jobs that don't now exist, and that is really the purpose of this legislation. I think that your testimony, Mr. Meany, really grasps the essence of what this legislation is trying to do.

We are not trying to say that any of these coalitions of business are not going to work. We are not saying that we should diminish our effort to encourage private enterprise in every possible way to recognize a responsibility not only for producing the product, but for contributing to society by making employment available. But we recognize as you do that that isn't going to be enough, and it never will be enough, and that we haven't got time to wait.

IT SEEMS TO ME there is a parallel here between the difficulties we have had over the last four years with the poverty program. Four years ago, on the other side of the aisle, they were saying that it won't work, because it will be wasted, and we spent all of our time around here on a per-head basis justifying how much it cost per head to save souls in the poverty program.

Last year we didn't hear that any more. As a matter of fact they wanted to spend more money than we did, and expanded it, and private enterprise, to get everybody into the act.

Maybe we will have to have this bill kicking around here, and we will do it for four years before we see that wall of resistance break down. But it is time for people on the other side of the aisle here to quit suggesting that we shouldn't try something because we have no way of guaranteeing that it will work better than anything that has ever been tried before. We are facing another summer, and those of us who were close to what happened last summer don't ever want to see it again.

This is legislation that might fall on its face in many parts of the country. I suspect that in our state of Michigan it will work very well, that we have the kind of traditions that will grab this legislation and run with it.

If these folks who are now jumping on this legislation have any confidence at all in the imagination of our county and state and local officials, and their willingness to provide services that are much needed now, we can quit carping about the possibility that it might fail, and let's just try it.

At the same time, I want to commend you for the fact that your testimony, much more than my comments, was very positive in pointing to the support that you lend to all of the multiple solutions suggested to the problem of unemployment for those special groups in our society that have problems that almost defy any kind of an answer.

The only thing I can say is that your testimony on behalf of your organization is consistent with the position you have taken ever since I have been on this committee, and I thank you very much for your support.

Struggle for Freedom:

AFL-CIO Hails Czech Worker Efforts to Rebuild Free Unions

The following is excerpted from the statement "The Struggle for Freedom Behind the Iron Curtain," adopted by the AFL-CIO Executive Council in Washington, May 14, 1968.

NOT SINCE 1956 has there been so much unrest behind the Iron Curtain. Once again, the people are demonstrating their yearning for freedom and their hatred of Communist totalitarianism. These protest movements, beginning among students and intellectuals, have been spontaneous.

In Poland, the student revolt was quickly and ruthlessly suppressed by the Gomulka regime. But in Czechoslovakia, the movement spread rapidly to other sections of the population, in particular the workers. Widespread discontent with the regime was loudly voiced, demands for broad reforms boldly raised, and unrest was all the greater, since the Czech regime was still headed by Antonin Novotny, a Stalinist.

Like East Germany under Ulbricht, but unlike the other satellite countries, Czechoslovakia had not experienced any destalinization after 1956. Now after a delay of 12 years, the situation has changed. Under the pressure of intellectuals and workers, an anti-Stalinist faction in the Communist party, led by Alexander Dubcek, has taken over and ousted Novotny and his lieutenants from their top posts in the party, government, judiciary, army and the various front organizations like their Labor Front.

Recent events in Poland and Czechoslovakia, as well as in the Soviet Union, provide a scorching refutation of the notion that there has been a genuine stabilized liberalization behind the Iron Curtain and that the people have become reconciled to the Communist regime and devoted to its "socialist" system.

What has happened in Czechoslovakia is of special interest to the international free labor movement. The upheaval in that country has strongly affected its Labor Front organizations. Their top leadership has been denounced, as Stalinist, ousted and replaced by a new Communist clique. Since the new officials are basically no less obnoxious than their predecessors, the membership protested. So far, their protest has not been heeded.

However, many Communist "trade union" officials of lower rank have been chased away by irate members who have bitterly criticized Communist control of the so-called "trade unions" and demanded freedom of association and the reestablishment of trade unions independent from the Communist party and government.

This rejection by the Czech workers of their so-called trade unions and officials is an unequivocal disavowal of those ICFTU affiliates which have engaged in exchange visits with Communist Labor Fronts behind the Iron Curtain and fraternized with the very Communist leaders whom the Czechoslovak workers have regarded as their enemies.

It is most regrettable that some ICFTU affiliates have even gone so far as to open their press for interviews glorifying the Communist system and tragic events like the coup d'etat of February 1948 in Prague which led to the murder of the then Foreign Minister Jan Masaryk and to other crimes that are now the target of sharp public attacks and investigation. Instead of promoting liberalization in general and trade union democratization in particular, these exchanges have actually lent aid and comfort to the most orthodox, the most Stalinist, elements in Communist "trade unions."

The hard facts of life have fully confirmed the continuing validity of the ICFTU's official ban on contacts with Labor Fronts in Communist countries. The Executive Council of the AFL-CIO, therefore, calls upon the Executive Board of the ICFTU to reaffirm once more its policy opposing such exchanges—a policy which has been repeatedly reaffirmed. At the same time, the ICFTU should lose no time in developing a program of active support for the democratic workers behind the Iron Curtain.

The AFL-CIO Executive Council expresses its profound admiration for the freedom-loving people behind the Iron Curtain and especially the embattled workers of Czechoslovakia. American labor hails their valiant efforts to re-establish truly representative trade unions . . ."

The Executive Council urges our government to protest against the anti-semitic course pursued by the Polish regime and, in the event this protest is not heeded, to terminate the privileges it now enjoys under the "favored nations" trade treaty with our country.

We further urge that our government initiate a move to have the Human Rights Commission of the UN investigate the promotion of anti-semitism in Poland and recommend appropriate action for ending this violation of the Charter of the United Nations by one of its member states.

Executive Council Action:

7-Point Program Set Forth To Curb Soaring Health Costs

The following is excerpted from a statement on medical costs adopted by the AFL-CIO Executive Council May 13, 1968 in Washington.

WE SUGGEST IMMEDIATE consideration of the following specific steps for reducing the cost while maintaining the quality of medical care:

1. Promotion of the fastest possible growth of comprehensive group practice prepayment plans which have proven their ability to provide comprehensive health services of high quality at substantial savings over fee-for-service, solo practice.

2. Encouragement of more efficient utilization of the supply of doctors, nurses and other health personnel including adequate opportunities for training and promotion at all levels.

3. Payment of medical care on a capitation basis, that is, an actuarially determined amount paid at periodic intervals covering total health care. Capitation payments should cover not only physician services but hospitalization, extended care and home health services as well. Under such a system of payment physicians would have an incentive to practice preventive medicine and thus keep patients well out of the hospital. A minimum program would be to provide for a negotiated fee schedule for all physicians participating in federal programs. Changes in such reimbursement should be negotiated, not determined unilaterally by physicians.

4. Because the decisions of physicians have such a great impact on hospital costs, to the maximum extent possible physicians, especially hospital based physicians and the heads of various medical departments, should be made administratively responsible to the hospital.

5. Reimbursement of hospitals on the basis of average cost for all hospitals in similar circumstances thereby rewarding the efficient and penalizing the inefficient. Alternatively, they might be reimbursed on the basis of a negotiated rate per patient.

6. The artificial distinction in medicine between the method of financing physician services and hospitalization should be eliminated by establishing a single system of financing both, requiring no additional out-of-pocket payment from beneficiaries.

7. The Food & Drug Administration should have the authority to evaluate the relative effectiveness of drugs. On the basis of such objective scientific and clinical information, this information should be made available to physicians and hospitals in an official governmental or government approved generic name formulary which would indicate the most appropriate drug for different diseases. Hospitals and other providers of care should be required to use this formulary or an equally effective one for their own use under appropriate federal standards. They should be required to purchase quality drugs listed in the formulary on a generic name basis and by competitive bid.

MOST AMERICANS ARE, understandably, deeply concerned about crime in the streets.

There are few candidates for public office who fail to pledge that if they are elected, citizens will be free to walk the streets without fear. This political reaction illustrates the depth of the concern over safe streets.

The Johnson Administration has made a number of proposals along this line, and currently the Senate is debating the Omnibus Crime Control and Safe Streets Act.

The bill, according to its title, is designed to "assist state and local governments in reducing the incidence of crime, to assist the effectiveness, fairness and coordination of law enforcement and criminal justice at all levels of government. . . ."

Police-community relations in the United States are a critical problem and one could scarcely disagree with Atty. Gen. Ramsey Clark, who calls the nation's policeman "the most important American in 1968", who is "underpaid, undertrained and overworked."

A new study on "The Police and the Urban Frontier" by George Edwards, judge of the 6th District, U.S. Court of Appeals, published by the American Jewish Committee, examines this, too.

"The police are not responsible for solving America's race problems," Judge Edwards writes. "But, if we are to move toward the needed fundamental social changes without something approaching civil war, can anyone doubt the need to re-examine the role of the police in this conflict and its capacity to meet the challenge?"

Judge Edwards is a former police commissioner of Detroit, former head of the Detroit city council and former Detroit unionist.

The areas stressed by both Judge Edwards and Atty. Gen. Clark could be eased under the provisions of the Crime Control and Safe Streets Act. They include higher pay, better training, revised attitudes, etc., for police.

Other sections of the act, however, are raising eyebrows—and alarm.

Title II, for example, would undercut recent Supreme Court decisions which have been carefully built up to protect the rights of defendants in criminal cases. Constitutional lawyers, however, are confident that upsetting High Court rulings by one act of Congress would be unconstitutional.

Title III of the act would permit wiretapping and eavesdropping by federal, state and local law enforcement officials in the investigation of both minor and major crimes. It goes far beyond the recommendations of Pres. Johnson and Atty. Gen. Clark which would ban all wiretapping and electronic and mechanical eavesdropping, except by federal security agencies in circumstances where the President finds the security of the nation at stake.

Taking strong opposition to this section are Sens. Philip Hart (D-Mich.) and Edward V. Long (D-Mo.). In their views of the bill, they declared:

"The hard truth of the matter is that limited eavesdropping is neither sought nor particularly helpful in the fight against organized crime. What would help is unlimited surveillance. As proof, look at New York, which has had limited wiretap and eavesdrop for decades and which has as much organized crime as almost any city in the country. The vast majority of the fish in the New York wiretap net are petty gamblers and relatively few of them go to jail.

"As to crime in the streets, the talk of electronic eavesdropping being helpful to police is ludicrous. Who ever heard of a pursesnatcher or rapist planning his crime so as to be caught by wiretap or bugging? The proponents are using crime in the streets as nothing more than a red herring. If we are to really do something about crime in the streets, we must get at the roots—poverty and ignorance —not legalized wire-tapping."

The two senators warned that "George Orwell's 'Big Brother' is well on his way technologically" and asked: "Do we want to speed his arrival by sanctioning use of his tools, especially when their application will have little or no effect in lessening crime?"

VICE PRES. HUMPHREY is shown as he addressed meeting of Steelworkers executive board which endorsed his candidacy for president. I. W. Abel, head of the union, is chairman of newly formed Labor Committee for Humphrey.

How to Buy:

Higher Prices, Mortgage Rates Trigger New Housing Crisis

By Sidney Margolius

WITH PRICE TAGS on homes and mortgages both spiraling, a four-alarm housing crisis is in the making. This replaces the ordinary housing crisis that has been plaguing working families for the past decade.

If you have been planning to move into a larger house, or are a young family seeking to buy or even rent a home, you've got a problem. We kid you not. We'll leave that to the real estate dealers and bankers who have just persuaded Congress to increase the interest rate on FHA and VA mortgages to 6¾ per cent.

In the United States, typical mortgage interest rates now have reached close to 7 per cent—highest in almost 40 years. How high they can go is shown by what has happened in Canada. There mortgage rates have gone to 9-9½ per cent. Some 15 years ago Canadian mortgages were 6-6½ per cent.

The problem is compounded by the constant rise in the prices of houses themselves. Homeseekers now must pay higher interest rates on top of bigger mortgages.

Typical new houses even in the so-called moderate-price developments, now cost $22,000-$23,000. Prices of older houses are almost as forbidding. Reports by the National Association of Real Estate Boards indicate that the average existing house now sells for approximately $20,000. Prices of such houses have been going up about $600 a year on average.

During the peak sale months of June, May, July and March (in that order), existing houses have been selling for $1,000 more than a year ago.

These prices are noticeably out of reach of most working families. Since you are supposed to pay not more than 2½ times your annual earnings for a house, the average working family earning about $6,200 a year now can afford a little over half a house (one for about $15,600).

A working family that buys a new house for $22,000 with say, a $17,000 mortgage for 30 years, will pay back an extraordinary amount. It will pay $107 a month on the mortgage (not counting taxes and other expenses). Over the 30 years it will repay a total of $38,678 on the original $17,000. Figure you work 3½ years just to pay the interest on the mortgage.

While homeownership costs have gone up more sharply than rentals in recent years, renters will feel the interest rate squeeze too. Interest rates for new apartment construction average between 7¼ and 7½ percent, the real estate association reports. These high rates will push up rents on both high-rise and garden apartments in the larger towns.

WORTHWHILE ADVICE is hard to come by in this situation. Here are a few suggestions that may temper the housing squeeze a little for homeseekers and present owners:

- Avoid buying during the peak sale months of March through July. Prices of existing houses often are 2 to 3 percent less during the fall and early winter. Three-bedroom houses are most in demand. Tags on two-bedroom or four-bedroom houses are relatively lower.
- If at all possible, see if you can take over the lower-rate existing mortgage. A house with a mortgage under 6 percent is worth more to you if you can swing the larger down payment needed, or if the owner will take back a purchase-money mortgage, at a reasonable rate, for part of the down payment.
- If you live in one of the large cities where unions and other groups have gotten together to build a cooperative housing development, this is your best bet.

Outlook for '70s:

Jobs Forecast Rosy For Many Careers

THE LABOR DEPT. in its annual turn at forecasting job opportunities reports that for the 1970s the outlook will be brightest for professional, skilled, service and clerical workers.

The details on prospects for more than 700 occupations and 30 major industries are contained in the 1968-69 edition of the Occupational Outlook Handbook, published by the Bureau of Labor Statistics.

The handbook, which attests to the impact of automation on jobs, provides basic long-range information on employment trends. It is particularly tailored for young people making career choices.

Among jobs with "excellent" outlooks, the handbook lists:

Engineers, mathematicians, chemists, physicists, accountants, doctors, nurses, health workers, social workers, school counselors, teachers and librarians.

Employment prospects are rated from "good to very good" in biological sciences, food processing, geophysics, meteorology, pharmacy, sales, insurance and real estate.

Professional occupations, the handbook points out, are growing twice as fast as overall employment and will show a 45 percent employment gain by 1975. Through the 1970s there will be some 650,000 professional opportunities annually.

Rapid growth in managerial occupations along with a continuing shift from small to large businesses is reported. Managerial jobs are expected to require 400,000 workers annually in the 1970s.

Semi-skilled, clerical and service jobs employ close to half the workers in the United States and they will increase in number by 25 percent by 1975, according to the handbook.

Its estimate for annual new needs in each of these categories through the 1970s is: 400,000 workers for semi-skilled jobs, 700,000 clerical workers and 800,000 service employes.

In areas concerning college graduates, it finds:

State, local and federal governments will continue to recruit them "actively"; Negroes will receive more job offers at higher salaries than ever before; the draft will take more graduates than last year; starting salaries in 1968 will average about 5 percent higher than in 1967.

Commenting on the handbook, Sec. of Labor W. Willard Wirtz says that "the best preparation for a career in a world of change will be a broad and basic education."

Soup to Nonsense:

Picture-Beautiful Refrigerators Are Strictly for Advertisements

By Jane Goodsell

IT WAS HEARTBREAKING to open the door of our new (two-week-old) refrigerator and find it looking every bit as disheveled as our former (12-year-old) refrigerator. There were the same little icebox dishes filled with raggle-taggle remnants of meals past—four leftover brussels sprouts, half a cup of lamb stew, a sliver of meat loaf, a dab of cottage cheese and two spoonfuls of creamed spinach.

There were also a couple of chicken wings wrapped in wax paper, three half-empty bottles of pop, a couple of quarts of milk (both opened) and half a dozen eggs strewn haphazardly among the egg receptacles in the refrigerator door.

I shouldn't have been surprised. I should no more expect the interior of our refrigerator to look like those double-page advertisements than I should expect my new lipstick (the same brand Jean Shrimpton uses) to take four inches off my waist and give me high checkbones.

Still, in both cases, I find myself dismayed by the gap between the dream and reality. As a result, I've been thinking—well, brooding actually—about these gifted housewives whose refrigerators are fit to be photographed in living color.

For example: I have before me a picture of a refrigerator stocked with a typical array of mouth-watering goodies. A whole turkey, beautifully brown and succulent, sits on a platter nicely decorated with orange slices and parsley. A sparkling gelatin mold. Six tall parfaits topped with whipped cream and cherries. A casserole of sweet potatoes, nicely glazed. A lemon meringue pie. An unopened jar of olives. A bowl of fruit so artistically arranged that it might be a model for a still life.

Another refrigerator contains among other things a crackling brown crown roast of lamb surrounded by tiny new potatoes, and a casserole of stuffed peppers and six cup custards. In all refrigerator advertisements, each egg receptable holds an egg.

THESE GLORIOUS LAYOUTS not only make me blush for the unkempt disarray of my own glide-out shelves, but they pose a number of questions which I find unanswerable. How come that rack of lamb was cooked to perfection and then stored, untouched, in the refrigerator? Likewise the turkey, the stuffed peppers and the glazed sweet potatoes? Did an emergency occur at the precise moment that dinner was ready and, if so, who had the presence of mind to put the food away in the refrigerator—and in such precise, orderly fashion, too.

The amount of food also puzzles me. Since there are only six parfait glasses and six stuffed peppers, one would assume that only six people are expected to dine. Yet look at all that food! Clearly, those refrigerator ad housewives operate on the premise that twice-too-much is just enough, and you'd expect them to end up with a whole bunch of leftovers.

Not so. Leftovers in refrigerator ads are as scarce as mosquitos in resort advertisements. Everything is either consumed entirely (including, apparently, turkey carcasses and ham bones which make a shambles of my refrigerator for weeks) or else left untouched in pristine splendor. I suppose I could keep a roasted turkey untouched in my refrigerator, too. If I hired a man with a gun to stand guard over it.

2-Year-Old GI Bill Aids Nearly 750,000

NEARLY THREE-QUARTERS of a million veterans and servicemen started school and training programs under the current G.I. Bill which has been in operation less than two years, the Veterans Administration reports.

Since the Veterans' Readjustment Benefits Act of 1966 went into effect June 1, 1966, more than 701,000 veterans and 45,000 servicemen have made use of the bill.

Enrollment this spring stood at 423,000 veterans and 27,000 servicemen.

This "Third Generation" G.I. Bill gives veterans with at least 181 days of military service up to 36 months education and training benefits.

More veterans are taking college-level courses under the current bill than the veterans of the Korean G.I. Bill and the World War II bill did, the VA noted.

About 283,000, or nearly two-thirds of the Viet Nam era veterans are enrolled in the college level courses. This compares with 51 percent under the Korean bill and less than 30 percent on the World War II bill.

Veterans and servicemen taking below-college-level courses at the end of March totaled 155,000. Of this number, 85 percent are veterans.

The VA said nearly 6,200 veterans have started on-the-job training since that provision was added to the bill—along with flight and cooperative farm training—last October. Another 8,000 veterans were taking flight training as of Mar. 31.

At Miami Beach Parley:

Textile Union Backs Job Safety Standards

Miami Beach—The United Textile Workers voted support for proposed federal occupational health and safety standards after Assistant Sec. of Labor Esther Peterson presented the case for the legislation to UTW convention delegates here.

Mrs. Peterson charged that violations of safety and health standards have been uncovered in 95 percent of the plants, and businesses inspected by the Labor Dept. during fiscal year 1967.

Of 1,339 industrial establishments inspected by federal engineers, she said 1,283 were found in violation of minimum standards for safety and health conditions under the Public Contracts Act.

She noted that firms holding government contracts must adhere to minimum standards of health and safety under provisions of the act.

"But we cannot compel a plant to observe these basic conditions if the company does not have a contract with the federal government," she told the UTW. "However, we would be able to do so under the Occupational Safety & Health bill, now pending before the Congress."

The bill would establish enforceable standards in all plants operating in interstate commerce and would provide information gathering, research, training and education in the cause and prevention of work accidents and diseases, she added.

It is "a national shame" that occupational accidents each year result in 14,000 to 15,000 dead, more than 2 million disabled and 7 million injured, Mrs. Peterson said.

The 400 delegates to the UTW convention re-elected all top officers of the union, led by Pres. George Baldanzi and Sec.-Treas. Francis Schaufenbil.

Schaufenbil reported that the present net worth of the union is $1.3 million—up from the $550,000 of August 1964, the last year UTW met here.

And, he added, statistics show even with all that money, "union financial officers are a hundred times more honest than those in banks and savings and loan organizations."

UTW has grown to 51,249 average monthly dues-paid members, an increase of 18 percent from the 43,329 members in 1964, he said. During the period of that increase, he said, UTW lost 30 local unions through plant liquidations—but chartered 37 new locals.

The secretary-treasurer said the growth "requires us to be more vigilant than ever in the protection of funds." Thus each local union elects a board of trustees to make a once-a-month audit.

Losses Uncovered

"Nevertheless, we have, in recent years discovered at least five cases of improper handling of local union funds. Apparently, in each of these cases our usual precautions did not override the temptation and total loss exceeded $22,000."

In some cases restitution was made—in others the union is in the legal process of recovering losses exceeding bond coverage, he reported.

He said many local unions now use certified public accountants to audit books as "a strong deterrent to financial escapades."

"The results have been so satisfactory that it is our intention in the very near future to advise all local unions that this will hereafter be a mandatory requirement for the best interests and protection of all concerned," Schaufenbil said.

A LONG HISTORY of participation by American labor in the struggle for human rights was documented for the United Nations Conference on Human Rights in Teheran, Iran, by AFL-CIO Vice Pres. John J. Grogan, right, a member of the United States delegation. With him is AFL-CIO Intl. Affairs Rep. Henry Kirsch, who served as an advisor at the conference.

Grogan Cites Labor's Role in Human Rights

Teheran, Iran—American labor has a "long history" of fighting for human dignity and social justice, AFL-CIO Vice Pres. John J. Grogan told the United Nations Conference on Human Rights here.

He spoke as a member of the U.S. delegation to a conference committee in support of a U.S. resolution calling upon all governments to set up commissions to seek out and correct human rights' violations within their borders.

Grogan, who is president of the Marine & Shipbuilding Workers, emphasized that U.S. unions support struggles for human rights at home as well as in other countries.

He declared that the conference marks the 20th anniversary of the Declaration of Human Rights by the UN General Assembly and that it was U.S. labor that spurred the initial drive for the declaration.

American labor has for more than 20 years pressed for measures to implement the International Labor Organization's 1930 convention against forced labor, he noted.

Grogan recalled that AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, as U.S. delegate to the UN in 1957, reminded it that Samuel Gompers was a "prime mover" for organizing the ILO to advance "human well being among all people regardless of race, color or creed."

At its most recent convention, in 1967, Grogan continued, the AFL-CIO reiterated its support of workers in "captive nations" who are denied political freedom and human rights.

Against Dictatorship

"The AFL-CIO is unequivocally opposed to every form of dictatorship—whether it be communist, fascist, Falangist, or any other totalitarian hue," he declared.

This will always be the case, he added, because "totalitarian tyrannies are mortal enemies of individual dignity and fundamental human rights, including the right of working people to organize into free trade unions."

Grogan also described his own "practical experience" in the human rights field in New Jersey, his home state, and in Hoboken, N.J., where he was mayor for some 18 years.

He said the city established Hoboken Civil Rights Committees in 1953, which—with the cooperation of labor, industry, government and clergy—were successful in resolving complaints of violations of human rights and job discrimination.

New Jersey's 10-year old "Anti-Discrimination Act," he added, has machinery for holding hearings on complaints of discrimination, conducting voluntary efforts to resolve them and imposing binding solutions if necessary.

Drive Seeks to Cut Filming By 'Runaways'

New York—The Theatrical Stage Employes executive board voted to appropriate $100,000 for an informational campaign on behalf of American-made movies and gave Pres. Richard F. Walsh emergency powers to "take whatever steps may be necessary to combat foreign film production by American producers."

The action was designed, Walsh said, to acquaint the public with "the facts of crippling unemployment" in U.S. film studios and to benefit studio workers. It will parallel Pres. Johnson's "current effort to improve this nation's unfavorable balance of payments ratio by curtailing expenditures abroad," he said.

In Hollywood, 33 studio unions with more than 30,000 members joined forces to overcome the effects on jobs of films made overseas by "runaway" American firms.

Not more than 500 of the 9,000 Hollywood members of the Screen Actors Guild are currently working in the "mere handful" of television and feature films now in production, the Guild said.

The Hollywood AFL Film Council reported more than 31 percent of a labor pool of 24,000 is unemployed.

Senate Asked to Stiffen Electronic Safety Bill

A House-passed bill to protect the public from electronic products that "leak" radiation "must be drastically overhauled and strengthened in the Senate," the AFL-CIO said, if it is to be any more than "a pious statement of good intentions."

Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller termed the House bill "a weak and watered down version of the kind of legislation needed to institute a vigorous, well enforced national program in the field of electronic radiation."

Biemiller proposed strengthening amendments in a statement filed with the Senate Commerce Committee. The AFL-CIO's position, he told the committee, has the backing of both the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers and the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers—the two affiliates whose members are most directly affected.

New Standards

The proposed legislation would empower the secretary of health, education & welfare, through the Public Health Service, to establish standards at the manufacturing level to control radiation emitted from any electronic source—including television sets and X-rays.

Biemiller emphasized the AFL-CIO's "strong support of the stated goals of the legislation" and asked the Senate to improve the bill by:

- Expanding the coverage to clearly include laser beams and microwaves.
- Establishing standards to protect the health and safety of workers manufacturing the product as well as that of consumers using it.
- Reducing the time lag for a standard to take effect from the two-year maximum in the House bill to the one-year maximum originally proposed by the Administration.
- Strengthening enforcement powers, including the right to make plant inspections and to seize new products found hazardous to the public, and imposing criminal penalties for "wilful violations" of law.

Biemiller told the Senate committee that "the public, consumers and workers alike, need a strong, effective bill to protect them from the enlarging hazards of man-made radiation. They have a right to expect safeguards over the products they buy or use, over the work environment where these products are built, handled or repaired, and over the wider environment which is being more and more contaminated" by the waste products.

He urged that the standards apply both to articles imported into the United States and exported from the United States.

"I do not think that we should operate on a double standard," Biemiller said. "If we rightly expect imported electronic products to meet high standards of safe use, we are equally obligated to send safe products abroad."

Plan Backed to Spread Water Pollution Funds

An Administration proposal to spread federal funds for water pollution control to a greater number of communities has been endorsed by the AFL-CIO as a necessary "temporary expedient."

The reason for the proposed change is a budget squeeze which has resulted in considerably less money being available for federal grants to build waste disposal systems than contemplated when the original legislation was enacted.

This year's budget request is for only $225 million of the $700 million authorized, although still a $25 million increase over last year's appropriation.

Since there is already a backlog of requests from cities and states for anti-pollution grants, the Administration bill seeks to enable more projects to be undertaken by changing the method of federal assistance.

The federal government would continue to put in up to 45 percent of the cost of waste treatment plants which meet standards. But instead of giving the money in a lump sum, it would underwrite that portion of 30-year bonds issued by the municipalities to finance the project.

Thus the federal share would be stretched over a 30-year period and the appropriations this year would enable many more projects to be started.

AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller supported this approach "in view of the budgetary pinch" in statements to both the Senate and House Public Works committees.

The Administration bill would also provide a partial interest subsidy—amounting to the difference between the interest rates at which the bonds are sold on the private market and the current average interest the federal government pays on its own long-term bonds.

Biemiller suggested an amendment which would provide a somewhat greater interest subsidy. He asked that the government pay one-third of the annual interest charge on the sewage disposal bonds.

On another phase of water pollution control, Biemiller endorsed the main provisions of a bill being considered by the House committee to provide stricter safeguards against dumping or leakage of oil by vessels or industrial plants.

He urged, however, that provision of criminal penalties and revocation of licenses for ships' officers for violations be eliminated from the bill.

New England Hydroelectric Plan Pressed

New England labor strongly supports Pres. Johnson's requests for funds to complete planning for the hydroelectric power project scheduled to be built in the Dickey-Lincoln School District of Maine, a House Appropriations subcommittee was told.

Thomas F. Policastro, chairman of the New England AFL-CIO Council and president of the Rhode Island State AFL-CIO, said the project is necessary to bring down the excessive cost of electric power.

The House last year killed the fund bill to complete planning after an intensive lobbying campaign by private utilities. Policastro expressed hope that this year the House will resist "the lobbying and misrepresentation which can be expected" and approve the funds.

He said New England's industrial growth has been held back by "the highest power bills, both domestic and industrial, in the United States."

South's Union Leaders Push Equal Job Rights

New Orleans—Local union leaders from Louisiana, Mississippi and Arkansas affirmed labor's commitment to equal job rights in an all-day conference here sponsored by the AFL-CIO and the federal government's Equal Employment Opportunity Commission.

AFL-CIO Civil Rights Dir. Donald Slaiman reported in an address to the conference on labor's active campaign for passage of the fair employment section of the Civil Rights Act. He said the aim of the conference was to discuss "intelligent compliance" with its provisions and to clear up any misunderstandings between unions and the EEOC over implementation.

Louisiana State AFL-CIO Pres. Victor Bussie told a luncheon session of the conference that discrimination can be ended without engaging in "new types of discrimination." The effort must continue, he said, until it can truthfully be said that there is no discrimination against workers "anywhere in America."

Bussie said equal pay and working conditions for equal work would remove the economic basis of race discrimination and stressed that the labor movement is pledged to that goal.

Mississippi State AFL-CIO Pres. Claude Ramsay told the conference that the continuing struggle of working people for justice and a decent living standard is "basically a struggle for human dignity."

The conference was the sixth of a series of regional meetings sponsored by the EEOC and the AFL-CIO Dept. of Civil Rights.

Panelists and speakers included Pres. J. Bill Becker of the Arkansas State AFL-CIO; Laborers Vice Pres. Robert Powell; Marcus Loftus, assistant to the president of the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers; Colleen Boland, head of the Airline Stewardesses section of the Transport Workers; Pres. A. P. Stoddard of the Greater New Orleans Labor Council, and E. T. Kehrer and William Pollard of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Civil Rights.

RFK Wins Nebraska, Reagan Shows Strength

Sen. Robert F. Kennedy ran according to form and the pre-election polls in capturing a majority of the Democratic vote in the Nebraska presidential primary, but the Republican side of the ballot produced the political surprise of the week.

Former Vice Pres. Richard M. Nixon extended his string of GOP primary victories, taking about 70 percent of the vote. But his opponent on the ballot, California Gov. Ronald Reagan, showed unexpected strength as he drew nearly 22 percent.

Reagan had done no campaigning in Nebraska, although his supporters had sponsored a series of half-hour television programs around the state featuring a film about the governor, his background and position on various issues.

New York Gov. Nelson Rockefeller also avoided the Nebraska campaign on the ground that the state is "Nixon country" His backers had hoped, however, for a better showing than the write-in vote of 5.4 percent he received.

The Democratic race had been billed as a "head-to-head" confrontation between Kennedy and Sen. Eugene J. McCarthy, but Pres. Johnson's name was also on the ballot since his decision not to seek re-election came after the deadline for entering or removing candidates' names.

McCarthy received about 31 percent of the vote against Kennedy's 52 percent and 5.6 percent for Johnson. Vice Pres. Humphrey, who was not on the ballot and did no campaigning, drew 8.4 percent in write-in votes.

Incomplete returns indicated that two convention delegates committed to McCarthy and one committed to Kennedy were elected. The remaining 24 are uncommitted, but most of them reportedly favor Kennedy. On the Republican side, nine delegates are committed to Nixon and the tenth, Sen. Roman L. Hruska, is uncommitted although he openly backs the former vice president.

In West Virginia's primary election, the spotlight was on contests in both parties for their nominations for governor. With most precincts counted, Democratic State Chairman James M. Sprouse apparently had won a slim victory over Atty. Gen. C. Donald Robertson. In November, he will face Rep. Arch A. Moore, Jr., a six-term House member, who easily defeated former Gov. Cecil H. Underwood to win the GOP nomination.

New Democratic Party Endorsed:

CLC Convention Approves New, Modernized Structure

By Robert B. Cooney

Toronto—The Canadian Labor Congress ended its seventh convention here after modernizing the structure of the Canadian labor movement, resolving to defeat proposed union-busting legislation and committing labor to fully support the New Democratic Party in the June 25 general elections.

The convention by acclamation elected Donald MacDonald to the presidency of the 1.5 million member CLC. MacDonald, secretary-treasurer since the merger of 1956, had also served as acting president since Claude Jodoin was incapacitated by a stroke a year ago.

William Dodge, formerly one of the CLC's two executive vice presidents, was chosen secretary-treasurer, also by acclamation. Joe Morris was returned to his executive vice presidency and Dodge's former post went to Gerard Rancourt, general secretary of the Quebec Federation of Labor, who won from another Quebecker, Romeo Mathieu.

New Democratic Party Leader T. C. (Tommy) Douglas received a rousing welcome from the 2,000 delegates who cheered and waved Placards of support for the NDP.

Douglas blasted the use of injunctions to break strikes and jail union leaders. He pledged that the NDP would end the use of such injunctions and would oppose compulsory arbitration and the restrictive legislation now proposed in several provinces and in the federal Parliament.

"The trade union movement ought not to be fragmented," Douglas declared. "Legally it ought to be allowed to be strong and united to meet international corporations on an equal footing."

Politics Stressed

Douglas stressed labor's self-interest in politics, telling the delegates that the government could, "with a stroke of the pen," wipe out gains won at the bargaining table.

After hearing Douglas, the delegates adopted a CLC policy statement on political education which said "the main task now is to raise the New Democratic Party from the role of opposition to the role of government."

The policy statement said the CLC Executive Council should set up machinery for continuous liaison with the NDP on policy matters. It strongly urged the officers of all unions to encourage local unions to affiliate to the NDP. It called on all labor councils and provincial federations to organize political educational conferences. And it urged union members to become active members of NDP.

While the political session generated an exuberant demonstration the most important work carried out by the convention was the modernization of the CLC based on the recommendations of its Commission on Constitution & Structure following a two-year study.

Council Enlarged

The major changes approved by the convention expanded the CLC Executive Council from the present 21 members to 30, encouraged the merger of unions to reduce the number of affiliates, moved towards greater Canadian autonomy by providing authority for trade departments tied to the CLC rather than the AFL-CIO, dropped the specific ban against communist unions while retaining a general prohibition against those under "totalitarian" domination, adopted a code of ethical practices, and set up a procedure for dealing with internal disputes.

On labor unity, the report declared there was a place for both national and international unions. The international unions have been a "handy target" for those seeking to divide the labor movement, the report noted.

Some 70 percent of Canadian union members are in international unions, the report said, observing this "is unique, but it is effective." Canadian labor can meet the demands of international union solidarity and Canadian autonomy "without becoming schizophrenic," it added.

The report said the relationship between the CLC and the AFL-CIO, "it should be made clear, is a fraternal, not a structural relationship."

Unity Stressed

Under unity, the report also said it was a fundamental aim of labor to help achieve a united Canada and to work towards a completely united labor movement.

Touching on a very sore internal problem, the report said the CLC should intensify its efforts to improve the bicultural and bilingual nature of all its operations and those of its affiliates. French-speaking segments of labor have complained of being ignored or shortchanged on services.

Related to this was an attempt by the 200,000-member Quebec Federation of Labor to win greater autonomy by having all CLC regional functions transferred to the provinces. After a bitter debate, the French-speaking delegates lost their bid for decentralization. The CLC has a total of 300,000 members in the Province of Quebec.

On an issue which united the delegates in anger, the convention unanimously approved a resolution condemning a bill being pressed by the Trudeau Government to amend the Industrial Relations & Disputes Investigation Act, Canada's counterpart of the Wagner Act. The original aim of the bill, C-186, was to accord representation on government boards to the independent 200,000-member Confederation of National Trade Unions, a Quebec-centered group. But the bill, which the Liberal Government says it will reintroduce if reelected, has been expanded and the government has prepared compulsory arbitration guidelines in anticipation of passage.

CLC Pres. MacDonald attacked C-186 in his keynote to the convention as "one of the most flagrant and unabashed pieces of political patronage ever devised."

The principles in C-186 rest on the propositions, MacDonald said, "that national bargaining units should be broken up; that regional disparities in wages should be entrenched; that seniority systems should be destroyed; and that workers should be divided not on the basis of their trade or their industry, but on the basis of the language which they speak or the province or region in which they reside."

In a statement on economic policy, the CLC pointed to a jobless rate of 4.1 percent for 1967 and called for job-creating policies by government to achieve and maintain full employment.

The CLC rejected the idea of proposed wage guidelines linked to productivity and demanded an "incomes policy." It also called for creation of an agency for economic planning, reform of the tax system and increased control by Canada over the Canadian economy as recommended in a recent government study.

Foreign Affairs

The convention also adopted an international affairs policy calling on Canada to steer an independent course in foreign affairs. The statement said "the Congress believes that we may be on the threshold of one of the great periodic historical realignments, caused by shifting national and international loyalties, by the new developments in weaponry and by the exigencies of world economic and political conditions."

The convention also approved a resolution calling for an effective international agreement to ban nuclear tests and guard against the proliferation of nuclear weapons. It said labor recognizes that Canada requires, in the absence of world controls on disarmament, an up-to-date non-nuclear military force useful to itself and the United Nations.

Youth Is Key to Future Of Unionism, CLC Told

Toronto—Youth is the key to the future of the labor movements in Canada and the United States, Howard Coughlin told the Canadian Labor Congress convention here.

Coughlin, president of the Office & Professional Employes, addressed the 2,000 delegates as a fraternal delegate from the AFL-CIO.

Coughlin pointed to the idealism of today's younger generation as evidenced by their involvement in the Peace Corps and in civil rights work. The labor movement "must have meaningful dialogue and communication with them," he added.

Coughlin reminded the delegates of the changing character of the workforce as well as its younger average age. He said OPEIU recently negotiated a contract for 1,200 bank workers in Quebec and found their average age was just under 21.

The labor movement must convince the young people in the workforce that its broad aims are worthy of support and both the economic and political strength of labor will be increased, Coughlin said.

Lord Wright and George Lowthian also addressed the convention as fraternal delegates of the British Trades Union Congress.

Lord Wright told the delegates that, although the TUC is celebrating its 100th anniversary, it is facing up to complex modern problems. He explained the TUC quest for a fair income policy whereby unions might achieve an advance in real wages without adding to a price rise.

Lowthian described labor's role in Britain's National Economic Development Council. This type of planning, he said, requires fresh attitudes on the part of trade unionists. It involves a give and take with employers and the government which is an extension of labor's bargaining experience.

Convention Action:

Service Employes Vote Dues Increase

By Duane Emme

Delegates to the Service Employes 14th convention in Washington took steps to strengthen their union, tighten its ties to the labor movement and fortify it for challenges ahead.

The convention changed SEIU's dues structure to provide more funds for expanded organizing and collective bargaining efforts and to meet higher costs.

The per capita tax was raised from 70 to 80 cents per month, effective Jan. 1, 1969, and minimum local dues were increased from $3 to $4 a month, effective on the same date.

The delegates also approved a constitutional amendment that increased the number of the union's vice presidents from six to seven and enlarged SEIU's executive board from eight to 14 members.

A third constitutional change called for local unions to affiliate "with the city or local central bodies and state federations, where such exist" and also to form into "joint councils."

Sullivan Re-elected

SEIU Pres. David Sullivan, re-elected to another four-year term, concluded the four-day convention by stressing that labor must help workers to secure "jobs, opportunities for a better life and full and equal rights."

"We in SEIU," Sullivan added, "are not going to sit still as long as that obligation exists."

The convention adopted a resolution "wholeheartedly" supporting the "Freedom Budget" proposed by AFL-CIO Vice Pres. A. Philip Randolph calling for broad action by Congress to create jobs and enact social legislation to aid slum residents.

This program, aimed at eliminating poverty in the next 10 years, "is essential to the preservation of a free and democratic society," the resolution said. It ordered a union-wide educational program on the Freedom Budget.

Another resolution noted that SEIU has "been in the forefront of the struggle for first class citizenship for all Americans" and called for a union effort toward the complete elimination of all forms of segregation.

Other resolutions urged passage of a strong gas pipeline safety bill, full voting rights for the District of Columbia, collective bargaining rights for government employes and an enlarged union research and education program.

Additional changes in the constitution clarified sections dealing with election of convention delegates, officers duties and a pension fund for employes of the union.

Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz told delegates the nation can no longer afford to accept statutes that deal with "the average," but now must "accept the concept of human potential as a measure of what it can do."

Health, Education & Welfare Sec. Wilbur J. Cohen pointed out that 1 million persons could be brought out of poverty by increasing social security benefits "and we can do that right away."

Assistant Sec. of Labor Thomas R. Donahue, a former assistant to the SEIU president, reminisced with delegates about his experiences in the government post, which he has held since March 1967.

Among speakers were two who served with Sullivan as U.S. observers to the elections in South Viet Nam last year—Executive Dir. Whitney M. Young, Jr., of the National Urban League and Dr. Edward L. R. Elson, pastor of National Presbyterian Church in Washington.

Guest Speakers

Other speakers included Prof. Eli Ginsberg of Columbia University, noted economist, New York City AFL-CIO Pres. Harry Van Arsdale and several AFL-CIO department heads: Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller, COPE Dir. Al Barkan, Organizing Dir. William L. Kircher, Civil Rights Dir. Donald Slaiman and Education Dir. Walter G. Davis.

Officers elected, in addition to Sullivan, were Sec.-Treas. George E. Fairchild; Vice Presidents George Hardy, San Francisco; Albert G. Hearn, Toronto; Arthur T. Hare, Seattle; Peter Ottley and Richard Cancellere, New York City; and Eugene P. Moats and John A. Coleman, Chicago.

Elected to the expanded board were Walter J. Butler, Syracuse; Henry Cambridge, New York City; John Sorbie, St. Louis; Richard W. Cordtz, Detroit; and Arman Jolicoeur, Montreal.

Matthew Guinan Wins Catholic Labor Award

New York, N.Y.—Pres. Matthew Guinan of the Transport Workers received the 1968 social action award of the Association of Catholic Trade Unionists at a dinner marking the 31st anniversary of ACTU's founding.

Guinan was honored for his long efforts to win social and economic justice for U.S. workers through a "militant and effective labor movement."

Pres. Johnson, Vice Pres. Hubert H. Humphrey, Pope Paul VI, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany and Sen. Robert J. Kennedy (D-N.Y.) sent greetings.

FOOD CARAVAN for 700 Anaconda Wire & Cable strikers at Hastings-on-Hudson, N.Y., started at Muncie, Ind., and reached journey's end more than 1,000 miles east after stops at union loading stations in Indiana, Michigan, Ohio, Pennsylvania and New Jersey. Top, members of the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers deliver canned food donated by workers and farmers at IUE Local 901 hall in Fort Wayne, Ind. Below, caravan drivers pick up more donations at midnight in Pittsburgh. Members of the National Farmers Organization, the Communications Workers, Steelworkers, Auto Workers, and AFL-CIO councils in Lima and Defiance, O., also rallied help for the workers in the 10th month of their strike for an acceptable contract.

Extremists Linked to False Leaflets Charging Threat to Social Security

The unsigned leaflet tacked to a factory's bulletin board warns of "a bill before Congress that would destroy the Social Security Act."

House Bill 5710, the anonymous circular declares, "already passed the House and is now in Senate hearing." It would enable "power-mad people . . . to get their hands on the billions of dollars in the social security program in order to dole it out to their political supporters."

Furthermore, the leaflet claims, this bill would enable some administrator to reduce the amount of a retired worker's social security benefit or eliminate it entirely if he decided "you did not need it."

It calls for "a flood of mail from all over the country" to "stop this outright steal."

Similar leaflets have popped up on bulletin boards in dozens of cities. All are unsigned, although the presumption is that they are the work of some extremist group along the lines of the John Birch Society.

The leaflets have prompted, if not "a flood of mail," at least puzzled queries to unions and congressmen.

The puzzlement is understandable.

No such bill to destroy the social security system has ever been introduced in Congress.

The bill number listed, H.R. 5710, is the one assigned early last year to Pres. Johnson's proposal for a substantial increase in social security benefits and extension of medicare to cover disabled workers under 65.

By no conceivable stretch of interpretation could the bill be described as doing any of the dire things the anonymous leaflets claim.

To labor's regret, the bill did not pass the House. Instead the House Ways & Means Committee substituted its own bill providing smaller benefits than the Administration had sought. It was this measure, with a different bill number, which passed the House and—after some modifications by the Senate—became law last year.

Year-old Canard

A New York Times article noted that the anonymous circular first started showing up on bulletin boards a year ago and so many queries were received that House Ways & Means Committee Chairman Wilbur D. Mills (D-Ark.) drafted a form letter of reply.

Mills, a conservative who did not support the Administration's original bill, nevertheless characterized the charges in the circular as "a complete misrepresentation" of the bill's provisions.

When the circulars began making their rounds again this year, Rep. Cornelius E. Gallagher (D-N. J.) said in a statement in the Congressional Record:

"The person or group that has initiated this false flyer has done a tremendous disservice and has succeeded in unnecessarily alarming many people. I cannot stress too strongly my distaste for anyone who would circulate such a gathering of lies. . . .

"There is absolutely no truth in the allegations made by the circular and, if anything, the flyer shows that whoever conceived it has absolutely no knowledge of the actual provisions of H.R. 5710 nor knowledge of the social security law. I personally have serious doubts whether the writer of the circular has any sense at all."

LABOR MUST HELP workers to secure "jobs, opportunities for a better life and full and equal rights," Service Employes Pres. David Sullivan tells delegates to SEIU's 14th convention in Washington. Among other actions, the convention changed the union's dues structure, added a new vice president's post and enlarged SEIU's executive board.

SENATE CONFIRMED Wilbur J. Cohen, an architect of the social security and medicare programs, as head of the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare. He recently received the AFL-CIO's Murray-Green community services award.

Cites Lack of Opportunity:

Abel Warns Senate On Needs of Jobless

Meaningful jobs must be found for the nation's hard-core unemployed before America's grave social problems can be solved, Steelworkers Pres. I. W. Abel told a Senate panel.

Abel, who served on the National Advisory Commission on Civil Disorders—the so-called riot commission—strongly supported legislation to create 2.4 million jobs over the next four years in both public and private employment.

The bill's chief sponsor is Sen. Joseph S. Clark, chairman of the Senate Labor subcommittee which is conducting the hearings.

Abel reminded the senators of the riot commission's warning that the nation is "moving toward two societies, one black, one white—separate and unequal."

Whether this is actually the case, Abel said, "depends a great deal upon the ability and the willingness of Congress to respond to these problems."

He noted the great legislative strides Congress has taken to assure equal rights, describing them as "great achievements . . . an indication that the political system is responsive and accomplishment of social justice is possible through the political process."

Now, he said, "we are at the same crossroad that many industrial workers were before the advent of unionism. Could a social democracy have any meaning without economic democracy?"

Abel told the subcommittee that "today our social institutions hold no meaning for many of the unemployed because the economic system is not providing them with the opportunity to be gainfully employed."

He called for "an aggressively expansionary fiscal policy" in creating job opportunities for the disadvantaged, with "increased spending in the public sector."

The Steelworkers president expressed concern at the deep spending cut proposed in Congress as a "price" for the tax increase.

"I wonder whether the price will, in reality, be heavier unemployment in our core cities," he said.

The priority of any jobs program, Abel urged, should be in line with the concept of the government as the employer of last resort.

"If a choice is to be made between the immediate creation of jobs in the public sector and a program to reimburse employers for training workers for entry-level jobs in the private sector, then the priority should be expressed in favor of job creation."

The jobs should not become dead-end opportunities, Abel said.

Earlier, the Clark subcommittee heard Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz endorse the goals of the legislation but question whether this Congress is willing "to pay the bill" for such a large-scale effort.

Wirtz noted that Congress cut last year's budget request for manpower programs and that "it takes a good deal of faith" to anticipate that it will approve the President's request this year for an increase in funds from $1.6 billion to $2.1 billion.

His "pragmatic judgment," Wirtz said, is that it would be more useful to press for needed expansion of existing programs than pursue goals Congress will not adopt.

"I think you are wrong," Clark replied to Wirtz. He urged the Administration to get behind the job bill and said billions of dollars could be cut from the military budget "and you would never know it was gone."

New Mexico Trades Sign Training Pact

Albuquerque, N.M. — A program through which the New Mexico Building & Construction Trades Council will train disadvantaged workers from minority groups for construction jobs has been approved by the Labor Dept.

The program, which is federally contracted for $45,400, was announced by the Albuquerque regional office of the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission, which developed it.

EEOC said that the project "envisions a cooperative training and placement effort by labor, management and minority group organizations" over the next year.

The American G.I. Forum, the League of United Latin American Citizens (LULAC) and the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People will be represented on an advisory committee to assist the council.

Sec.-Treas. James A. Price of the building trades council described the project as a "pilot program" to train at least 45 persons in job skills. "Building contractors will play an important role in the program," he added.

Viet Nam Needs Moral Support Of Latins, AIFLD Graduates Told

A milestone for the American Institute for Free Labor Development (AIFLD) was marked with graduation ceremonies for the 20th class of Latin American trade union leaders.

The 23 trade unionists from 14 Latin American countries heard a plea from Dr. Phan Quang Dan, leader of the Free Democratic Party of South Viet Nam, for "moral support" in his nation's battle for freedom.

Dr. Dan noted that the people of South Viet Nam and Latin America, while separated by thousands of miles, share a desire to rid the world of "colonialism and dictatorship."

"What happens in South America has tremendous impact in Southeast Asia," Dr. Dan told the graduates. "We need from you moral support—and we know we'll get it."

More than 600 men and women have received advanced training in the United States through the AIFLD program. They, in turn, have held classes for nearly 70,000 trade union members in their home countries.

AFL-CIO Vice Pres. David Dubinsky, honorary president of the Ladies' Garment Workers, told the class that "employers have learned they must have us, and we must have them. We have a harmony of interests."

Dubinsky said the intensive training received at the AIFLD's Front Royal (Va.) Institute will equip them to "make contributions now you were not able to make months ago.

"Serving the labor movement," he added, "is a cause, an ideal. To serve it well today requires intelligence and knowledge."

James Fowler, deputy U. S. coordinator for the Alliance for Progress, urged the students to study the laws of their land when they return, "so you can act in the legislative field.

"The problem you face is not as great as it appears when you feel you have the knowledge to face the task," he added.

He called upon the graduates to take the ideals of the Alliance for Progress to their countries, their cities and their hamlets.

"We are truly partners in this alliance," he said, "working together in North America and in South America to build a better world."

William C. Doherty Jr., AIFLD administrator, told the class that the United States has discovered "that if it were not for trade unions, there would be no sharing of wealth."

J. Peter Grace, AIFLD board chairman, said Latin American managements have "finally learned that unionism is fair, decent, necessary."

Unions, he said, "are the right way to let the worker protect his family."

Enrique Otero, a student from Argentina, told a dinner gathering that the class had established a permanent organization "to cooperate in all trade union programs to achieve economic integration in Latin America."

A parchment scroll was presented to AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany on behalf of the class by Luis Candelaria of Panama. AFL-CIO Vice Pres. James A. Suffridge, president of the Retail Clerks, accepted the scroll on behalf of Meany.

Nations represented in the class were Argentina, Bolivia, Chile, Colombia, Ecuador, El Salvador, Guatemala, Honduras, Mexico, Nicaragua, Panama, Peru, Uruguay and Venezuela.

5.8% Median Increase Marks '68 Settlements

Unions won contract settlements providing wage and fringe benefit increases of 5.5 to 7.5 percent for more than half of the 700,000 workers involved in negotiations in the first quarter of 1968, the Labor Dept. said in a report on major collective bargaining agreements.

The department's Bureau of Labor Statistics estimated that the median increase negotiated in the copper, can, glass, farm equipment, transportation and other industries was 5.8 percent a year—an increase of two-tenths of 1 percent over the first quarter of 1967—when actual timing of wage and other benefit changes was taken into account.

Considering wage rates alone, increases over the entire contract term averaged 5.6 percent of straight-time average hourly earnings annually, compared with 5 percent for the full year 1967.

Estimating first-year changes only, unions negotiated a median increase of 7.4 percent of straight-time average hourly earnings, according to BLS. The comparative figure was 5.7 percent for the full year 1967, BLS reported.

First-year changes registered a median increase of 7.4 percent for manufacturing alone, compared with 6.4 percent for all of 1967. The first-year median increase in nonmanufacturing was 7.7 percent, compared with 5 percent in 1967.

The report noted that settlements in various metalworking industries, farm equipment, and transportation accounted for 60 percent of all workers covered by major agreements reached during the quarter.

The largest single settlement, affecting nearly 150,000 members of the Railway Clerks, provided wage increases of 7.7 percent in the first contract year, BLS reported.

For the purpose of its periodic surveys, BLS defines major agreements as those covering 1,000 or more workers.

8-Year Campaign Won For Truth-in-Lending Law

Bill to Aid Consumers Is Enacted

By David L. Perlman

Congress gave final approval to a truth-in-lending bill which will require stores and moneylenders to tell consumers in simple, easy-to-compare terms what they are paying in credit charges and interest.

After an eight-year campaign, in which unions had a major role, final passage came with amazing ease.

It cleared both the House and Senate by voice vote and was sent to the White House for Pres. Johnson's certain approval. The President had called for passage of the legislation at every session of Congress during his Administration.

Former Sen. Paul H. Douglas (D-Ill.), who initiated the concept of truth-in-lending and first sponsored the bill back in 1960, told the AFL-CIO News its passage was "a great victory for the people."

Douglas praised Sen. William Proxmire (D-Wis.) and Rep. Leonor K. Sullivan (D-Mo.), the floor managers of the legislation, "for the way they steered the bill through in a strong and improved form."

And it was the trade union movement, Douglas said, lining up behind the bill, "which gave it mass support and helped to finally put it over."

For this support from union members who wrote letters, passed resolutions and lobbied for the bill, Douglas added, "we are eternally grateful."

AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller noted that Douglas "led the lonely fight for many years" and termed the legislation a "monument" to his efforts. He joined in thanking Mrs. Sullivan and Proxmire for leading "this year's successful battle" to bring to

High Court OK's Store Picketing

By John R. Oravec

The Supreme Court has ruled that privately-owned shopping centers can't bar peaceful picketing by unions. It overturned a Pennsylvania court decision which had barred the Meat Cutters from picketing a non-union store.

In a 6-3 decision, the high court held that freedom of speech was violated by not allowing the pickets to march at the center.

The decision also means that states no longer can enforce "no-trespassing" laws to stop unions from picketing business places in shopping centers.

Privately-owned shopping centers are in practice public thoroughfares—much like downtown business districts, the Supreme Court ruled in its majority opinion by Justice Thurgood Marshall.

"Business enterprises located in downtown areas would be subject to on-the-spot public criticism for their practices, but businesses situated in the suburbs could largely immunize themselves from similar criticism by creating a cordon sanitaire of parking lots around their stores," should a contrary decision prevail, Marshall said.

A Public Place

In essence, this means that a shopping center is no less a public place than a street.

However, the opinion did not say that the picketing could not be regulated—only that it may not be forbidden.

The case arose over picketing in 1965 by Local 590 of the Meat Cutters, Pittsburgh, of a Weis Markets, Inc., store in the Logan Valley Mall shopping center near Altoona, Pa.

The pickets carried signs saying the market was non-union and that its employes were not receiving union wages or other benefits.

Weis Markets and Logan Valley Mall obtained an injunction from Blair County Common Pleas Court to prohibit the union from picketing and trespassing on the shopping center. In effect, it forced the pickets to march on public roads outside the center.

The Pennsylvania Supreme Court upheld the injunction order. By a divided vote, it found pickets were trespassing.

The AFL-CIO filed a friend-of-the-court brief last January urging a reversal of the Pennsylvania state court order. It stated that the shopping center case was

Record High Agreement:

125,000 Clothing Workers Win Pay Hike Totaling 57.5c

New York—Wage increases totaling 57.5 cents an hour over a three-year period—$23 a week—were won by the Clothing Workers for more than 125,000 makers of men's and boys' clothing in a new agreement with the Clothing Manufacturers Association.

The settlement goes into effect June 1. The wage hike was described by ACWA Pres. Jacob S. Potofsky and Sec.-Treas. Frank Rosenblum as the largest ever negotiated in the industry. In addition, the contract provides big improvements in health and welfare benefits, more vacation and life insurance gains, upgraded pension payments for many workers and an industry-wide educational scholarship fund.

The agreement, negotiated here, affects workers in New York City and Rochester, N.Y.; Chicago, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Boston, Cleveland, St. Louis, Eastern Pennsylvania, Southern California, in Maryland, Virginia and scattered locations in other southern states.

In announcing the settlement, the two top officers of the 400,000-member union said it is "far and away the best contract in the history of the ACWA" which "eclipses all previous gains" in agreements with the manufacturers' association.

They said "we are delighted that Amalgamated members are able to share in these sharply advanced benefits, which will produce significant raises in their standard of living." They expressed satisfaction at being able to negotiate the settlement without resorting to a strike.

In addition to the pay hikes—25 cents an hour this year and two additional yearly raises of 17.5 and 15 cents—the contract provides improved minimum classifications, or salary scales, for each time-work category in the industry.

A major innovation is full hospitalization in semi-private rooms for employes and their dependents—a substantial improvement over the former maximum payment by the employer of $33 a day.

Other significant gains included a new category of payments for in-hospital, non-surgical care; a higher scale of payments for incidental hospital costs and for surgical and maternity care; a raise from $50 to $60 a week for each person in maximum disability payments, with every worker entitled to benefits in each category used.

Vacation benefits were improved, and life insurance benefits raised 50 percent. Employes retiring after 20 years of service at age 65 may draw, besides $75 a month plus social security payments, these additional benefits:

- An increase in pension payments for each year of employment over 20.
- An additional boost reflecting individual earnings.

The new agreement authorizes steps toward an educational scholarship fund under which sons and daughters of eligible clothing workers may draw benefits "by right rather than by specific need" for partial payment of costs at institutions of higher learning.

The ACWA officers said that, while many locals have established scholarship funds keyed either to merit or need, the new concept of scholarship payments by right to any student at an accredited institution above the high school level will be a "first" for the men's clothing industry.

Galloping Profits Run Higher Than Expected

By Duane Emme

Corporate profits soared to a record annual rate of $88.8 billion, before taxes, in the first quarter of 1968—a pace higher than was previously predicted, according to the Commerce Dept.

Meanwhile, Standard & Poor's, a leading investment advisory firm, has thrown further light on the methods used by corporations to duck normal taxes on their profits.

In its regular quarterly report, the Commerce Dept. said the $88.8 billion profit rate was $3.7 billion above the previous high in the fourth quarter of 1967. It was the third straight quarterly advance in profits.

By way of comparison, the Treasury Dept. previously estimated that corporate profits, before taxes, would run at a rate of $87 billion for all of 1968. Thus, the rate is running about $1.8 billion above expectations.

The first quarter advance, the Commerce Dept. noted, prevailed in all types of operations but centered in manufacturing and finance. Auto profits rose sharply.

The after-tax corporate profits for the first quarter were estimated by the department at $52.5 billion at an annual rate. This would

Dirksen Told Safety Issue Is Human Life

Human life, not states' rights, is the key issue in the job safety and health bill before Congress, a coalition of organizations supporting the legislation told Senate Republican Leader Everett McKinley Dirksen.

Dirksen announced he is strongly opposed to the bill, which he claimed would give "unprecedented" powers to the Secretary of Labor.

"I'm not about to take it without a fight," he told newsmen after

Carpenters to Train 800 Jobless Youth

More than 800 unemployed young Americans, many of them school dropouts and ghetto residents, are going to get a chance to become "builders" through a program launched by the Carpenters.

The youths will be trained at 14 Job Corps centers in as many states over a 12-month period under a contract entered into between the union and the Office of Economic Opportunity.

Carpenters' Pres. M. A. Hutcheson and Vice Pres. Finlay C. Allan, director of the union's training activities, outlined the program during a ceremony at the Carpenters' headquarters in Washington.

Leaders Participate

Participants included Agriculture Sec. Orville L. Freeman, Sen. Jennings Randolph (D-W. Va.), Job Corps Dir. William P. Kelly, Forest Service Chief Edward P. Cliff and Julius Rothman, AFL-CIO anti-poverty coordinator.

The program gets underway June 3 at three sites—Five Mile Center, Calif., Camp Timber Lake, Ore. and Camp Anthony, W. Va., where 180 youths will receive training. The contracts authorize $300,000 for the training program at these sites.

Union instructors and coordinators at these three camps, operated by the Forest Service under the Agriculture Dept., were brought into Washington for a week of orientation and training.

Seven other centers will begin programs in July, the balance later in the year.

Work training at the centers will consist mostly of erecting recreation facilities in national forests and parks. OEO will recruit trainees for all camps. The Carpenters will furnish books and teaching aids in addition to instructors.

Hutcheson said that Corpsmen who show aptitude will be guided into the union's own apprentice training program and will be placed, whenever possible, in programs in or near their home towns.

In voicing the union's pride in participating in the program, he described it as "one more example of the trade union movement working for the good of the entire nation."

In their talks at the ceremony, Freeman, Randolph and Kelly hailed the union's role in training the young men so that they might acquire skills that benefit not only themselves but the entire nation.

Change Urged In Act Barring Product Funds

Passage of legislation allowing labor and management to agree to jointly administered "trade and industry" product promotions has been urged by the AFL-CIO.

The bill would allow, but not require, labor and management to negotiate contributions to trust funds to defray the cost and expenses of such programs, Andrew J. Biemiller, director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Legislation said.

He expressed the federation's support in a letter ot Sen. Ralph W. Yarborough (D-Tex.), chairman of the Senate Labor subcommittee which is considering the proposal.

The bill would amend a section of the 1947 Labor-Management Relations Act which prohibits all payments by employers to union representatives except payments to specific employer-supported funds such as health and welfare plans, Biemiller explained.

"This prohibition is aimed at preventing employer bribery, extortion, shakedowns and other corrupt practices," he added. He said it was "at least questionable" that Congress, in adopting the section, intended to bar joint labor-management industry promotion funds.

These programs expand business and employment, he added.

'Smorgasbord in Culture':

Labor Widens Role In Arts Programs

New York City—The AFL-CIO pilot program to increase the tempo of labor's activities in the graphic and performing arts was kicked off during two days of sessions in this, the culture capital of the nation.

New York City Central Labor Council Pres. Harry Van Arsdale said "I hope more and more of our members and their families will be able to take part in the arts and cultures through this program."

The central body here has 1.2 million members in 580 affiliated locals.

"We feel this program is very vital to the community," Van Arsdale added.

This city is one of four selected areas across the nation for the two-year AFL-CIO demonstration arts project. Programs are now under way in Minneapolis and in Louisville, Ky. The Buffalo, N. Y., federation will launch its arts' action plan in June.

AFL-CIO Vice Pres. Herman D. Kenin, president of the Musicians and also president of the Council of AFL-CIO Unions for Scientific, Professional & Cultural Employes (SPACE), which is directly aiding in the program, said that leisure time for workers is both here and growing.

"Our goal is to make available to our members in their leisure time the quality life found in the arts and in cultural activities," he added.

AFL-CIO Community Services Activities Dir. Leo Perlis told gatherings of union leaders and representatives of many leading New York arts and culture groups that "the AFL-CIO feels the time is ripe for involvement in community arts and cultural life."

He said the AFL-CIO "can not impose arts and culture on its members, and we don't want to. But we can present them with smorgasbord and encourage them to taste what they think they would like."

He noted that unions in New York City had a long history of working on various projects involving the theater and other arts areas. This, he said, would be an asset to the pilot program in which all unions will be asked to become involved.

John W. Mazzola, of the Lincoln Center for the Performing Arts, pointed out that Van Arsdale—as a member of the Lincoln Center board—has brought a number of the Center's productions to the community of Electchester, the IBEW Local 3 housing project.

Jack Golodner, executive secretary of SPACE, said success in the demonstration program could provide an attraction in attempts to organize the young, well educated white collar and technical workers.

"Whether our unions are to grow depends on organizing the white collar worker on the one hand and, on the other hand, the lowest paid workers," Van Arsdale noted. "You can count on our support in this program in the future."

Jewelry Union Plans Organizing Step Up

San Juan, P.R.—An emphasis on organizing, adoption of constitutional changes and the election of a new president highlighted sessions of the Jewelry Workers' 18th triennial convention here.

Delegates adopted an organizing program calling for "intensive" efforts to recruit new union members, particularly in the New England area, where there is a large concentration of jewelry workers.

Amendments to the constitution, approved unanimously, dealt mainly with enlarging the document's application to locals and with updating sections that have not been changed for many years.

Leon Sverdlove, head of the union's Local 1, New York, was elected president and secretary-treasurer of the 14,000-member union, succeeding Harry Spodick, who announced he would not seek re-election prior to the convention.

Sverdlove was unopposed for the top office and his election was unanimous. At the urging of delegates, Spodick accepted nomination for one of the vice president posts and was elected.

Vice Presidents Elected

Among 14 other candidates seeking the ten remaining vice president positions, the following were elected: John Calamoneri, and Oscar Fuss, Los Angeles; Benny Sher, Morris Kaplan and Mack Young, New York; William Lennon, Chicago; Charles Rogan, Wallingford, Conn.; John Stofer, Indianapolis; Elliott Chase, Newburyport, Mass. and Thomas DeAngelis, Providence, R.I.

All are incumbents except Sher and Chase. They succeed to vacancies left by Ernest Dandrow, who was defeated in the election, and Joseph Mulvey, who did not seek re-election.

In accepting leadership in the union, Sverdlove called upon members and officers to close ranks "in the spirit of unity needed to expand and strengthen our union."

In other actions, the convention:

- Urged an increase in the federal minimum wage to $2.50 an hour from the present $1.60.
- Called upon Congress to enact truth-in-lending legislation, expanded aid to education and measures to strengthen civil rights.
- Adopted resolutions supporting the union label, proposing shorter working hours, advocating generic names for prescription drugs and seeking an investigation of auto insurance rates.

Speakers included Puerto Rico Sec. of Labor Alfred Nazario, Pres. Hipolito Marcano of the Puerto Rico AFL-CIO, AFL-CIO Regional Director Clifford Depin and AFL-CIO Community Services Dir. Leo Perlis.

Human Life Is Issue in Job Safety, Committee Retorts to Sen. Dirksen

a meeting of the Senate GOP Policy Committee.

The Joint Committee on Occupational Health & Safety, with which the AFL-CIO is affiliated, retorted that Dirksen's charge of a federal power grab "is just not true."

William R. Hutton, secretary of the joint committee, expressed "keen disappointment" at Dirksen's assessment of the legislation.

"The issue before Congress is human life," said Hutton. "Each day wasted in windy debate means 55 Americans will die as a result of occupational accidents and disease. Every working day without adequate safety and health standards means that 8,500 men and women will be disabled and 27,200 will be injured."

Dirksen's attack on the bill came on the heels of a wild-swinging scare campaign launched by the U.S. Chamber of Commerce.

The chamber's magazine carried an article claiming that the government would use hard-core unemployed as safety inspectors and give them power to padlock shops and factories because of alleged safety violations.

Hutton, in his statement for the coalition of some 20 organizations, said the real facts are that "the American worker is involved in a tragic, unseen, unpublicized, undeclared war against industrial accidents and disease."

In a single year, he said, this war "will maim or injure one out of every 10 working men and women . . . cost us $7 billion and, more poignantly, over 14,000 human lives."

He retorted to Dirksen that federal legislation is needed because the states have failed to provide adequate laws and enforcement. In Dirksen's own state of Illinois, Hutton noted, there are more fish and game wardens than safety inspectors.

Msgr. George C. Higgins, social action director of the U.S. Catholic Conference, is director of the Joint Committee on Occupational Health & Safety. Dr. Lorin E. Kerr, president of the Group Health Association of America, is co-director.

In addition to the AFL-CIO and international unions, the organizations represented on the joint committee include the American Nurses Association, Blue Cross Association, Citizens Crusade Against Poverty, Consumer Federation of America, Day Care & Child Development Council of America, Group Health Association of America, National Consumers League, National Council of Catholic Nurses, National Council of Catholic Women, Council of Catholic Men, National Council of Negro Women, National Council of Senior Citizens, National Education Association, National Farmers Union, U.S. Catholic Conference Social Action Dept., Union of American Hebrew Congregations, and Young Women's Christian Association.

N. Y. State Labor Asks Veto of 'Loyalty Bill'

Albany—The New York State AFL-CIO has urged Gov. Nelson A. Rockefeller to veto a "loyalty bill" that would disqualify anyone from public office who has participated in alleged "subversive activities."

State Pres. Raymond Corbett said the bill is a revival of the "shameful era of witch hunts and guilt by association."

ILGWU Sweeps Vote:

Selma Women Win Union Recognition

Selma, Ala.—Some 300 determined women have won a fierce 10-month battle for union recognition.

The women, employes of Laura Industries here, voted 297 to 6 for the Ladies Garment Workers as their bargaining representative in an election held by the National Labor Relations Board.

News of the election's outcome quickly spread through Selma, the scene of historic civil rights confrontations, then into other parts of Alabama and neighboring states.

The Alabama AFL-CIO hailed the result as a "rousing victory" for labor due mainly to "the dedication and unity of a fine group of workers."

The women, mostly Negro, struck the Laura plant last Aug. 3 after being frustrated for months by the employer in their effort to secure union recognition.

ILGWU describes the firm, which makes raincoats under a Defense Dept. contract, as one in which most workers receive only the federal minimum wage, there is no premium pay for holiday work and employes are "publicly" fired by announcement over the plant's public address system.

The striking women quickly got support from other unions and the civil rights movement. In September, 1967, nearly 1,000 persons attended a rally at Brown's Chapel—the church made famous as the command post for the 1966 civil rights march through Alabama.

The rally not only pledged solid backing for the ILGWU but served as the "starting point" for a major union organizing drive throughout Dallas County.

When workers gathered outside the plant, the employer went outside with an appeal for them to return to their jobs. The answer was a chorus from a famed union song, "Roll the Union On."

But later, the union said "the strike appeared to be a losing cause after the mayor of Selma rushed to the aid of the struck firm . . . by proclaiming virtual martial law in the vicinity of the plant."

"Despite the fact that strikers had been peaceful and orderly," ILGWU's newspaper, Justice, pointed out, "Selma policemen turned out in force to harass and jail them."

However, the women stood firm and ILGWU Pres. Louis Stulberg and ILGWU Vice Pres. William Ross were able to interest the Villager, a national garment firm, in opening a Selma operation.

The Villager began hiring employes in Selma, with the attraction of better conditions and freedom to organize.

The Laura firm then agreed to an NLRB election. It was held on May 10, only a few hours after the new-established Villager plant also had a secret-ballot union representation election. The vote there was 51 to 0 for ILGWU.

The simultaneous campaigns at the two Selma companies were conducted by committees of workers assisted by ILGWU Southeast Regional Dir. Martin Morand and organizers Dorothy Mimms, Rebecca Frazier, Marvanell Childress and Spurgeon Griggs.

The union announced that it now is looking forward to starting contract talks at both The Villager and Laura.

REPRESENTATIVES of some 50 AFL-CIO unions participated in a founding meeting of a new Conference of Transportation Trades in Washington. Pres. C. L. Dennis of the Railway & Airline Clerks, right, and AFL-CIO Maritime Trades Dept. Administrator William Moody explain the purpose of the organization to a news conference. They were elected chairman and secretary-treasurer, respectively.

Transportation Unions Form New Conference

Representatives of some 50 AFL-CIO unions with more than 2.5 million members in all areas of the nation's transportation industry met in Washington and formed a new Conference of Transportation Trades.

Goals of the organization were outlined by Pres. C. L. Dennis of the Railway & Airline Clerks at a press briefing following the organizational meeting attended by more than 90 leaders of the various unions.

Dennis, who proposed the conference idea in an address to the 1967 convention of the AFL-CIO Maritime Trades Dept., was elected conference chairman. Maritime Trades Administrator William Moody was elected secretary-treasurer.

The new conference, Dennis said, "will serve as a clearing house on ideas" in transportation and "deal with issues and problems which affect workers in every segment of the industry."

The conference, he added, "is founded on a firm belief that the knowledge and experience of any one transportation union should be shared with all other transportation unions."

Member unions, will coordinate their efforts in helping each other in the legislative and political fields, in securing safety measures, and in advancing views to the Dept. of Transportation, Dennis said.

He also foresaw the conference as an instrument in helping to set standards of protective conditions for employes who are affected by mergers within the industry, as well as in assisting mergers of transportation unions.

The conference is composed of six sections, with each section made up of unions with representation under its title. The sections are marine, highway and transit, airline, railroad operating employes, rail non-operating employers and a general transportation section.

Each section will meet separately within the next two months and elect a chairman. The section chairmen, along with Dennis and Moody will then comprise the organization's executive committee. All unions will be represented on a general board.

The only dues levied to date, Dennis explained, was a flat $25 affiliation fee for each union that participates in the organization. Possible per capita dues will be "worked out" at a later meeting.

The conference will have temporary headquarters in Washington at the Railroad Labor Building, 400 First St. N.W. Dennis said that a second meeting of the conference will be held within the next 60 days.

Agents United In Walkout at Metropolitan

Picket lines were holding firm in the strike of 7,000 Metropolitan Life Insurance Co. agents as the Insurance Workers rallied 18,000 other members to support the strikers, out since May 20 for better wages.

IWIU Pres. William A. Gillen called on all nonstriking members to donate $5 a week while the emergency lasts.

Noting that the walkout is nearly 100 percent effective, Gillen said more than half the union's Metropolitan agents are new union members walking their first picket line. Many joined IWIU in recent years when the union won 139 National Labor Relations Board elections following a long legal fight for the right to have elections.

Picket lines went up May 20 at nearly 500 Metropolitan district offices in more than 100 cities in 18 states—California, Connecticut, Delaware, Illinois, Indiana, Iowa, Kentucky, Maryland, Massachusetts, Michigan, Missouri, New Hampshire, New Jersey, New York, Ohio, Pennsylvania, Rhode Island and West Virginia.

A bargaining committee headed by IWIU Vice Pres. Robert L. Ponsi was offered improved contract benefits by Metropolitan May 3 but members rejected the offer, 3,186-2,675. The strike, authorized previously by a 20-1 margin, followed.

The company had offered wage increases of $13 a week over a three-year period; a maintenance of membership clause, the units first breakthrough toward union security; and increases in agents' expense allowances and commissions.

The major unsettled issue is wages, Gillen said.

Last fall the union called off a two-day work stoppage after winning better contract terms from the Prudential Insurance Co. for 17,000 agents in 35 states and the District of Columbia.

Crucible Steel Ups Pay —10 Cents for Openers

Midland, Pa.—Crucible Steel Corp. raised wages immediately 10 cents an hour for 11,000 Steelworkers and agreed to match wages and working conditions that are eventually ironed out by USWA in industry-wide negotiations. Talks are scheduled to start June 3.

The interim agreement was called by the union a "down payment" on a final contract settlement. Crucible management agreed to pay workers an additional 5 cents an hour after July 31 if Big Steel has not settled by then. Also it agreed to meet other terms in the major steel settlement.

Crucible started bargaining with the Steelworkers last December, four months in advance of other producers. Its announcement of the settlement called it a "no strike" agreement. The union issued no statement but confirmed the wage figures.

A Crucible spokesman gave these reasons for the advance agreement: increasing competition from imports, especially stainless steel from Japan; stabilizing production by spreading orders over a calendar year instead of a prestrike period; the fact that Crucible is a specialty steel producer serving a different market and using different raw materials—nickel, chrome and stainless steel scrap.

The spokesman asked: "We're willing to pay our people what the rest of the industry gets, so why should they have to strike to get it?"

Crucible is the nation's biggest specialty steel company in terms of tons produced.

Meanwhile USWA confined its talks with major steel producers to local issues. Negotiations moved from plant-level meetings to the company-level May 15, with any unresolved local issues to be discussed later at the industry-wide level.

Local problems include contracting out of work, job safety, work schedules, work clothing, allocation of overtime, incentive plans and employe parking facilities.

Negotiations also are going forward with major aluminum firms whose contracts covering more than 50,000 workers have a May 31 expiration date. Besides USWA, the Aluminum Workers and Auto Workers are involved in the talks.

Oil Workers Back Poor Campaign

The Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers voted its official endorsement to the Poor Poeple's Campaign and a donation to the Southern Christian Leadership Conference.

The OCAW executive board passed a resolution endorsing the demonstration after OCAW Pres. A. F. Grospiron toured Resurrection City and reported back to the board on what he had seen.

The resolution said: "We find that although the Poor People's Campaign (like all human efforts) may have its flaws, it is essentially a proper and justified effort on the part of oppressed people to secure a better way of life through joint action."

Musicians Merge Two More Locals

Bridgeport, Conn. — Musicians' Pres. Herman D. Kenin announced the merger of AFM Locals 63 and 549 here and predicted that the union's program of integrating all locals will be completed in "a matter of months."

Pres. Matthew DelPercio of Local 63 becomes head of the new organization, Local 63-549. Haywood D. Clarke, formerly president of Local 549, assumes the post of administrative vice president, and Sec. C. Ray Ellis becomes a member of the executive board. The consolidation also provides for an additional delegate to the AFM convention.

Kenin noted that since 1954 AFM locals in 44 cities have been integrated through merger, leaving only 14 jurisdictions where separate locals remain to be unified.

NLRB Workload Up 9% in First Quarter

The steadily rising load of election petitions and unfair labor practice charges filed with the National Labor Relations Board increased another 9 percent in the first quarter of 1968, the board said in a quarterly report.

Agency offices received 7,886 new cases from January through March. These include 4,499 unfair practice charges—a rise of more than 5 percent over the previous quarter—and 3,388 petitions for employe elections, up more than 10 percent.

More than 67 percent of the unfair practice charges were filed against employers and the remainder against unions—3,017 charges to 1,482—to continue a long-time trend.

The report accented recent testimony by labor witnesses before a Senate subcommittee that the board needs help in meeting its "almost crushing" load of cases, and a report by NLRB General Counsel Arnold Ordman that future budget cuts, and loss of staff to less burdened agencies, threaten longer delays in already protracted NLRB processes.

Ordman reported that in fiscal 1967, the filing of new cases set an all-time record during a period when field staff increased at a much slower rate than cases; when the NLRB had a 13.2 percent turnover among professional employes, and when problems were aggravated by a four-month ban on any new hiring.

The 3,388 requests filed for employe elections compared with 2,981 received in the preceding quarter and the 3,784 filed in the same quarter a year ago.

The NLRB conducted 1,737 collective bargaining elections during the quarter, and 88 percent of eligible employes voted. AFL-CIO unions won bargaining rights in 632 elections of the 1,188 in which they were on the ballot, for a margin of 53.2 percent. Unaffiliated unions won 354 of 673 elections for a mark of 52.5 percent.

The NLRB general counsel's office issued 472 formal complaints during the quarter. Trial examiners conducted 246 hearings while the five NLRB members issued decisions in 223 unfair practice cases.

As of Mar. 31, 653 cases awaited a decision by board members—an increase over the 641 cases pending Jan. 1, 1968 and 644 cases pending on Mar. 31 a year ago.

At quarter's end, 10,488 cases of all types awaited disposition by board members or employes, compared with 10.336 pending at the end of the previous quarter and 10,698 cases in the "works" a year ago.

The Hidden Profits

THE FABULOUS PROFITS racked up by American corporations in the first three months of 1968 are misleading. Not that they don't actually exist and will continue to break all known records. It's simply that the figures actually understate the wealth that the corporations are reaping and that they are therefore paying less taxes on their earnings.

The first quarter of 1968 produced a rate of after-tax profits 12 percent above the same period in 1967 and 95 percent higher than in 1960. That's how the Commerce Dept. figures it in its official report.

Most of the higher profits come from increased sales and a larger profit margin on each item. But a goodly part comes from special tax-breaks from the federal government—depletion allowances, tax credits for investment in new equipment and carry-forward losses from previous years.

But by comparison with earlier years—especially before 1962—profits are substantially understated. Year-to-year comparisons of business profits are inaccurate because of changes in government regulations on the depreciation of plants and equipment.

In the April issue of the Survey of Current Business published by the Commerce Dept. the point is made that changes in write-off methods resulted in somewhere between $60 and $86 billion in additional depreciation in the period 1941-1966.

In the five years 1962-66, when reported profits before taxes skyrocketed from $55.4 billion to $83.8 billion, even these reports were understated by between $30 to $40 billion because of fast write-offs under changed depreciation rules.

The changes in government depreciation regulations in 1954 and again in 1962 provide distinct advantages to the corporations: reported profits are reduced, taxes on the reported profits are less and the flow of cash available to the company is increased.

The Commerce study puts it this way:

"Corporate profits before taxes, at about $80 billion in 1966, were from $6.5 billion to $9 billion less than they would have been in the absence of the changes in depreciation practices."

This means that in addition to the understatement of reported profits, there was a drop off of $3 to $4 billion in corporate income taxes paid—all because of the fast write-offs.

It all adds up to the fact that not only are corporations racking up tremendous profits but that the figures are even better than they look.

Thought for This Week

THE U.S. CHAMBER OF COMMERCE has been leading the pack yelping for labor "reform" that would cripple and weaken unions. One of its demands is for curbs on industrywide bargaining with an insistence that contracts be negotiated locally.

Now comes the new president of the Chamber, Winton M. Blount, in a speech to a labor seminar of the Associated General Contractors on bargaining in the construction industry.

And what does he propose? "I believe," he said, "most of us accept the need for elevating collective bargaining more to state and regional levels, and possibly even to a national level . . . one step in the right direction would be to strengthen the ties between the many associations in the industry . . . (and) "form a National Federation of Construction Industry Associations."

Next week we'll get back to the evils of industrywide bargaining.

Grapes of Wrath

Schoemann Tells Locals:

To Meet Nation's Social Crisis, 'Place to Begin Is Union Hall'

The following is excerpted from an article by Peter T. Schoemann, president of the Plumbers & Pipe Fitters, in the May 1968 issue of the union's magazine, the UA Journal.

THERE CAN BE NO LONGER any doubt about the fact that the course of our international union and, in fact, the entire Building & Construction Trades Dept. has been firmly pointed along the path of affirmative action.

The seriousness of the internal crisis through which our nation is passing has been brought home to us once again in the riots—or civil disorders, as they are called—which followed the assassination of Martin Luther King, Jr. There can be no doubt that we have plunged right into the middle of one of those historic crises through which all nations must pass from time to time.

We find ourselves embroiled in a social crisis where we are no longer the little people. It is a case of the "haves" and "have nots" and we are definitely numbered among the "haves." We do not belong there as much as a lot of other people who make more money than we do, but considering where the protest and the trouble are coming from, as compared with those people, we are definitely "haves."

So now we, along with other unions and also a large sector of the business community, find ourselves on the threshold of a new crisis that bids fair to shake our nation to its roots. The innocence of our trade union childhood is over, and perhaps also the excess romanticism—as distinguished from the well-founded hope—of our trade union adolescence. No longer is it adequate for us to holler "more." No longer is it safe merely to stand guard over what we have. Indeed, to move out into the center of the storm may be the surest way to conserve what we have and even to add to it.

And so I should like to see every local union in these troublesome times involving itself wherever the occasion offers in committees and projects and experiments aimed at alleviating the sufferings and the problems of our ghetto residents and especially those of the minority racial groups.

The beginning of the road is to practice affirmative action, and if one will but think about it and let his imagination run on the subject for a while, there are many ways in which this can be done. Thus, it is one thing to refuse to lower existing standards and it is quite another thing to take a hard, unyielding, inflexible stand on some formal requirement that in a given situation is simply not an essential standard.

FOR EXAMPLE, as to the requirement found in many apprenticeship programs of the high school diploma or equivalency certificate, we should ask why that requirement was put there in the first place.

It was more or less to assure a high quality of work and workmanship by requiring a certain amount of formal education and by requiring also a young man who had the character to persevere to the end of his high school course. What is fair to ask—and our critics are asking it, so we might as well ask ourselves—is whether the same objective might be achieved by a different route.

I am not saying that as a general matter we ought to put a premium on dropping out of high school, but only that the present times are too serious to play games with pretty little artificialities. I know of no law which says that a joint apprenticeship committee cannot in particular instances waive a formal requirement for special reasons. This is one area in which some flexibility in our operation could prove useful. And that word "flexibility" sums up much of what I am trying to say.

To consider another example, there is great interest today in getting Negro businessmen into the contract construction field, or upgrading the lot of Negro contractors already in business. In particular situations, there may be much we can do to help out once these contractors are brought into the union fold. We can supply good journeymen and good foremen for their jobs. We can make better journeymen out of their employes we take into the fold, particularly where there is a school established with special training courses for journeymen.

Turning to the more general needs of society today, the whole trade union movement can make a very large contribution toward the elimination of racism. The place to begin, of course, is the union hall and our fellow union members on the job. A few words and a few examples can go a long way.

Labor Airs Opposition:

Threat of 'Big Brother' Controls Seen in Internal Security Bill

The following is excerpted from a letter from Thomas E. Harris, associate general counsel of the AFL-CIO, to the House Committee on Un-American Activities setting out the AFL-CIO's opposition to a bill to amend and expand the Subversive Activities Control Act of 1950.

THE AUTHORIZATION TO RUN checks on so many workers creates a serious and unwarranted threat to the right of privacy. As Justice Louis D. Brandeis stated in his famous dissent in Olmstead v. United States, which has since carried the day, the right of privacy is "the most comprehensive of rights and the right most valued by civilized men."

The creation of voluminous files of "raw" unanalyzed data concerning the intimate details of the lives and beliefs of a significant proportion of our population is a specter so incompatible with the basic tenants of a free society that it should incline this committee to a sober reconsideration of the scope of this bill.

The right of privacy is not, of course, an absolute. But intrusions into the private lives of American citizens should be permitted only where the expected benefits can be shown to be of a very high order. No such showing has or can be made here. Today the Communist movements appeal to the working men and women of this country is at its nadir. For this reason we are not aware of any information which would suggest that sabotage has been a problem of any proportion in the prosecution of the war in Viet Nam.

Thus H.R. 15626 takes insufficient account of this fact that the period since 1950 has proved a point that should never have been in doubt—that the vigilance, good sense, innate loyalty of the American working man provides the firmest possible defense against Communist subversion. Whatever the felt needs of the late 40's and early 50's might have been, recent history should give us the courage to free ourselves from the excesses of that period and to return to our historic traditions in which we place our trust in the responsibility and loyalty of free men.

The threat to the right of privacy we have noted is intensified by the fact that the bill requires the perpetuation and probable enlargement, of a bureaucracy charged with the monitoring of the private lives and thoughts of American citizens—charged in other words with a task that aligns the federal government far too closely with the government of Big Brother in Orwell's 1984.

The statement of Joseph J. Liebling, Director for Security Policy of the Dept. of Defense, indicates that this bureaucracy comprises over 11,000 people and spends over $45 million per year. A Congress as concerned with economy as the present one, should, we submit, cut down the size of this swollen security force, whose every existence is a danger to our free institutions, not enlarge it.

The notion that a security force should inquire into the mental health, alcoholic intake and sexual habits of railroad conductors, utility workers, etc., is an ominous one in a society built on freedom and respect for the inviolate nature of the individual.

In addition, it hardly appears self-evident that it is proper to place in the hands of the Executive Dept. the power to bar every citizen who has relatives in Russia, Eastern Europe, or China from such a high proportion of the blue collar jobs available in this country. Yet that is the precise effect of one section of the bill. And while the AFL-CIO and the vast majority of its membership has given unstinting support to the Administration's prosecution of the war in Viet Nam, it seems to us to be unsound to place the job rights of those who oppose that policy peacefully, and out of a sense of loyalty, in jeopardy.

In addition to these specific points, there is another danger inherent in the bill. It gives the Executive a broad discretion which could be used as a cloak to further objectives other than the exclusion of potential sabateurs and subversives from defense positions. This discretion could, for example, be used as a mechanism to allow anti-union employers to rid themselves of workers who hold the "subversive" idea that representation by a labor union is a good idea.

THE OVERBREADTH of the bill is not the only reason why the AFL-CIO cannot support it. The federation also objects to the fact that the proposed legislation does not go far enough in assuring fair procedures to those who wish to challenge an adverse security determination.

The exceptions to the right to cross-examine witnesses and to secure relevant documentary material are of such potential magnitude that they threaten to engulf those rights. We submit that the minimum improvement that is necessary to provide that the hearing officer in charge of a particular case, rather than those who have investigated and decided to prosecute the matter, decide whether the national security requires deviation from these essential rights.

Moreover, the bill should make it clear that a refusal to produce a witness should be sustained only if the informant is an under-cover agent. The present wording is far to vague. Since the hearing officer will, no doubt, have a security clearance, it is plain that this proposal meets the needs of national security.

The job of investigators and prosecutors is to investigate and prosecute. Their proper tasks give them a natural interest in secrecy that is incompatible with a proper judicial approach to the delicate question of when a source of information or documentary evidence should be revealed.

The present bill, therefore, unfairly weights the scales against the accused and is in contravention of one of the basic postulates of our legal heritage —that an accused is presumed innocent until proven guilty and should, therefore, have an unfettered opportunity to make his defense.

Views of Dr. Dan:

Land Reform Is Key to Strength Of South Viet Nam's Regime

ALTHOUGH THE COMMUNIST Tet offensive inflicted heavy human and material loss in South Viet Nam, it also brought out "many basic strengths" of the government and the people, the head of South Viet Nam's Free Democratic Party has declared.

Despite "all of its weaknesses," South Viet Nam "emerged from the Tet offensive as a very viable state," said Dr. Phan Quang Dan. He noted that the newly-established constitutional government proved "quite stable," its army and police "fought bravely and well," and Communist forces failed to win the popular support they expected.

Dan was interviewed on Labor News Conference, an AFL-CIO produced public affairs program aired Tuesdays at 7:35 p.m. EDT, on the Mutual Radio Network.

Dan said that the Thieu administration "still has a long way to go" to win the wide support of the people that it needs. Government reorganization and vigorous prosecution of social reforms, "especially land reform," should get top priority, he asserted. He pointed out that the government's provincial and district leaders are military men, badly needed by the army. And, he noted, good military leaders aren't always good administrators.

So far, land reform has had little more than "lip service," he said. Land the French sold to the Administration for distribution to the peasants "now belongs to the landlords—to administration people—to government people," and much of it lies unused, he said.

Dan rejected the argument that peace and security must precede land reform. Land reform in areas not now controlled by the elected government "would make it much easier for us to control those villages and make it easier for the peasants to join our camp," he noted.

Dan, who is in the United States on the invitation of AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, was questioned by Kenneth Crawford, contributing editor and columnist for Newsweek magazine, and Gordon Cole, editor of the Machinist newspaper.

By Press Associates, Inc.

THE 1954 INTERNAL REVENUE CODE by which we now live and pay our taxes has been amended repeatedly by successive Congresses. Over the years, unfortunately, most amendments have served to benefit the wealthy taxpayer and to undercut the principle of "progressive" taxation by which those best able to pay are taxed the highest.

Some of these amendments have opened such generous tax loopholes that more than one millionaire in the United States now pays no taxes at all, or pays at a rate that utterly belies the "progressive" principle.

For years, former Sen. Paul Douglas of Illinois built up an unassailable case against the tax loopholes that were getting bigger and bigger in the nation's tax system:

- Capital gains loophole that represents an immense and inexcusable bonanza for stock market and real estate transactions.
- Tax-free interest from state and local bonds that enables investors in them to escape taxes.
- Notorious oil and other unjustifiable mineral depletion allowances that permit the grotesque situation where corporations with millions of profit pay little or no taxes.
- "Foundations" that are frequently tax dodging devices.
- Gift and inheritance tax rules that permit huge tax dodging.

The list is endless.

Tax dodging has become a way of life for thousands of corporations and businessmen to the point where discoveries of "legal" ways to hold down taxes have become a "respectable" and immensely rewarding pastime.

Private tax services now advertise that they can help businessmen draw "tax-sheltered money" from their company; how they can make "private arrangements" with their company to lower tax rates; how they can combine "business with a vacation for tax-free expenses." There is even advice on how company owners can get all sorts of benefits "without paying any corporate tax whatever."

ONE THING that should be remembered in any future tax legislation is that reform should be directed not only to closing grossly unjust tax loopholes, but to correct existing tax injustices toward America's low and moderate income families.

"Thoroughgoing loophole closing is essential because it will raise billions in additional revenue needed to help meet America's international obligations and vital homefront public service costs," said a policy statement by the AFL-CIO in 1967. "But even more important, tax reform is needed to reduce the relative tax burden on low and moderate income families and to restore the confidence of the American people in the fairness of the federal tax system."

There was a time when the federal tax system favored "earned" income, such as wages and salaries; it now favors unearned income such as dividends. The $600 personal exemption which is supposed to bear some relation to living costs is ludricrously out of line.

Serious study should be given to reductions in tax rates for the lowest brackets, where even those who are below the poverty level must pay relatively high taxes on their meager incomes. Work-connected expenses of workers, such as transportation, should be given serious consideration as a "cost" of earning a living.

"Tax policy touches the life of all AFL-CIO members and their families," the federation's tax policy statement concluded. "Moreover, wage and salary workers pay most of the nation's tax bill. In our own and in the country's interest, we have an obligation to insist that our taxes are fairly levied and that tax policy truly serves the nation's well-being."

It is too late, of course, for the present Congress to consider thoroughgoing tax reform at this late date in the session. But workers have the right to demand that such reform be given the highest priority by the Congress and the Administration that will be elected this November.

GOLD AND ECONOMIC GROWTH
While Gold Supply Declined, The National Economy Grew
1947 - 1967
(In Billions of Dollars)

Source of data: Economic Report of the President, 1968.

Dollar Seen Stronger Than Gold Because of High U.S. Productivity

The U.S. dollar "is not only 'as good as gold'—it is much better," AFL-CIO Research Dir. Nathaniel Goldfinger points out in an article in the May issue of the Federationist, the AFL-CIO magazine.

This is so, Goldfinger writes, because the strength of the dollar does not rest upon its relationship with gold, but upon the strength of the American economy.

At the same time, Goldfinger sounds this warning: "To maintain the strength of the dollar at home and abroad, the first prerequisite is a strong and growing, full employment economy."

The article deals with the history of the free world's monetary system; the attempt by speculators to destroy it, climaxing in the mid-March "gold crisis"; and steps taken since to reduce the monetary importance of gold.

What Goldfinger does is to expose the falseness of newspaper headlines and articles that link the dollar's relationship to gold and the value of the dollar. They're two different things, he explains.

The "crisis" in March, Goldfinger writes, was a threat to the international monetary system of payments for trade and other financial relations among nations of the free world.

Manipulators Exposed

The manipulations in the gold market by speculators, hoarders, some world bankers and the French government was a try at getting "quick profits from a collapse of this monetary system," Goldfinger declares.

"It was like a run on a bank by those who hope to profit from the bank's collapse," he added.

But during this attack, the article continues, there was no need for "panic or scare talk" about the dollar and no reason to believe it should have any effect "on prices in the grocery store in St. Louis."

The American dollar has become the "major currency in the world" with other currencies based on how many dollars they will buy, because "the American economy is the richest and most productive in the world," Goldfinger says, adding:

"The dollar's foundation of strength is the nation's economic assets—its manpower and skills, its plants and machines, its technology and efficiency, its varied natural resources."

'Gold Rush' Ended

The article commends actions taken by governments to end "the gold rush" and restore confidence "at least temporarily" in the free world's monetary system.

These steps included:

- Action by the United States and six other nations in a "gold pool" to halt buying or selling of gold for monetary purpose on the private market and refrain from selling gold to governments to replace gold sold in private markets.
- Approval by Congress of legislation which repealed the previous requirement for 25 percent gold backing on U.S. currency, thus freeing the entire $11.4 billion stock of U.S. gold for international transactions.
- Movement by the world's industrial nations toward establishing a new international means of exchange, called "paper gold," a form of "international credit" to supplement present existing world currencies.

Goldfinger hails this last step as being "in the right direction" toward bringing about the successful operation of the monetary system.

At the same time, he warns that delay by the 10 nations of the Intl. Monetary Fund in ratifying the plan—previously approved by their government central bankers—could bring a renewal of speculating in gold.

All told, he says, the steps taken in March help to reduce "the free world's dependence on the American dollar" and make for a "more realistic" monetary system.

"The sooner the world reaches the stage of treating gold as another commodity, like tin or copper, the better off everyone will be," he concludes.

Human Rights For All Urged At UN Parley

Teheran, Iran—A United Nations Conference on Human Rights has adopted a Proclamation of Teheran calling upon all nations to grant all of their people freedom, equality, dignity and social justice.

The proclamation was approved unanimously by delegates representing 84 countries just before the conference concluded a three-week review of human rights progress over the past 20 years.

The conference marked the 20th anniversary of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights by the UN General Assembly and the proclamation affirmed faith in the principles "enshrined" in it and other UN declarations on human rights.

"The primary aim of the United Nations in the sphere of human rights is the achievement by each individual of the maximum freedom and dignity," the proclamation declared.

Freedom Under Law

The realization of this objective, it said, requires the laws of each country to grant certain freedoms to all individuals "irrespective of race, language, religion or political belief."

Specifically called for were "freedom of expression, of information, of conscience and of religion, as well as the right to participate in political, economic, cultural and social life."

The 19-point proclamation, which contained many of the recommendations advanced by the U.S. delegation, condemned all forms of discrimination and denials of political rights.

It appealed for an end to all forms of aggression, urged economically developed nations to aid the developing ones, stressed a need for disarmament and proposed international action "aimed at eradicating illiteracy."

AFL-CIO Vice Pres. John J. Grogan was a member of the six-man U.S. delegation to the conference named by Pres. Johnson. Henry Kirsch, an AFL-CIO Dept. of Intl. Affairs representative, served as his adviser.

Delegates Declare Support:

Distillery Workers Rally to Humphrey

By Eugene A. Kelly

The Distillery Workers gave Vice Pres. Hubert H. Humphrey a rousing reception at their 14th biennial convention and pledged "full support both in his quest for the nomination and for election" as President of the United States.

Some 250 delegates, meeting in Washington, D.C., expressed their "profound regret" that Pres. Johnson will not seek another term in office but voted to endorse his vice president as a worthy successor.

A resolution passed by a standing, cheering vote said Humphrey in his present office and as a U.S. senator and big-city mayor has for a generation of Americans "imparted a nobility to public life and a grandeur to American purpose."

The times in which we live, the resolution said, "require those qualities which he has demonstrated in abundance—real understanding of this country and the world, both the dangers and the opportunities; much breadth and openness of mind, coupled with flexibility and resourcefulness; a measure of simple humanity, a respect for human dignity" and a humor which makes Humphrey "earnest without being pompous and high-minded without being self-righteous."

The convention agreed that Humphrey as President will be able to "unite the country to complete the unfinished work at home while striving for peace and security abroad."

It expressed confidence that "under his affirmative leadership we can make further advances along the trails blazed" by Presidents Roosevelt, Truman, Kennedy and Johnson.

Humphrey, in a convention speech interrupted some 20 times by applause, recalled his close relations with labor since his first election as mayor of Minneapolis and expressed gratitude for 20 years of labor friendship and support.

Noting that the United States has problems of racial tension, education, traffic congestion and housing Humphrey declared "I do not think you have to sell America short in order to make yourself stand tall."

In his campaign for the nomination, Humphrey said he will not by word or deed go around pointing out what a failure we are supposed to have been because "we have not been a failure."

The nation, he said, has made more "real progress" in recent years than at any time in American history "and I am proud of it."

Union Pres. Mort Brandenburg reported to the delegates on the opening day of the convention that while important contract and organizing gains were made in the last two years, union members must raise their sights to prepare for negotiating a master contract in the wine industry this year and in the liquor industry next year.

He set the establishment of an industry-wide pension fund as a major contract objective. He cited organizing targets such as holdout distillers in Kentucky and Tennessee and wine workers in Ohio and New York.

Major issues before the convention adjourns include the election of officers; a proposal to raise the strike fund from $400,000 to $1 million by assessment and to increase per capita taxes to establish a staff pension fund and provide more operating money.

Convention speakers included House Speaker John W. McCormack (D-Mass.); Pres. Paul Hall of the Seafarers; Pres. George Baldanzi of the United Textile Workers; and AFL-CIO department heads—William L. Kircher, Organizing; Alexander Barkan, COPE; Nathaniel Goldfinger, Research; Peter McGavin, executive secretary-treasurer, Maritime Trades Dept., and Sec.-Treas. Joseph Lewis, Union Label & Service Trades Dept.

ILO Urged to Step Up Protection Of Textile Workers' Union Rights

Geneva—A ringing call for the Intl. Labor Organization to intensify its efforts to guarantee the basic trade union rights of textile workers everywhere was sounded here by the ILO's textiles committee.

The free exercise of such rights is of "paramount importance" for improving wages and working conditions in the textile industry, the labor, employer and government delegates of 29 countries said in a resolution.

U.S. worker delegate Henoch Mendelsund of the Ladies' Garment Workers said he was "particularly proud" of the committee's unanimous endorsement of the resolution he had initiated in the workers group.

The committee noted in the resolution that in "some countries legitimate textile trade union activities are still obstructed" in defiance of the obligations imposed on member states by the ILO convention of the right to organize and to bargain collectively.

The resolution called on the ILO to take "intensified measures" to assure the respect of these conventions and to invite the denunciation of all cases where its international rules on trade union rights were "not effectively respected and implemented as regards the textiles industries."

In his final speech as the committee's worker vice chairman, Mendelsund said that the workers believed that the cooperation of the three groups of delegates had resulted in a "further but modest step" along the road of social progress traced by the ILO, a United Nations agency.

He pledged the continued support of the free trade union movement to the ILO in its mission of promoting "freedom, social justice and human rights."

TWUA Delegate

John Weiser of the Textile Workers Union of America, the other member of the U.S. worker delegation, expressed at the close of the two-week session his satisfaction at the ability shown by the delegates from all parts of the world "to work together very constructively despite their diverse backgrounds."

The conclusions adopted by the committee on structural and technological changes in the textile industry formed a "well-balanced package that can serve to assure future progress," he said.

Weiser is a member of the subcommittee that drafted the conclusions. These stressed the right of textile workers to a "fair share of the benefits from increases in productivity due to modernization measures and technical progress."

The modernization of the textile industry should be encouraged because on it rest the "hopes of improving working conditions, the living standards and the employment prospects" of its workers, it was found.

Structural changes and technical progress must "serve to raise the living standards and wages of textile workers," the committee agreed. Wages, it said, should match those paid in other industries for the same level of job qualification.

A series of measures for assuring the retraining of textile workers to enable them to move into branches of the industry or other activities with expanding job oportunities was also endorsed by the committee.

In a special resolution the committee called on the ILO to undertake a study of the measures being taken to combat bysinosis, an occupational disease also known as mill fever.

This chronic ailment hits workers who breathe air laden with cotton dust for an extended period.

Thanks Labor Committee:

Humphrey Pledges 'Untiring Efforts'

Vice Pres. Humphrey has sent a telegram of appreciation to the founding members of the National Labor Committee for Humphrey, pledging "untiring efforts toward the achievement of the goals we all seek."

Formation of the labor committee was announced May 17 with Pres. I. W. Abel of the Steelworkers as chairman and Sec. Joseph D. Keenan of the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers as secretary-treasurer.

The objectives of the committee, as set forth in a joint announcement by Keenan and Abel, are to help the Vice President secure the Democratic nomination for President and win the election next November.

About 160 trade union officials, representing a broad cross-section of the American labor movement, were on the initial list of committee members, and the roster is continuing to grow.

Humphrey's telegram to Abel and Keenan said:

"I very much appreciate your action and those of your associates in the organized labor movement in forming the National Labor Committee for Humphrey.

'Deeply Moved'

"I am deeply moved by the warm praise contained in your statement. With your support and the support of the men and women you represent, I am confident we can continue to meet the problems of our country in the years ahead in a constructive and unified fashion.

"The American labor movement has a proud tradition of supporting progressive measures that contribute to the welfare of all of our citizens. In that spirit I welcome your support and I pledge my untiring efforts toward the achievement of the goals we all seek."

The announcement of the National Labor Committee for Humphrey listed major accomplishments of the Vice President in such fields as civil rights, medicare, peace, the rights of organized labor, education, youth and economic progress.

Abel and Keenan called Humphrey "an imaginative and creative statesman with an extraordinary capacity for anticipating problems and formulating sound and workable programs for their solution."

Meanwhile, labor's support for the Vice President's candidacy was extended to the grass-roots of the trade union movement in California with the formation of California Labor for Humphrey.

Establishment of the statewide group was announced by Sec.-Treas. Thomas L. Pitts of the California AFL-CIO and Sec.-Treas. Sigmund Arywitz of the Los Angeles County AFL-CIO, who are serving as co-chairmen.

About 50 officials of international, state, regional and local union bodies in all parts of California were included in the partial list of members.

Pitts and Arywitz said the group was formed to support Humphrey's candidacy because the Vice President has been "a true liberal who has put the best interests of the people above all else throughout his life."

They pointed out that Humphrey as a U.S. senator had "an impeccable voting record" of 60 "right" and no "wrong" votes according to COPE's scoreboard. The statement concluded:

"We believe that Vice Pres. Humphrey is best qualified to succeed Pres. Johnson and is the most effective spokesman for those programs needed to meet today's challenges at home and abroad."

Humphrey Backers List 7 New Members

Seven more union officials have joined the National Labor Committee for Humphrey, committee Chairman I. W. Abel and Sec.-Treas. Joseph Keenan announced. They are:

Executive Vice Pres. William J. Farson of the American Newspaper Guild.

Vice Pres. Pat Greathouse, Auto Workers.

Pres. Sal Maso, Lathers.

Pres. George L. O'Brien, Railway Carmen.

Dir. of Organization Nicholas Zonarich, AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept.

Pres. Charles T. Mirabile, Albany AFL-CIO.

Pres. Anthony Schneider, Rochester, N. Y., AFL-CIO.

The latest additions bring the membership of the committee to 166 top officials of national and international unions, trade and industrial departments, state and local central bodies.

"THE MAN FOR OUR TIMES" was the description given Vice Pres. Humphrey by Steelworkers Pres. I. W. Abel as he announced the formation of the National Labor Committee for Humphrey. Abel is chairman of the committee and Sec. Joseph D. Keenan of the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, center, is secretary-treasurer. Iron Workers Pres. John H. Lyons, left, is one of the more than 150 union officials making up the committee to help Humphrey win the nomination and election as President.

TWUA Signs Contract For Carpet Workers

Bloomsburg, Pa.—The Textile Workers Union of America scored a major bargaining breakthrough in the central Pennsylvania carpet industry in a new contract signed by TWUA Local 1700 at Magee Carpet Co.

The TWUA won a 38-40 cents an hour pay increase package for 1,300 workers here after a five-day strike.

Railroad Unions Upheld In Layoff Pay Claims

A federal court ruling that preserves the right of railroad employes to collect several million dollars in layoff pay claims was upheld by the Supreme Court in one of a series of labor case rulings.

The high court refused to review, and therefore let stand, a decision of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia upholding the position of the Locomotive Firemen & Enginemen in a dispute with major U.S. railroads.

The appeals judges had ruled that U.S. District Court Judge Alexander Holtzoff had the authority to grant relief to railway employes in damage claims instead of referring them to contract grievance hearings and the lengthy procedures of the Railway Labor Act. Southern Pacific asked the Supreme Court to reverse this ruling.

The BLF&E termed the action a "tremendous victory" for the union in the long litigation over a compulsory arbitration award climaxing the 1963 dispute between rail unions and management over the employment of firemen-helpers.

In other actions, the high court:

- Refused to agree that a worker's claim for pension fund money should have the same legal priority in bankruptcy case as his claim for unpaid wages.
- Ruled that Musicians Local 802, New York City, did not violate the antitrust laws when it set minimum rates for orchestra leaders. Four leaders claimed such fee-setting was against the Sherman Act but the Supreme Court rejected their claim in a 5-2 decision.

Final Victory for AFM

AFM Pres. Herman Kenin said the high court, in reversing a Court of Appeals decision, gave the union a "complete and final victory" over dissident band leaders who for 9 years have been challenging the AFM's contract enforcement rules.

The Supreme Court denied review in two labor cases decided by U.S. Courts of Appeals. In one, the Longshoremen in Philadelphia asked the courts to rule that a dispute over the number of pallets allowed per load in handling ship cargo should be negotiated and not arbitrated. In the other, New Orleans building trades unions claimed the right to picket plant gates "reserved" for the use of subcontractors on a construction job. Both decisions were unfavorable to the unions.

In the bankruptcy case, the AFL-CIO had argued in a friend of the court brief that many unions negotiate a "package" of contract benefits that may include pension and health improvements along with higher wages. Therefore it would be unrealistic to hold that unpaid wages should have priority, Federation lawyers declared.

Six justices affirmed the position of the 2nd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals that Congress did not intend to give priority to any claims other than wages. Justice Abe Fortas, writing a dissent for himself, Chief Justice Earl Warren and Justice William J. Brennan, Jr., held that annuity payments are just as much a part of the labor-management agreement as wages and should have equal priority.

of "great importance to the continued vitality of the right to picket."

The brief described picketing as "one of the handful of basic rights that employes have at their disposal during a labor dispute."

Justice Marshall found striking similarities between the shopping center case and one involving a question of First Amendment rights at a business block in a company town in Alabama.

Court's Reasoning

"We see no reason why access to a business district in a company town for the purpose of exercising First Amendment rights," he continued in his opinion, "should be constitutionally required, while access for the same purpose to property functioning as a business district should be limited simply because the property surrounding the 'business district' is not under the same ownership."

In a concurring comment, Justice William O. Douglas pointed out that while the shopping center is not dedicated to public use in the manner of the company town, its owners have opened the center to public uses.

"Picketing is free speech—plus," Douglas said. "The plus being physical activity that may implicate traffic and related matters. Hence the latter aspects of the picketing may be regulated. . . ."

Douglas suggested that the Pennsylvania courts are capable of writing an order that will ensure noninterference with customers and employes "while enabling the union members to assemble sufficiently close to Weis' market to make effective use of their First Amendment rights."

Dissenters to the decision were Justices Hugo L. Black, Byron R. White and John H. Harlan.

Fire Fighters Honor 13 For News, TV Coverage

The Fire Fighters have announced 13 newspaper, photography, television and radio winners of the union's third annual awards program depicting "the dramatic and difficult life of the professional fire fighter."

Cash prizes of $500 will be awarded by union officials in each locality to the following first place winners:

- Paul Murphy, Hamilton, Ont., Spectator, for a feature story telling how fire fighters, using mouth-to-mouth resuscitation and heart massage, revived an unconscious 5-year-old girl who had been saved from a burning home.
- Robert Fasce, Auburn, N.Y., Citizen Advertiser, for a story detailing the way in which a former fire fighter used his special knowledge in an effort to save an elderly fire victim.
- William La Force, Jr., Baltimore Sun, for a picture of fire fighters removing one of their number who was overcome by smoke during a fire.
- Station KNBC-TV, Los Angeles, for a 30-minute television documentary showing the coordinated efforts of fire fighters in combatting a series of disastrous brush and building fires.

Second prize winners of $250 each are Wayne Wangstad, Minneapolis Tribune, for story on training of a fire fighter; Janet Hamilton, Salina, Kan., Journal, for a similar article in smaller-circulation newspapers; Joseph Wiedelmand and Drayton Holcomb, Detroit News, for a picture of fire fighters in action; and Dave Kelly, news director, WIIC-TV, Pittsburgh, Pa., for a television program dealing with the low pay of fire fighters.

Winners of honorable mention certificates are James McCarron, Pittsburgh, Pa., Press; Joseph M. Rothstein, Anchorage, Alaska, Daily News; and Josephine Roberts, Alameda County newspapers, for articles; Vic Casamento, Washington, D.C., Post, for photography; and Buffalo, N.Y. Fire Fighters Local 282 for producing a television film.

A special citation went to Sid Ross and George Kiseda for an article in Parade Magazine detailing the urgent need of many American communities to improve the quality of fire fighting services.

IAFF Pres. William D. Buck, in announcing this year's winners, expressed "gratification in the growing number of entries" in the awards competition and in "the outstanding high level of their content."

New Teachers in D.C. Voted Pay of $7,000

Starting annual salaries for teachers in the District of Columbia were raised to $7,000 in legislation that has cleared Congress and is awaiting Pres. Johnson's signature.

This is a 19.2 percent boost in pay for beginning teachers with bachelor's degrees. The present teacher minimum pay of $5,840 will be raised to $6,400 as of last October and to $7,000 on July 1.

Starting police and firemen's salaries will be raised 10.1 percent to $8,000 on July 1, under the bill. They also have a retroactive clause which boosts their present pay of $6,700 to $7,800 as of last October.

Beginning pay in all categories will be the highest in the Washington area.

The teacher pay bill also rules out a walkout similar to a "sick day" the District teachers took March 7 to lobby on Capitol Hill. Only 5 percent of the teachers would be allowed to take leave at one time. The restriction would not apply to religious holidays.

House Action Slated:

$6 Billion Fund Cut Heads for Test Vote

The House has scheduled a test vote on a "lesser of two evils" budget slash—a choice between a $4 billion and $6 billion cut.

Both would force cutbacks or postponements in important programs. Pres. Johnson has indicated that he would reluctantly accept a $4 billion cutback if it were the only way to get a tax increase bill through Congress.

The AFL-CIO Executive Council warned earlier this month that heavy, indiscriminate budget cuts "can only lead to chaos." It said labor is "unalterably opposed" to a "meat-ax approach" to spending reductions.

Johnson has sharply criticized the $6 billion cut agreed to by a House-Senate conference committee and his budget director, Charles J. Zwick, warned that a cut of that magnitude "would have a very serious impact on programs to which the President has given priority."

The House isn't scheduled to vote on the conference report until sometime in June. With the approval of the Democratic leadership, the House will vote May 29 on a resolution instructing its conferees to go back to negotiations with the Senate and seek to pare the spending cut down to $4 billion.

If the motion loses, the House would later face the decision of whether to pass or defeat the combination tax increase and $6 billion spending cut package.

Taxes and budget cuts weren't the only headaches for the Administration and its supporters.

The Senate moved towards passage of a so-called crime control bill which includes sections denying defendants what the Supreme Court has said are constitutional rights and opening the door for widespread use of wiretapping and electronic eavesdropping by law enforcement officials receiving court permission.

Most of the amendments intended to restore the bill to the form originally proposed by the Justice Dept. were going down to defeat by big margins as the AFL-CIO News went to press.

As the final Senate vote neared, Chairman Emanuel Celler of the House Judiciary Committee served warning that the outcome might be no legislation at all.

Celler, who will head the House conferees in negotiations to resolve differences between the House and Senate bills, said he would not agree to any bill that would undo court restrictions on the admissibility of confessions and line-up identifications.

With Congress still working towards adjournment before the political convention season, Senate Republican Leader Everett McKinley Dirksen unveiled a new filibuster threat.

Dirksen's target is a labor-supported bill which would strengthen the enforcement powers of the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission—the agency which administers the ban on race, sex and religious discrimination in employment.

The bill would give the EEOC powers to issue cease and desist orders comparable to that of the NLRB, with review by federal appellate courts.

Called 'Offensive'

Dirksen, who led the filibuster against repeal of Sec. 14(b) of the Taft-Hartley Act, termed it "one of the most offensive pieces of legislation that could come before Congress" and said he was prepared to lead a bipartisan filibuster against its passage.

The Senate Republican leader also denounced the occupational safety and health bill, a major AFL-CIO legislative goal.

"I'm not about to take it without a fight," Dirksen declared.

With a crowded Senate agenda, there was some question as to whether the Senate would get around this year to consideration of a House-passed "Monday holiday" bill.

The House voted 212-83 to shift observances of Washington's birthday to the third Monday in February, of Memorial Day to the last Monday in May, and Veterans Day to the fourth Monday in October. The bill would also establish Columbus Day, on the second Monday in October, as a new national holiday.

The proposed legislation would not take effect until 1971 to give states time to pass similar legislation—if they wished. The bill would directly affect only federal workers and public observances in the District of Columbia.

Installers OK Bell Contract, IBEW Still Out

Bell Telephone equipment installers ratified a new three-year contract but another union of Bell employes was on strike at two locations and considering additional strike action that may eventually involve 70,000 workers from coast to coast.

In a mail ballot, members of the Communications Workers voted 8,719-6,347 to ratify a contract covering 23,000 installers and job clerks. The vote, authorized by the CWA May 6 after the contract was rejected earlier at membership meetings of the installers, was certified by Ernst & Ernst, public accountants.

A two-week CWA strike against the Bell System ended May 5 for more than 200,000 members employed by Bell operating companies and Western Electric Co. equipment installers.

Two locals of the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers are on strike for a better offer in a wage reopener—8,300 employes of New Jersey Bell, and 12,000 Illinois Bell workers. IBEW Local 827 turned down the latest New Jersey Bell offer May 16 and continued its state-wide picketing.

IBEW's Western Electric manufacturing locals scheduled a May 27 meeting in Columbus, O., to consider authorizing strikes at 13 locations where 70,000 IBEW members work.

Two of the manufacturing units, in Columbus and Omaha, have passed the expiration date of their contracts but stayed on the job pending a final vote. The other 11 units have contracts with staggered expiration dates running through the summer months.

Previous company offers failed to meet the needs of IBEW members, the union said. Its Illinois System Council reported wages lag $20 to $30 a week behind those in comparable work.

The CWA strike came at the midpoint of a three-year contract after union and company negotiators failed to agree on the size of a wage increase. When talks resumed, the parties turned their attention to an entirely new contract for a new term and eventually agreed on terms.

consumers and wage-earners the "sound credit protection legislation which they badly needed."

The legislation would require stores and lending institutions to state the full charge for credit and interest both in total dollars and cents costs and in terms of true annual interest.

It would enable a family buying on the installment plan or borrowing money to shop for the best buy in credit—without a college degree in mathematics.

For example, the AFL-CIO's "Consumer Beware" pamphlet lists the most common type methods of quoting finance charges as "add-on" rates, "discount" rates, and the monthly rate on the unpaid balance.

True Rate Required

The new legislation means that the person who borrows $1,000 to be repaid over one year at an "add-on" rate of 10 percent must be told that the true interest rate is 18.5 percent and the dollar cost of the credit is $100. If it is a 10 percent "discount" rate, it must be translated into a 20.5 percent true interest and an actual cost of $111.10. And if the rate is 2 percent a month on the balance, he must be told that he will pay a true rate of 24 percent a year at a total cost of $130.

Garnishment provisions in the final version of the bill weren't as strong as the House originally passed—or as the AFL-CIO had sought.

But it does make it illegal for an employer to fire a worker the first time his pay is garnisheed. And it exempts the first 75 percent of a worker's after-tax pay—or $48 a week, whichever amount is higher—from garnishment. And whenever the federal minimum wage is raised, the $48 figure goes up also. It is computed on the basis of 30 times the minimum wage.

Some states have laws giving greater protection. In those cases, the superior state laws will apply.

Exempt from the credit charge disclosure law are all purchases under $25, items under $75 in which the total credit charge is $5 or less, and any sales over $75 in which the credit cost is not more than $7.50.

An important provision of the bill is aimed at home repair salesmen and others who seek to get unsuspecting customers to sign a mortgage or a second mortgage on their homes under the pretense that it is a normal installment contract.

To start with, the salesman would have to inform the customer that the paper is a mortgage on his home. But even then the customer would have three days after signing to cancel the agreement if he has second thoughts.

Advertisements of goods or loan—whether published or broadcast—must quote true interest and total cost if any credit or interest charges are used in the advertisement.

The bulk of the bill takes effect July 1, 1969; the garnishment provision becomes effective July 1, 1970.

44-Cent Raise Is Negotiated In Bakery Pact

Paterson, N.J.—The American Bakery & Confectionery Workers negotiated a new two-year contract for 20,000 "wholesale" workers with gains of 44 cents an hour described by ABC as the "finest settlement ever achieved" in the baking industry.

A pattern accord was won from Continental Baking Co. here and then agreed to by other major wholesale firms in the bread and cake industry—American Bakeries, Interstate Baking, General Host, formerly the General Baking Co., and Ward Foods.

The pact covers members in "wholesale" bakery plants from New York to Oklahoma. It was recommended for adoption by local unions, ABC said, by unanimous vote of the union policy committee representing all affected regions.

The new two-year agreement will affect workers in all areas except for members of ABC Local 1, Chicago, and Local 4, St. Louis, who went on strike for a Monday-through-Friday workweek. The pact provides:

- An hourly wage boost of 20 cents effective at once, and another 17 cents effective next May 4.
- Premium pay of 25 cents an hour for Sunday work, with time and a half pay for overtime, effective next Sept. 1.
- Four weeks' paid vacation after 15 years, five weeks after 25 years of service, effective Jan. 1, 1970.
- A 50 percent increase in severance pay benefits to a maximum of 900 hours, payable in plant closings, or layoffs in shutdowns.

Corporate Profits Outrun Guesses, First Quarter Pace at $88.8 Billion mean a potential tax liability of the corporations of more than $36 billion.

The rate of after-tax profits in the first quarter of 1968, the department said, was 12 percent higher than in the comparable period last year, and 95 percent higher than in 1960.

However, an article in The Outlook, a publication of Standard & Poor's, indicated there's a big difference between figuring what the tax take should be on profits and what it actually turns out to be.

For example, on the basis of the normal corporate tax rate of 48 percent, the tax liability on $88.8 billion would come to $42.6 billion. However, The Outlook article pointed out that "tax advantages" reduced tax rates well below that level.

"Tax advantages" referred to one so-called depletion allowances to oil, mining and timber producers; investment credits; deductions for losses—often "bookkeeping" losses, write-offs for equipment and depreciation, and "concessions" gained from doing business in other countries.

As a result, the article pointed out, the over-all tax rate paid on all corporate profits is just over 40 percent. This would bring the tax liability close to the Commerce Dept.'s estimate.

A compilation in The Outlook listed 167 companies whose effective tax rates in 1967 were well below that level. In fact, 109 companies had a rate of less than 30 percent. Seventeen of them had rates below 10 percent.

The article's roster included some of the nation's industrial giants—Texaco, Bethlehem Steel, Weyerhaeuser, Pan American Airways, Ford Motor, Owens-Illinois, Standard Oil of Calif., Armour, Reynolds Metals and Gulf & Western Industries.

As a result of "tax advantages" which work to the advantage of many firms, the article emphasized, the impact of the proposed 10 percent surcharge on corporate incomes would be very uneven.

It cited the examples of two companies with $1-million of pretax earnings—company A subject to the normal 48 percent tax rate and company B with an "effective" tax rate of only 35 percent.

Company A's surcharge on taxes of $480,000 would lift its tax bill by $48,000 to $528,000, producing a net profit of $472,000, down 10.6 percent because of the surcharge. Company B's tax bill of $350,000 would be lifted by $35,000 to $385,000, leaving a net of $615,000, with only 5.4 percent decline.

Senate Votes Bill to Spur Low-Cost Housing Drive

$5 Billion Authorized To Start Programs

The Administration's housing bill—aimed towards "a goal of a decent home in a decent neighborhood for every American"—passed the Senate, 67-4, after a series of crippling amendments were rejected.

It authorizes a $5 billion, three-year start on Pres. Johnson's target of 6 million apartments or homes for low and moderate income families over the next 10 years.

Housing & Urban Development Sec. Robert C. Weaver termed the Senate-passed bill "a milestone in urban legislation."

Pres. Johnson appealed to the House to "follow through" and approve the bill. "Time will not wait," he warned; "we dare not lose this opportunity to act."

The Senate bill includes a new program which would enable families with incomes of $3,500 to $6,800—and up to $9,800 for large families—to purchase homes with the help of government mortgage interest subsidies.

It also would set up a program to help poor families—with incomes under $3,000—rent homes with the families paying 25 percent of their incomes and the government the balance.

This is similar to the rent subsidy program now in effect for apartment dwellings, which also would be expanded under the bill.

The legislation authorizes continued expansion of the model cities programs, a speeded-up system of urban renewal grants, and mass transit assistance to metropolitan areas.

The Senate rejected an amendment by Sen. John Tower (R-Tex.) to cut in half a $1 billion authorization for the model cities program in 1970.

The bill sets up a special fund to offset risks in extending FHA insurance to housing in ghetto areas and provides a reinsurance program for high-risk areas hit by violence.

House Bars Easing of Budget Cut

A budget-cutting conservative coalition in the House held out for a $6 billion meat-ax slash in federal spending, easily beating a compromise $4 billion proposal.

The $6 billion budget slash is tied to a tax increase bill which Pres. Johnson has said is essential to the nation's economic health.

The Administration has said that a cut of such magnitude would force curtailment of many high-priority government programs. It would lead to "chaos," Johnson warned.

The vote against the smaller $4 billion cut was 259-137.

Voting against the compromise were 167 Republicans and 92 Democrats. For the smaller cut were 131 Democrats and 6 Republicans.

Next step, expected by mid-June, is a showdown vote on a House-Senate conference committee bill which combines a 10 percent tax surcharge with an order to Pres. Johnson to cut spending $6 billion less than budgeted, even if Congress appropriates more money.

The May 29 vote came on a

SUPPORT EXPERIENCED, "oldtime" liberals, Pres. Johnson urged the Ladies' Garment Workers convention at Atlantic City as ILGWU Pres. Louis Stulberg gave the victory sign. The delegates followed up by endorsing Vice Pres. Humphrey's candidacy for President to succeed Johnson.

As ILGWU Rallies Support:

Humphrey Pledges To Invest in People

By Duane Emme

Atlantic City—The Ladies' Garment Workers' convention unanimously endorsed Vice Pres. Hubert H. Humphrey for the presidency as the leader "who knows what is to be done" and "how to do it."

Humphrey received a cheering, table-thumping ovation when he entered the convention hall and for more than 20 minutes delegates paraded around the convention floor carrying banners and placards proclaiming their choice.

The convention repeatedly interrupted Humphrey with applause as he delivered a ringing address in which he promised "to find out what's in the hearts of the people" by moving into a "town hall" type of campaign.

The Vice President spoke from the platform used by Pres. Johnson three days earlier in setting forth some criteria by which to judge presidential candidates. The President received a similar resounding reception.

Endorsement by the convention's more than 1,000 delegates followed earlier action by the ILGWU board in urging Humphrey to declare as a candidate after Johnson announced his decision not seek another term.

The endorsement resolution traced Humphrey's long fight for civil rights—from the time he was mayor of Minneapolis, through his successful effort to get a meaningful civil rights plank in the 1948 Democratic platform and into his years as a senator and vice president.

"He made the lonely fight as a matter of conscience," the resolution declared. "And he won it because he had the guts to speak the heart of America."

It emphasized that Humphrey was a "pioneer" in the war against poverty, "the many great fights" for improved minimum wage, expanded social security coverage, education programs and legislation to provide jobs at decent wages.

In addition to endorsing Humphrey, the resolution urged all ILGWU affiliates to organize re-

NSC Hit for Retreat on Safety Bill

Seattle, Wash. — The Labor Conference of the National Safety Council accused the council's board of directors of yielding to industry pressure and "watering down" the NSC stand on the Administration's Occupational Safety & Health bill.

The labor group, at its spring meeting here, charged that the Safety Council had retreated from "what was a sensible, informed and constructive council position on the proposed safety legislation." That position had been worked out last February by a joint committee of the council's Labor and Industry Conferences.

The "tattered remains" of that agreement, the Labor Conference said, amount to "an ambiguous and watered-down position . . . not calculated to convince the public of the council's single-minded devotion to safety."

Doubt as to the council's position already had been raised in the public and Congress, the Labor Conference noted, by the NSC's "sudden postponement of its commitment to testify just a few days before a scheduled appearance" at House committee hearings on the safety bill.

Succumbed to Pressures

What happened to cause the shift was "belated pressures" that reduced the council's position to a "sad state," the Labor Conference declared.

It was told that these pressures were brought to bear on NSC officials after the U.S. Chamber of Commerce obtained a copy of the February agreement. The Chamber has taken an almost hysterical stand in opposition to federal standards for job safety as provided in the pending bill.

The Labor Conference is made up of nearly 100 union and government experts on industrial safety, occupational health and related fields. Its action criticizing the Safety Council for backtracking came through endorsement of a statement by Conference Chairman Paul Connelley, safety director of the Carpenters. The statement had been presented by Connelley to the NSC board of directors, Apr. 16, in a futile attempt to persuade the board to adhere to the February agreement. A report of the Apr. 16 meeting and the events leading up to it was presented to the conference by NSC Vice Pres. for

Court Rules 'Work' Law Doesn't Guarantee a Job

Des Moines, Ia.—Workers who want true job security had better join a union rather than rely on so-called "right-to-work" laws.

That was the substance of a ruling by the Iowa Supreme Court as it rejected the argument of a group of non-union packinghouse workers that Iowa's "work" law protected them against layoffs due to "bumping" by union employes with seniority.

The only thing the state law does, the court observed, is to prohibit union shop agreements that would require workers to join a union to keep a job.

"It does not guarantee employes of a non-union plant the same job security which might be obtained through legitimate collective bargaining."

The Iowa Supreme Court unanimously upheld a decision in Woodbury County District Court at Sioux City dismissing a temporary injunction obtained by non-union workers at the Sioux Quality Packers plant of Armour & Co.

The decision was a major legal test of an "automation" agreement won by the Packinghouse Workers and the Meat Cutters from the meat packing industry. Under the agreement, senior workers who lose their jobs in plant closings or work reductions have the right to transfer to a "replacement" plant.

Last year, Armour closed two plants in Omaha and West Point, Neb., where the UPWA had such an agreement. Armour then bought the Sioux City plant of Iowa Beef Packers, Inc., which was subsequently designated by the union-management automation committee as a "replacement" plant.

When men with top seniority at

Prices Nearly Wipe Out Sizable Gains in Wages

The wage earner's sizable gain in hourly pay over the past year only narrowly nosed out the rapid rise in prices, according to figures released by the Labor Dept.

As a result, the purchasing power of the average worker's weekly pay rose a mere nine-tenths of 1 percent, the Labor Dept. said in its quarterly report on productivity, labor costs and prices.

The report said hourly earnings in the private non-farm sector averaged nearly 6 percent higher in March compared to a year earlier. But prices rose by 3.9 percent and hours of work fell by 1 percent, thus holding worker purchasing power to the gain of nine-tenths of 1 percent.

The report for the first quarter of 1968 showed larger contracts were being negotiated this year, with more emphasis on substantial cash wage increases in the first contract year. Price rises also accelerated during the quarter, with the 1.1 percent hike in consumer prices "the greatest in 10 years."

'Right-to-Work' Law Can't Guarantee Job

West Point where notified to report for work at the Sioux City plant Dec. 4, non-union employes at the latter installation obtained an injunction blocking the action on the ground that it would violate the state law barring union shop agreements.

Judge D. M. Pendleton of the Woodbury County court dismissed the injunction, ruling that the state law did not apply.

In their appeal, the plantiffs argued that under the Iowa "work" law, they were "specifically exempted from the burden of having to prove they are being fired or laid off because they were non-union members when they were being laid off pursuant to a contract between a company and a union."

The Supreme Court disagreed. It noted that even if there had been no contractual obligation, Armour could have applied seniority to the transfer and layoffs in consideration of its long-term employes.

"If the employer could have exercised such right as the prerogative of management," the court said, "the fact that it became an obligation under a collective bargaining agreement does not violate the right to work law."

The master agreement between Armour and the UPWA does not require union shop conditions where they are prohibited by law, the justices observed, adding:

"It places a duty on Armour to provide its employes with the greatest seniority the opportunity to continue to work for the company. . . ."

"This is job security by reason of length of service, not union security by compulsory membership."

The non-union workers argued that under the Iowa "work" law, "when people do determine that they don't want a union to represent them, they have the same protection as though a union did represent them."

This, the court said, "overstates the effect" of the law, whose purpose is to prohibit union shop agreements. It declared:

"We do not believe a provision in a collective bargaining agreement which gives employes of a closed plant the privilege of transferring to a replacement plant on the basis of seniority of service alone is within the concept of union security agreements prohibited" by the law.

Court Bars Expulsion For NLRB Charge

The U.S. Supreme Court has ruled that a member cannot be expelled by a union because he filed charges with the National Labor Relations Board without first exhausting all internal union remedies.

The court reversed the appeals court in the case and by 8 to 1 upheld the NLRB on the finding that the Shipbuilding Workers had committed an unfair labor practice in expelling Edwin Holder.

Holder in 1964 filed a charge with the board accusing the union of causing his employer, the U.S. Lines, of discriminating against him. The charge was ultimately dismissed, but while it was pending the union expelled him for taking his case to the board before using all inter-union appeal procedures.

Holder filed a second charge with the NLRB alleging that his expulsion for filing the first charge was unlawful. The NLRB found the expulsion illegal but was overruled by the appeals court.

Justice Douglas, writing for the majority, declared that "any coercion used to discharge, retard or defeat access (to the NLRB) is beyond the legitimate interests of a labor organization."

Jobless Rate Climbs To 5.7% in Canada

Ottawa—The unemployment rate in Canada reached 5.7 percent of the labor force as 436,000 Canadians were out of work in April, government sources reported.

Although the number of jobless decreased by 52,000 from March, the April figure was 71,000 higher than in the year-ago month. The unemployment rate in April 1967 was 4.9 percent.

Mazzei New Head Of Poverty Agency

Los Angeles—Irvin Mazzei, president of the Los Angeles County Federation of Labor, is the head of the Los Angeles area antipoverty agency.

Mazzei has been elected board chairman of the Economic & Youth Opportunities Agency of Greater Los Angeles. EYOA supervises antipoverty programs in about 85 percent of Los Angeles County with an annual budget of $63 million.

He has served on the EYOA board since its inception in 1965. The agency has served nearly a half million of the county's poor and has created 50,000 jobs for the unemployed.

Labor Papers Win Awards For Excellence

Eleven newspapers and magazines won top awards for editorial excellence in the Intl. Labor Press Association journalistic awards contest and five other editors received special performance honors.

The 1968 contest was the first conducted under a new series of categories voted by the last ILPA convention. The judging was conducted also for the first time by a panel of newspaper and labor experts.

The awards for editorial excellence in the 150,000 and over circulation bracket for international publications, newspapers, went to the IUE News. First place in the magazine category went to the Electrical Workers' Journal.

In the 50,000 to 150,000 circulation bracket the newspaper award went to the American Teacher; the magazine award to the Graphic Arts Unionist. In the under 50,000 circulation bracket The Guild Reporter won the newspaper first place and Canadian Labor topped the magazine field.

For state and local newspapers with circulation over 10,000 the winner was Public Employe Press, New York City. There is no magazine category in this group.

For local union publications with over 25,000 circulation the United Teacher, New York City, won first prize. The Screen Actor, Los Angeles, won first place in the 15,000 to 25,000 range. In the 5,000 to 15,000 bracket the winner was Local 342 News, Butcher Workmen, New York City, and the award for publications with less than 5,000 went to The Lampmaker of UAW Local 663.

Winners of the special performance awards without regard to circulation or type of publication were:

Best original cartoon—IUE News.

Best original photograph—Seafarers Log.

Best editorial or column—Federation News, Chicago.

Best feature story—Ohio AFL-CIO News & Views.

Unique performance — Oregon Labor Press for a series from Viet Nam by Gene Klare.

The judges were Ed Townsend, Business Week; Melvin Mencher, professor, Columbia University Graduate School of Journalism; Julius Manson, New York City Board of Mediation; Herbert Levine, Rutgers University.

Labor Dept. Parley Briefs Union Editors

Labor editors from all parts of the country received a full report on the state of the nation in a three-day Washington briefing.

Government officials, from Pres. Johnson on down, provided in-depth analyses of issues and problems confronting the United States, ranging from Viet Nam to the urban crisis.

The first day's session, called by the Intl. Labor Press Association, was devoted to ILPA business and professional workshops and panels. For the remaining two days, the 160 editors were participants in the Secretary of Labor's Conference for Labor Editors.

High point of the meeting was a reception at the White House, where the editors met Pres. Johnson and Vice Pres. Humphrey and heard the President give a lengthy, off-the-record resume of the social progress that the nation has accomplished since he first came to Washington in 1931.

Chairman of the Secretary of Labor's Conference was John W. Leslie, director of information for the Dept. of Labor.

The first Cabinet-level speaker was Sec. of Agriculture Orville L. Freeman, who used the occasion to announce extension of the Food Stamp and Commodity Food Programs to 1,000 additional poor counties. Freeman also blasted a CBS television program on "Hunger in America" as a "distorted, oversimplified and misleading picture of domestic hunger and what is being done about it." He said the Agriculture Dept. was seeking to extend programs to feed the hungry and to work with the Poor People's Campaign but that fundamental changes would require legislation.

Editors Briefed

Eugene V. Rostow, under secretary of state for political affairs, briefed the editors on the Administration's foreign policy, tracing its development since the U.S. abandoned its isolationist role prior to World War II.

The scope of the nation's housing needs in the urban crisis was outlined by Sec. Robert C. Weaver of the Dept. of Housing & Urban Development. He paid tribute to the contributions of the building trades unions in planning for a leading role in rebuilding the cities.

Assistant Sec. of Labor Esther Peterson appealed strongly for stepped-up support of the Occupational Health & Safety bill now before Congress, stressing among other things the lack of solid statistics on industrial accidents and the growing hazards of radiation and job-connected diseases.

A three-hour panel discussion on jobs and manpower problems explored a wide variety of programs to train unskilled workers and place them in jobs. Assistant Sec. of Labor Stanley Ruttenberg was a major speaker on the panel, which was under the chairmanship of Manpower Assistant Frank Borda.

Another assistant labor secretary, Thomas R. Donahue, explained the operations and administration of the Landrum-Griffin Act and other labor-management legislation.

Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz and Under Sec. James J. Reynolds were hosts at the conference, and Reynolds presided at a number of sessions.

White Elected

The ILPA executive council, at its opening session, elected Lee White, public relations director of the Communications Workers, to fill the vacant vice presidency created by the ineligibility of Thaddeus Ogar of the Auto Workers.

At the ILPA awards banquet, a special plaque was presented to former Vice Pres. Marie V. Downey of the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers.

It was one of five such awards voted by the ILPA council in recognition of the long service of council members stepping out under a constitutional change limiting the tenure of vice presidents. Other recipients designated were Robert R. Gerhart, Jr., of the New Era, Reading, Pa., Harold D. Newton of Kenosha Labor, Ray W. Taylor of the Milwaukee Labor Press, and Dean Ruth of the Machinist.

Actors Appear

The awards banquet also produced surprise appearances by Pres. Charlton Heston of the Screen Actors Guild and Actor Robert Culp, who was drafted to hand out the awards.

Culp, who was in Washington to rally support for the Poor People's Campaign, introduced the Rev. Jesse Jackson of the Southern Christian Leadership Conference, "city manager" of Resurrection City, who also appealed for support of the march and the efforts of the poor to overcome their plight.

Copies of the report of the National Advisory Commission on Civil Disorders, the so-called riot commission, were distributed to all delegates with an appeal from ILPA Pres. Fred Sweet to seek understanding of its "full scope and meaning."

For 'The Peace of Our Cities':

Clothing Workers Contribute $250,000 to Urban Coalition

By Eugene A. Kelly

Miami Beach—The Clothing Workers have achieved "record breaking" progress for more than 400,000 members in the last two years and wish to share that progress by contributing $250,000 to "help preserve the peace of our cities this summer," Pres. Jacob S. Potofsky announced at the union's 26th biennial convention here.

The money, Potofsky told cheering delegates, will be donated to the Urban Coalition, formed by labor, business, government and minority groups, to provide the children of the slums—and young adults, too—with facilities for recreation, education and entertainment at a time when the need is greatest.

The contribution, Potofsky asserted, is "in the highest traditions of Amalgamated service to community life."

Record 2-Year Growth

More than 1,300 representatives of ACWA local unions in the United States, Canada and Puerto Rico were in the hall when Potofsky delivered his report on the state of the union to the opening session of the five-day convention.

Summarizing "unprecedented" gains since the last convention, Potofsky cited:

- The greatest growth in any two-year period in the last two decades—a 22,000 increase in membership to a new high of 407,000 despite the retirement of more than 6,000 active members.
- The largest single wage boost in the union's long history of relations with manufacturers of men's and boys' clothing—57.5 cents an hour for 125,000 workers over the next three years.
- Other gains in addition to an average wage hike of $2,600 over the term of the contract—major improvements in health and retirement benefits; full hospitalization coverage for 120 days, with increased life insurance protection and improved disability payments; new wage minimums not only for time workers but also for piece workers.

Despite severe opposition, ACWA won 55 of 98 National Labor Relations Board elections at 200 locations for an average of more than 56 percent, the officers reported.

Canadian members won a 20 percent increase in wages which, with gains in vacation and insurance benefits, will provide a total package of 52 cents in three years.

The increase in union membership came in the face of what the ACWA Executive Board called "formidable obstacles" created by employer action and government inaction. More than 8,000 new members were won in the South, where opposition to workers organizing has been most vicious, and several thousand others in the Southwest and Midwest.

Anti-Union Obstacles

Significant victories also were recorded in Canada and Puerto Rico, the officers reported. They listed these obstacles to success in many organizing campaigns:

"Workers are threatened not only with plant closing but with having their credit cut off. Non-union workers are practically defenseless against this kind of pressure because, while the law prohibits anti-union threats by the employer himself, it does not prohibit the very same conduct by the employer's vigilante allies" in the shape of community leaders.

The law does not protect the worker when the employer violates it quickly, the board pointed out. If the employer starts intimidating union supporters at the very start of an organizing campaign, before the union has signed a majority, the NLRB will not order the employer to bargain with the union, the officers noted in their report to the convention.

They added: Most important of all, the NLRB continues to be discouragingly slow and inadequate in righting the wrongs that it does have the legal power to correct."

Potofsky said in announcing the union's contribution to the Urban Coalition that "we fervently hope that riots will not occur this summer. But hope is not enough." ACWA itself will donate $50,000 and joint boards will give the rest in consultation with coalition leaders in each community where the need is greatest, Potofsky said.

He pointed out other problems on the economic horizon including imports from low-wage countries, saying "we cannot lick poverty by robbing poor Americans of an opportunity to get decent jobs in our industry."

Potofsky rallied ACWA members to intensify their political action programs this year because "the future of the United States and the world may depend to a large extent on who will be the next president."

If the reins of government fall to reactionaries, he said, "doors which once were open will be shut. Men who shared our hopes for the future will be replaced by others who know little about the labor movement and care less.

Before the convention ends the delegates will chart a program for the future and nominate officers for a new term. Scheduled convention speakers included Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz, Assistant Sec. Esther Peterson, Dir. Cesar Chavez of the United Farm Workers Organizing Committee; Illinois State Treas. Adlai E. Stevenson III; Executive Dir. Bayard Rustin of the A. Philip Randolph Institute; Chairman John W. Gardner of the Urban Coalition, and two leading industrialists, Pres. John. D. Gray of the Clothing Manufacturers Association and Board Chairman Joseph Wilson of the Xerox Corp., with whom the union has contracts.

Anaconda Wire Settles To End 310-Day Strike

Members of the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers are back on the job with wage increases ranging up to 45 cents an hour at Anaconda Wire & Cable Co. in Hastings-on-Hudson, N.Y. The plant was one of the last holdouts in the long copper strike.

The 800 IUE workers agreed to terms of the four-year contract which includes improved pension, hospitalization and vacation plans. The settlement ended a walkout of 310 days.

First phase pay boosts of 15 cents an hour for day workers and 9 cents an hour for incentive worker are retroactive to May 6, 1967, the day the old contract expired.

The day workers will get additional raises of 15 cents an hour on Oct. 1, 1969 and Feb. 1, 1971. Increments of 11 cents an hour will go to incentive workers on the same dates.

In the new pension plan, which is retroactive June 1, 1967, the employer's vesting factor was raised to $5 a month from the previous $2.50. A 35-year limit in pension benefits also has been eliminated.

The contract provides for three weeks vacation after 10 years service and four weeks after 20 years.

Anaconda also will pay up to $30 a month for health care insurance. The IUE employes had been paying up to $17.20 a month for hospitalization coverage under the old contract.

Copper strikes continue involving almost 2,000 members of the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers at three Anaconda plants in Muskegon, Mich., Sycamore, Ill. ,and Marion, Ind.

In other developments:

- No progress was reported by the IBEW in talks to settle strikes against Bell Telephone by 8,300 members in New Jersey and 12,000 in Illinois.
- Insurance agents continue to maintain picket lines around Metropolitan Life Insurance Co. offices across the nation. The 7,000 IWIU agents walked out May 20.
- Negotiations continue between the Steelworkers and major aluminum firms in hopes of averting a strike as the May 31 termination date of the contract covering 50,000 workers neared. Auto Workers and the Aluminum Workers also were involved in the talks.
- Steelworkers Pres. I. W. Abel will lead the union's negotiations team as initial industry-level talks get under way in the basic steel industry in New York City June 3. The Steelworkers have been conducting local and plant-level talks with the steelmakers since May 15.

Rising Prices In April Gnaw Buying Power

Rising prices more than offset gains in take-home pay in April to dilute the purchasing power of the nation's workers.

Real spendable earnings dipped as the Consumer Price Index went up three-tenths of one percent to 119.9 percent, and indications are that the rise would continue for some months to come, the Labor Dept. reported.

The jump in the index means that goods and services which cost $10 a decade ago now cost $11.99. The price index was 4 percent higher than in April 1967.

Hourly earnings of production workers increased an average of 2 cents during April to raise gross weekly pay to a record $104.63 despite a slight decline in weekly hours.

Take-home pay for a worker with three dependents averaged $93.09, a gain of 16 cents from the month earlier. A worker with no dependents had a net pay of $85.50, up 15 cents over March.

But real spendable earnings dropped 13 cents to $77.64 for the worker with three dependents and 11 cents to $71.31 for the worker with no dependents because of the bigger rise in consumer prices.

Food prices were the prime reason for the overall increase in the CPI in April. Prices were raised on nearly all important consumer items except for meats, gasoline and new cars.

About the only other consolation was that the CPI rise was not as high as the four-tenths of one percent in March.

Leading the food prices up were fresh fruits and vegetables: apples, 5 percent; lettice, 36.5 percent, and tomatoes, 3 percent.

Because of April's CPI climb, about 115,000 workers will receive cost of living increases. Some 65,000 aerospace workers will get an extra 3 cents an hour and the rest 1 to 6 cents an hour.

Needs of Rail Safety Law Cited As Train Deaths, Injuries Mount

Railroad labor has appealed to Congress for speedy passage of a strong rail safety law to curb a "shocking and rising" death and injury toll from railroad accidents.

The appeal came from A. H. Chesser, chairman of the safety committee of the Railway Labor Executives' Association, and Pres. Harold C. Crotty of the Maintenance of Way Employes in testimony before the House Commerce Committee.

They supported an Administration rail safety bill but stressed that the measure needs amendments "to safeguard the rights of railroad employes and the rights of states to legislate rail safety."

The Administration's bill was submitted to Congress by Transportation Sec. Alan Boyd and has been introduced by Rep. Harley O. Staggers (D-W.Va.) and Sen. Warren G. Magnuson (D-Wash.), chairmen of the House and Senate Commerce Committees.

The legislation, Boyd said, would replace present "piecemeal" rail safety laws with a comprehensive statute "authorizing the secretary of transportation to promulgate safety requirements" for locomotives, rolling stock, tracks, equipment and other rail facilities.

Chesser testified that "railway labor strongly supports the basic thrust of this legislation because of its long standing and deep concern over the deplorable safety record of the railroads."

He cited government figures to show that in 1966 there were 2,684 persons killed and 25,552 injured in 6,793 train accidents—"a record for recent years for which comparable figures are available."

"Preliminary figures for 1967," Chesser continued, "indicate that train accidents last year exceeded the record 1966 levels by about 5 percent; and the first two months of 1968 exceeded the same months in 1967 by about 10 percent."

Chesser charged that "responsibility" for accidents must be placed on the carriers who refuse to practice safety, lack of "meaningful government action to compel safety" and "wide gaps" in existing railway safety laws.

Crotty testified on areas of the bill that would require regular inspection of tracks, bridges and structures and provide adequate flagging protection from moving trains for employes working on such bridges and structures.

He submitted examples of accidents resulting from defective or improperly maintained tracks and bridges. The Administration bill, Crotty added, would for the first time empower the government to act "to prevent accidents."

Meanwhile, the committee's opening witness for the bill—Federal Railroad Administrator A. Sheffer Lang—also listed grim figures on train accidents, showing that their monthly average increased 76 percent between 1961 and 1967.

Merit Awards Given By N.Y. Label Council

Albany, N.Y. — State Attorney Gen. Louis J. Lefkowitz was among three persons cited by the New York state Union Label & Service Trades Dept. for outstanding service.

Lefkowitz received the Union Label Award of Merit for his efforts in protecting consumers. Other recipients were John A. Manella, president of the Capitol District Union Label & Service Trades Council, for work in the Albany-Troy area, and the late Rev. Joseph P. Lamanna, Schenectady, N.Y., for a lifetime of service to the labor movement and underprivileged people.

Without a Contract...

AN IMPORTANT CASE in the Iowa courts has shed some new light on the hypocrisy of the "right-to-work" laws and the basic values and protection that flow from a union contract.

The case arose when Armour & Co. bought a small Sioux City plant with 200 workers—all union—and notified them they would be replaced because Armour's union contract called for job preference to union members who lost their jobs when the company closed plants in Nebraska.

The non-union workers sought protection in the Iowa "right-to-work" law arguing that "when people determine that they don't want a union to represent them, they have the same protection as though a union did represent them."

The Iowa Supreme Court rejected this argument, declaring that the "right-to-work" law merely prohibits unions and management from requiring union membership as a condition of holding a job.

The Des Moines Register, taking note of the decision commented in part:

"The Iowa Beef employes could have organized a union to negotiate severance pay and job-security provisions that would have become part of Armour's liability when it bought the plant. That they did not is their misfortune—not the misfortune of Armour employes who did negotiate such a contract."

Convenient Scapegoat

THE TRADE UNION movement has become a convenient scapegoat for those looking for easily identified "villains" rather than applying rational analysis to a difficult situation. The latest case in hand is the March trade deficit that finds imports exceeding exports for the first time since 1963.

When the Commerce Dept. recently released the figures for March the news stories had a uniform paragraph or two laying blame in large part on an 11-day dock strike in New York.

The Federal Reserve Bulletin had a somewhat different explanation—coffee imports to replenish low inventories, a catching-up of petroleum imports, a sharp spurt in automotive imports from Canada, a rise in steel and copper imports. It also mentioned the dock strike, and added:

"Apart from these factors, some of the residual deterioration may perhaps be explainable by changing demand conditions here and abroad."

The Journal of Commerce noted that in the period from December 1967 through February 1968—before the dock strike—exports had averaged only $140 million a month higher than imports—less than half the 1967 average. It noted also:

"Had it not been for the New York tieup, imports would have smashed a new record" in March.

There are obviously a number of factors that underlie the nation's weakened trade balance this year that have nothing to do with temporary conditions, including 11-day strikes.

To single out unions as a scapegoat is false and misleading. It focuses attention away from the real problems confronting the nation on international trade, problems that need careful and honest analysis.

The Union Label

In Public Worker Bargaining:

Cold Facts—Not Hot Tempers—Called Must for Negotiations

The following is excerpted from an address by Sam Zagoria, member of the National Labor Relations Board, to the Labor Law Institute for Laymen at Columbus, Ohio, on "A New Frontier in Collective Bargaining: Public Workers and Citizen Bosses."

I WANT TO DISCUSS some aspects of unionization of public employes, which is now growing at the rate of 1,000 new members every working day. And the potential for accelerated growth is readily apparent. City and state payrolls have risen from 3.5 million to 8.9 million in the past two decades. Federal employment has not been as explosive, rising from 2 million to 2.8 million in the same period. The projected growth in state and local governments alone anticipates another 4 million workers by 1975.

The present and projected growth of union organization of government employes represents a coming major problem and I place it on the table here because government belongs to all of us. Like it or not, we are all citizen bosses. Occasionally speakers do talk of government as if it is some foreign force, but oratory aside, there is no escaping the fact that we all have responsibility in dealing with public employes.

As part of the bargaining process I suggest that we explore more fully the potential of fact-finding. Obviously, facts about the status of a group of public workers will inevitably be discussed during the bargaining process, but because this group of workers is employed by all of us I suggest that we all be confronted by relevant facts.

I believe that deep down we want to be fair to the people who serve us in government; we don't expect them to subsidize our services by sacrificing themselves or their families.

Fact-finding has advantages for the government worker and the administrator. Setting union demands in perspective not only helps convince management; it helps employes understand and accept realistic settlement proposals. It helps the administrator convince the budget-maker and the legislator that he did not lose his head; he used it. It helps the public gauge the fairness of demands and the fairness of the settlement and to exert some influence at stages in between.

WOULD IT NOT HELP the governmental unit and its employes—and the rest of us, too—to have the findings of an objective but expert body on what are comparable wages and benefits in other jurisdictions, in comparable industries, in fields requiring the same amount of education, training or license, in activities posing similar danger to life, limb and peace of mind?

These could be sketched against a backdrop of gains in productivity in this group as compared nationally and changes in the cost of living here. These items are only suggestive, not inclusive. It may be that the protagonists themselves may not be able to provide such data; it may be necessary to expand the resources of the Bureau of Labor Statistics, the Dept. of Commerce, and private agencies in order to provide the information essential to federal, state and local negotiations.

To be sure there will be differences of opinion over what figures are appropriate and accurate, but don't underestimate John Q. Citizen. Through the years he's shown great wisdom in selecting from among conflicting claims on the grocer's shelves or between candidates' platforms.

Too, there will be some matters in dispute that do not lend themselves to conversion into arithmetic, but the basic principle of demonstrating current practice elsewhere in comparable situations should help define the competing points of view. People will still have to make judgements whether a school teacher should receive more pay than a trash collector, but what better way to make us consider what these services are really worth to us.

Strengthening fact-finding, in my view, is a more attractive alternative than others that have been suggested. It has the additional virtues of putting the emphasis on cold facts, rather than hot tempers; of bringing the public, which consumes the services and pays the bills, into the bargaining picture with a chance to achieve fair play. While it is no cure-all in disagreements, it is positive. It offers machinery for peace, not merely penalties.

Hopes vs. Realities:

Road to Peace a 2-Way Street Of De-Escalation in Viet Nam

The following is excerpted from a statement "Negotiations—Hopes vs. Realities" issued by a special committee on negotiations of the Citizens Committee for Peace with Freedom in Viet Nam.

THE UNITED STATES welcomes negotiations which offer a hope of peace with freedom and honor in Viet Nam—a responsible and durable settlement of this long, bloody and costly war. But negotiations are merely a beginning to an end. And the end is not yet in sight.

The road to a negotiated settlement of the war in Viet Nam is likely to be long and hard. It is likely to twist and turn and take agonizing detours. And we face the unhappy prospect of continued bloodshed. A cease-fire is more likely to come at the end than at the beginning of a negotiating process.

We should not be discouraged or deceived by rhetoric. It is not how Hanoi says something; it is what it says . . . and, more importantly, does.

Negotiations will be desirable if they lead to a mutual de-escalation of the conflict, and if they advance the prospect of achieving our minimum objectives. They will be dangerous and undesirable if they develop into a long drawn-out sequence of meaningless round-table discussions while our fighting men continue to pay, under conditions made more difficult by our restraint, a high daily toll of death and disability.

Negotiations will be insupportable if Hanoi escalates its military effort in the face of the reduction in ours. We must bear in mind that once negotiations begin, the pressure to continue them will be infinitely more insistent on us than on them. We are highly responsive to domestic and to world opinion; Hanoi is far less responsive to both.

The pattern of negotiations will reflect the military, economic and political strength of the opposing forces in Viet Nam. One of the greatest of these strengths is resolution—the determination to see the struggle through—and the communication of that determination to the enemy. We would be foolish to expect Hanoi to negotiate a mutually satisfactory settlement of the war if their leaders believe that the resolution of the United States and South Viet Nam is failing.

WE MUST UNCEASINGLY make it clear to Hanoi that we do not seek nor will we accept a camouflaged surrender which would inevitably result in the United States "writing off" Southeast Asia for the foreseeable future. We could survive such a catastrophe—but our citizenry should be clear that the whole security system, which has maintained peace and freedom for the past generation, would be eroded—if not destroyed—by an American retreat from our commitments in Southeast Asia. We would become a relatively isolated and less influential nation.

One cannot over-emphasize what we do not seek in Viet Nam; we do not seek the surrender of North Viet Nam or to destroy it or its people. Rather, we seek freedom for South Viet Nam and an end of the aggression directed from the North. We fight for peace with freedom and honor.

"Instant" victory is, unfortunately, not available to us on the battlefield or at the negotiating table. In both arenas, we must beware of impatience, disillusionment, and extremist and simplistic answers to complex problems. Particularly, if negotiations should break down, we must re-survey our position and weigh carefully the danger of over-reacting and of sharply escalating our military effort in search of a quick "victory."

America has, by its unilateral de-escalation of the conflict, demonstrated to the world our devotion to peace. It would now seem both prudent and warranted for us not to make further concessions without reciprocal, although not necessarily simultaneous, acts from the other side.

Mutual de-escalation is by definition a two-way street. Hanoi cannot always take and never give; always demand everything and never concede anything. A sequence of unilateral concessions by us, not reciprocated by Hanoi, would be the road to surrender.

We believe there is one thing that the United States should not do. We should not exert pressure on South Viet Nam to accept a coalition government.

Any representation of the National Liberation Front in the political structure of South Viet Nam should occur as a result of a free political choice expressed by the South Vietnamese themselves. All citizens of South Viet Nam can fully participate in the democratic process—on a one man-one vote basis—without the foreign imposition of a coalition government. History is replete with examples of Communist takeovers of governments by obtaining control of key ministries such as defense, justice, police and propaganda. Indeed, Czechoslovakia is only now emerging from 20 years of totalitarianism following a "coalition government."

Finally, America must not expect too much to flow from a resolution of the conflict in Viet Nam. We live in a world of great anti-pathetic historical forces. There is no early prospect for world peace in the traditional sense. There is conflict in today's world and conflict—political, economic or even military—will unquestionably continue at various levels and in various places for the foreseeable future.

Our basic continuing objective is to hold such conflict within the bounds that permit the survival of mankind. That is why we adhere to our generous and farsighted policy—the willingness to fight a limited conflict, with limited means, at limited risk for limited objectives.

The success or failure of that policy may well be decisive in shaping not only the destiny of South Viet Nam and of Southeast Asia but of the entire world.

Plight of 9.1 Million:

Many Poor—on Fulltime Jobs—Can't Rise Above Poverty Line

THE NUMBER of poor people in the country decreased by more than 9 million from 1959 to 1966, notes Mollie Orshansky in a report on the latest Social Security Administration study on poverty and low income.

In "The Shape of Poverty in 1966," Miss Orshansky reports that although the number of persons living in poverty declined from 38.9 million to 29.7 million in the period from 1959 through 1966, a larger proportion of the poor in 1966 were persons whose earning capacity was limited by age, family responsibilities, race discrimination, or other factors.

Significantly, 9.1 million persons were counted poor in 1966 although the family breadwinner worked throughout the year. Over a third of all children growing up poor in 1966 were in families of men who did work through the year but couldn't earn enough to support them.

While many were rising above the poverty line during these "seven years of plenty," the number of near poor—those whose incomes are just barely above the poverty threshold—showed only a small decline, from 15.8 million in 1959 to 15.2 million in 1966.

Without public income-maintenance programs, Miss Orshansky reports, the number of poor households in 1965 would have been 15.9 million instead of 11.2 million. The social security program itself, she points out, was responsible for keeping at least 3½ million households above the poverty line.

Yet families headed by man who works but is unable to make sufficient income can normally find "no avenue of aid," since public programs are mainly geared to serve those who cannot work at all or are temporarily out of a job.

It is clear that new programs or extensions of existing ones will be needed to lift these families of breadwinners with limited earnings capacity above the poverty line, the article concludes. For many now receiving help from public programs, escape from poverty can come only with increased payments.

By Press Associates, Inc.

AS THE 90TH CONGRESS STRUGGLES through the last months of its life to a target adjournment date of late July or early August, it is faced with a vast backlog of legislation and appropriations bills.

These are grim days as two separate, but related, struggles take place on Capitol Hill which color the entire legislative picture.

One is the continuing fight over the demands of congressional conservatives for a $6 billion slash in domestic programs before final approval is given to Pres. Johnson's demand for a 10 percent surtax.

The second is the Poor People's March on Washington and the movement into the Capital of thousands of poor from across the nation, demanding vast programs to provide jobs, social welfare, housing and similar legislation designed to ease the plight of the poor.

The mutual contradictory facets of the two struggles highlights the fundamental decisions which must be made by the Congress before it adjourns.

Meanwhile, organized labor is pushing hard for the funding of social welfare legislation passed in the last four years which, it believes, may go down the drain if the $6 billion slash is put into operation. It also seeks additional advances in housing, education, war on poverty, safety and consumer programs.

The Poor People's March puts a spotlight on the urgent needs in meeting the problems of poverty. The nature of the march, its objectives, its ability to continue its non-violent tone, makes it extremely controversial.

It was first conceived and planned by Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr., and the Southern Christian Leadership Conference. When Dr. King was murdered in Memphis, the mantle fell to his top aide, Rev. Ralph Abernathy.

What are the objectives of the march?

REV. ABERNATHY SAYS IT IS for jobs or better jobs, with more opportunity for advancement. It's for education and better schools and instruction. It's for clean, decent housing in habitable neighborhoods.

The marchers want safe streets and fair police protection. It is all too easy to forget that Negroes, themselves, are more often victims of crime than are white people.

From the standpoint of history, great progress has been made in these areas the last seven and one-half years, but much more needs to be done.

Shortly prior to his death, Dr. King said that he would settle, for the present, on a bill introduced by Rep. John Conyers (D-Mich.).

Among the more important provisions of this proposal are:

- Full employment opportunity—three million sub-professional public service jobs in schools, hospitals, law enforcement, etc. through federal grants to governmental and non-profit agencies. Emphasis on basic education and on-the-job training.
- A $2 an hour minimum wage and coverage extended to all workers.
- A family allowance program modeled along the lines of the 25-year-old Canadian plan. It would provide grants of $10 monthly to all children under 18.
- One million additional federally assisted low-and-moderate income housing units each year for the next ten years. One-half of the units would be in public housing and under rent supplement.
- Federal grants to local school boards for greater than average per-pupil expenditures to ghetto schools to finance intensive improvement programs.
- Massive increase in federal assistance for post-secondary education, partially by grants to schools and by loans to students.

Just how Congress handles the two struggles is the drama the nation watches.

GROWTH RECORDS were set last year by the Union Labor Life Insurance Co., Pres. Edmund P. Tobin reported at ULLICO's 41st annual meeting in Boston. The business session was followed by a luncheon addressed by Vice Adm. Arnold F. Schade, commander of the Atlantic Fleet submarine force. From left: Tobin, Adm. Schade, and AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler, who serves on the board of the union-owned company.

Men's Futures Built In D.C. Labor Project

Project Build is laying a foundation for 160 young men to erect a future in the building and construction trades in the Washington, D.C. area.

The people behind Project Build also hope to develop the program into a model training center to set the pattern for other communities throughout the country.

A $416,000 grant from the Labor Dept. to the Greater Washington Central Labor Council and the Washington Building & Construction Trades Council was used to set up the operation.

It prepares the youths for apprenticeship in eight building trades: bricklaying, carpentry, cement-finishing, electrical work, painting, plastering, plumbing and sheet metal work.

The enrollees—mainly Negroes 17 to 23 years old—are receiving a wide range of instruction and work experience during two six-month cycles. Eighty men are in each group.

Currently, the trainees are assigned to two non-profit construction corporations which are rehabilitating run-down homes and apartments in center city Washington.

After six weeks of basic preparation, the students are encouraged to specialize in one area and begin to concentrate on experience to meet the requirements for entrance into that craft.

Each trainee is issued a full set of tools to meet the needs of his particular craft. This has been a major factor in developing incentive in the men, said Roland J. Williams, director of Build.

As they start to specialize, the trainees are paid $1.60 an hour. Two pay increases bring their wages up to $1.90 by the end of the course.

There is one journeyman coach for every four trainees. A coach for each of the eight trades also supervises the students on the job.

Two nights a week, the trainees return to Build training center for brush-up courses on various high school subjects that will be helpful in their particular trade—and help round out the overall training of the men.

The board of education has provided two teachers for these special schooling sessions.

After completing the training program, the trainees are assigned to the appropriate joint apprenticeship committee for entry in their craft.

Chatak to Head Organizing For USWA

Pittsburgh, Pa.—Pres. I. W. Abel of the Steelworkers announced establishment of a new Dept. of Organization at USWA headquarters here and named Elmer Chatak to head it.

Chatak is 38, and a native of Harmar Township in Allegheny County, Pa., where his father, the late Smaile (Smiley) Chatak was one of the first full-time organizers for the steel union.

Since 1942, USWA organizing activity has been conducted on a regional basis by the union's 29 district directors. District organizing efforts will be continued but the new Dept. of Organization will add special assistance where needed and will coordinate inter-district drives, Abel said.

USWA membership is nearing 1.2 million.

Union Course Graduates 32 'New' Citizens

Madison, Wis.—Thirty-two high school juniors became "journeymen" citizens with their graduation from the Citizen Apprenticeship Program here. This is a nine-week course on community health, welfare and social services in Madison and Dane counties.

Keynote speaker John D. Carney, education director of the Steelworkers and founder of the CAP program, told the graduates that it was gratifying to see the youth of the nation study and develop social services "to better understand and serve the community in which we live."

The graduation climaxed the second annual CAP program which gives the youngsters an opportunity for an in-depth study of the operations of health and welfare agencies in the community.

Janice Thurber, a graduating CAP student, said the program is "a tremendous implement for interesting young people in social work and increasing public understanding and acceptance of social services."

The CAP program in Madison is sponsored jointly by Retail Clerks Local 1401 and the United Community Chest.

Job Accidents Cost $3.4 Million Hourly

On-the-job accidents cost the U.S. economy $3.4 million every hour of the workday, the Labor Dept. estimates—adding up to $6.8 billion over the year.

This total includes, the department said, $1.5 billion in lost wages as well as $3.8 billion lost in production and $1.5 billion in medical expenses and insurance fees.

But that's just the measurable part of the cost.

After Oregon Loss:

California Rebound Crucial to Kennedy

By John M. Barry

Sen. Robert F. Kennedy rallied his campaign forces for the June 4 California primary in a crucial effort to salvage his bid for the Democratic presidential nomination following his crushing defeat in Oregon.

The winner of the Oregon primary—Sen. Eugene J. McCarthy with 45 percent of the vote against Kennedy's 39 percent—was bent on maintaining the momentum gained by the victory and on capturing the big bloc of 174 convention delegates at stake in California.

The big advantage from the Oregon results, however, seemed to accrue to Vice Pres. Humphrey who has remained out of the primaries, quietly gathering delegate support while the two senators butted heads.

Kennedy's strategy was to string together an unbroken chain of primary victories that would give him a bargaining position at the Democratic convention, which opens in Chicago, Aug. 26.

The single defeat in Oregon—the first ever suffered in an election by any Kennedy—may be enough to break the chain.

Lawrence F. O'Brien, the former postmaster general who is one of the New York senator's top campaign aides, described the Oregon results as a "setback, but not in any sense a disaster," and called California "the big one."

Shortly before the Oregon vote, however, Kennedy himself had said: "I can't afford to lose if I'm going to remain an active and viable candidate. If I lose it's going to affect me in a very serious way."

For McCarthy, the victory invigorated a drive that had seemed to falter in Indiana and Nebraska, where Kennedy led the balloting.

For the Vice President, the Oregon results effectively slowed, and may have stopped, the threat from Kennedy, until now his strongest rival. Humphrey was not on the ballot in Oregon and received a write-in vote of only 4 percent. Pres. Johnson, listed on the ballot as a candidate despite his withdrawal, received 13 percent.

Meanwhile, a copyrighted survey of convention delegations by Newsweek magazine indicated that none of the primary results may have more than passing significance since, in the eight weeks since Johnson's withdrawal, "Hubert Humphrey has almost made off with the Democratic nomination."

Newsweek credited Humphrey with 290 solid delegate commitments and 989½ votes leaning toward his candidacy for a total of 1,279½, just 32½ votes short of the needed majority.

The magazine gave Kennedy 713½ convention votes and McCarthy 280, with 349 listed as uncommitted.

On the Republican side of the Oregon ballot, former Vice Pres. Richard M. Nixon continued his record of big primary victories, receiving 73 percent of the vote against 23 percent for California Gov. Ronald Reagan. A last-minute write-in campaign for New York Gov. Nelson Rockefeller produced only a 4 percent return.

Morse Wins

The Oregon Democratic race for U.S. senator was a cliff-hanger as the incumbent, Wayne Morse, held a paper-thin lead through most of the count over former Rep. Robert B. Duncan. A recheck of Lane County tabulations, however, gave Morse almost 4,000 more votes and a margin of nearly 5,000 with 94 percent of the ballots counted. His opponent in November will be State Rep. Robert Packwood.

In Kentucky, where Sen. Thruston B. Morton (R) is retiring this year, the Democratic nomination went to Katherine Peden, a broadcasting executive who was the only woman member of the National Advisory Commission on Civil Disorders. She defeated 11 rivals, the closest of whom was former Rep. John Young Brown. She will compete against Jefferson County Judge Marlow W. Cook.

In Florida, former Gov. LeRoy Collins won a narrow victory for the Democratic nomination for the U.S. Senate seat being vacated by George A. Smathers.

He will face Rep. Edward J. Gurney, who easily won the Republican nomination in the first primary. A slate of Democratic convention delegates pledged to Smathers as a favorite son, but leaning to Humphrey, took 59 of the 63 seats.

IAM Wins Pay Boost, Dental Care in Strike

San Francisco—Pay raises up to 94 cents an hour and a new dental care plan were hammered out by the Machinists for 15,000 members in the San Francisco Bay-Oakland area after a seven-week strike.

The three-year package also provides for a cost of living escalator and improvements in health and welfare benefits, vacations, pensions and sick leave.

More than 6,000 of the IAM members struck the California Metal Trades Association — made up of 82 firms—and several large independent companies to win the agreement. It was ratified by employes of nearly 200 machine shops, manufacturing firms and electronic companies.

In the dental care plan, which goes into effect June 1, 75 percent of the bills will be paid for by the IAM members and their dependents.

The employers contribute $10.30 monthly per employe for the plan. Employes will pay the first 25 percent of the dental bill and the plan will pay the remainder.

These are the increases in the wage scale:

- Maintenance machinists—Up 62 cents this year, 16 cents next year and 16 cents in 1970 for a total of 94 cents. They now earn $4.60 an hour.
- Journeymen—Up 50 cents this year and 16 cents each of the next two years, totaling 82 cents. Their pay is now $4.24 an hour.
- Specialists—Up 26 cents this year and 11 cent raises in the two subsequent years of the contract to total 48 cents. They now earn $3.52 an hour.
- Production workers—Up 24 cents this year and 11 cents in each of the next years for a total of 46 cents. Their rate now ranges from $3.04 to $3.22 an hour.

'Single Greatest Challenge':

ILG Sets Stepped-Up Drive To Sign Exploited Workers

Atlantic City—Delegates to the Ladies' Garment Workers 33rd convention here were told that "the single greatest challenge facing the union" is to organize exploited workers all across the land.

"All of our standards are jeopardized," ILGWU Pres. Louis Stulberg warned, "as long as there are places to which unscrupulous employers can escape in search for cheap, non-union labor."

The convention reacted by adopting a resolution that called for expanding the union's organization department, stepping up organizing in the South and West and seeking to unionize office employes in the garment industry.

The convention also was to receive a proposal to increase per capita dues to meet the added organizing costs and strengthen the union's strike fund.

Meanwhile, the more than 1,000 delegates acted upon scores of other resolutions covering a wide range of economic, political and international issues, in addition to union and industry matters.

In one of its earliest actions, the convention unanimously endorsed the Freedom Budget, first proposed by AFL-CIO Vice Pres. A. Philip Randolph, and the legislative program of the AFL-CIO to resolve the crises of the cities.

The endorsement came in a civil rights policy statement which emphasized that the nation "must turn up the timetable for a speedy end to poverty."

"We have the means; there is a way," the statement said. "We must assert our will through a moral commitment to bring jobs, education, and housing to every family in America."

To show they were determined to back their words with action, the delegates recommended that the union's board "set aside $1 million to be devoted to supporting the movement to eradicate poverty and discrimination."

Highlight sessions of the convention included those addressed by an unscheduled speaker—Pres. Johnson—and the man who seeks to succeed him in office, Vice Pres. Humphrey. Both received tumultuous ovations and Humphrey won convention endorsement.

Delegates also heard speeches by Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz; Roy Wilkins, executive director of the NAACP; Betty Furness, the President's special assistant for consumer affairs; Dir. Bayard Rustin of the A. Philip Randolph Institute; Dr. Phan Quang Dan, head of South Viet Nam's Free Democratic Party; and New Jersey Gov. Richard J. Hughes (D).

The convention saluted AFL-CIO Vice Pres. David Dubinsky, who headed the union for 34 years prior to his retirement in June 1966.

Stulberg, chosen by the ILGWU's board as successor to Dubinsky, introduced him as the leader who "has made his contributions above all others to this organization." Dubinsky then recalled some of the early struggles of the union.

In his keynote address, Stulberg reported that ILGWU has made "significant progress" since its last convention three years ago and that its membership now is at a record high of 451,192.

Although this figure represents only a net gain of 8,874 members over the period, Stulberg pointed out that the increase had been achieved despite a departure of 181,841 workers from membership rolls because of deaths, retirements and illnesses—and the family responsibility of women who make up 80 percent of the union's membership.

In other words, he noted, the union has succeeded in signing up close to 191,000 new members since 1965.

But at the same time, Stulberg said, "I must warn you that we have only begun the job that must be done."

Emphasizing that there are still some 250,000 unorganized workers in women's and children's apparel industries, he noted that "thousands of these employes are being exploited and their exploitation endangers our standards."

In another area, Stulberg traced "steady" gains the members have made in wages, benefits, pensions and health and welfare programs since 1965, but he added:

"We cannot afford to slow our efforts. We must continue to fight aggressively for improved wages and working conditions . . . We must improve our benefits and increase them."

Wirtz told the delegates that the "nation now has the capacity" to eliminate poverty, unemployment and under-education but the important question is, "are the people ready to do it?"

He deplored so-called liberals who talk "but do not take any action" toward improving the welfare of the nation's poor. "My years in office," Wirtz said, "have led me to discover one thing: that the labor movement is the most effective voice for liberalism there is in America."

Miss Furness saluted the ILGWU for its "pioneer work" on behalf of its members as consumers through its programs to lower the price of drugs and eyeglasses, and its medical mobile units set up on the West Coast and elsewhere.

She urged all unions to help lead the "revolution of the consumer" which is now underway and demands safety in automobiles, wholesome meats, clean poultry and safe and economical drugs.

Rustin and Wilkins lauded ILGWU for its long history of fighting against discrimination and injustice. Both emphasized that the battle must be accentuated if America is to head off a polarization of blacks and whites and a threatened destruction of its democracy.

CLAMOROUS WELCOME was given to Pres. Johnson by more than 1,000 delegates to the Ladies' Garment Workers convention in Atlantic City as the President made a surprise appearance.

Humphrey Pledges He'll Invest in Peoples' Need

gister-and-vote drives and "help elect a liberal Congress that will enact the program of a liberal president."

Humphrey announced plans for holding a series of forums in cities and towns around the nation at which individual citizens, workers and community leaders will be invited to give their views and policy suggestions.

Labeling them "Humphrey listens" meetings, he said he would attend as many of them as possible to help shape his campaign because "I want to hear from the people. I want them to participate in the politics of their country."

In line with the resolution, Humphrey said he is campaigning as a "doer," pledged to build upon the record of Presidents Truman, Kennedy and Johnson and dedicated to the belief that America must "invest" in its human resources.

"Every penny we invest to bring health to our sick, education to our untrained, jobs to our jobless—will come back a hundredfold to the enrichment of America," he declared.

The nation "has the wealth" and it must be put to work wisely "to develop the underdeveloped millions whose hands and whose minds will bring new greatness to America," he said, adding:

"This must be the year in which a national decision is made to proceed with the investment."

Pres. Johnson asked the delegates—and all Americans—to demand of all presidential candidates that they deal with the issues and explain their solution for the nation's pressing problems.

"If I could have one hope," he continued, "it would be this: that whoever may be President . . . will look at the social record of the last five years and say, 'we have just begun.'"

Noting that the ILGWU is dedicated "to moving forward"—, Johnson added, "I hope our next President will continue as you have" by working to "build and heal and unite the greatest nation in the world."

By their vote, the garment workers demonstrated their belief that Humphrey best fits the President's pattern.

REV. RALPH D. ABERNATHY, head of the Southern Christian Leadership Conference, receives an honorary membership card and a check for $5,000 for the Poor People's campaign from Pres. Max Greenberg, right, of the Retail, Wholesale & Dept. Store Union and Alvin E. Heaps, secretary-treasurer. The presentation was made during a meeting of the union's general council in Washington.

Distillery Workers Aim For Industry Pensions

The Distillery Workers convention put the establishment of an industry-wide pension plan at the top of the union's priority list in major contract negotiations this year and next.

Delegates to the 14th biennial convention in Washington, D.C., mandated union bargainers to seek higher pension benefits, along with portability and early vesting, in negotiations this year with the wine industry and next year with major distillers.

The convention called for intensified organizing efforts, at both the local and national levels.

The delegates also:

- Returned Pres. Mort Brandenburg, Sec.-Treas. George J Oneto and 11 vice presidents for four-year terms.
- Authorized continued membership assessments to raise the union strike support fund from the present top of $400,000 to $500,000 to finance striking members at the Hiram Walker & Sons distillery in Windsor, Ont.
- Increased per capita payments by local unions from $1.50 a month to $1.60, and authorized establishment of a staff pension fund for employes of the international union and for locals that want to participate.
- Pledged continuance of a nationwide boycott against Stitzel-Weller Co. products and the effort to win bargaining rights lost when management destroyed the union's local six years ago at Shively, Ky. The firm distributes Old Fitzgerald, Cabin Still, Old Elk and W. W. Weller whiskeys, now boycotted by the labor movement.

Pres. George Baldanzi of the United Textile Workers swore in the officers at the convention's close. They included Vice Presidents Victor Bryan, Baltimore; Gene Bufalino, Los Angeles; Roy Cairns, Vancouver, B.C.; John E. McKiernan, Louisville, Ky.; Andrew Moller, Sacramento, Calif.; John O'Grady, George Orlando and Jack Schwartzberg, New York, N.Y.; Edward O'Neill and Joseph Slota, Chicago, and Anthony Salupo, Cleveland, O.

Three union auditors also were inducted: Alfred A. Fontana and Frank Truatt, New Jersey; Sam Jacobs, Philadelphia.

Convention resolutions asked for a reduction in federal, state and local alcohol taxes, now at their highest point; a sharing in the benefits of automation by a more rapid reduction in the workweek at no reduction in wage rates; and improved job training opportunities for the unemployed along with a "truly national" public employment service.

The convention urged Congress to strengthen the National Labor Relations Act to "make a reality of the right to organize and bargain collectively." It asked repeal of Section 14(b), permitting states to bar union shop agreements and restoration of pre-hearing elections to help speed up present "inordinate and interminable delays" in NLRB proceedings.

Doll Union Votes Support To Humphrey

Liberty, N.Y.—Delegates to the Doll Workers convention here voted a unanimous endorsement of Hubert H. Humphrey's presidential candidacy and adopted a broad-ranging program for social, political and trade union progress.

Pres. Harry O. Damino reported a gain of 8,000 members in the two years since the last convention, but warned against "complacency" in the face of massive problems facing the nation and the labor movement.

He stressed, equality of opportunity, "intensive" political action, promotion of the union label and organizing as "major and immediate objectives."

On civil rights, Damino told the 260 delegates, "It is up to us, the dedicated ones in the fight for human brotherhood, to do our share to help win over the bigots, the racists, the hypocrites who talk one way and act another, and the people who refuse to change with the times."

The convention called for enactment of a national health insurance program, improvement of workmen's compensation, strengthened enforcement of the National Labor Relations Act and strong support for COPE.

They applauded a call by Peter M. McGavin, executive secretary of the AFL-CIO Maritime Trades Dept., for worldwide fair labor standards to meet the problems of runaway ships and industry.

Boyd Approach Hit:

Positive Plan Urged To Bolster Shipping

A "fair and equitable" merchant marine program that would end 32 years of "discrimination" in the maritime industry was called for by Paul Hall, president of the Seafarers and the AFL-CIO Maritime Trades Dept.

Appearing before the House Merchant Marine Committee which is holding hearings on a series of maritime bills, Hall called for a flexible program keyed to expansion of the merchant marine. He warned that the nation could no longer tolerate delay on enacting a proper program.

Hall told the committee that the proposals recently submitted by Transportation Sec. Alan S. Boyd discloses Boyd's "consistently wrong" approach to maritime problems.

"He wants to pull the props out from under our domestic shipbuilding industry and our American-flag shipping industry," Hall declared. Boyd's proposals, Hall added, point up the "inescapable fact" that the answer to development of a maritime program lies with Congress and that it's time to "get on with the job."

Hall's comments on the Boyd plan was the latest in a series of sharply critical reactions from key congressmen and the trade unions in the industry. The chairmen of the Senate Merchant Marine subcommittee and the House Merchant Marine Committee have both attacked the Boyd program.

Boyd called for building ships in foreign yards, no expansion of the merchant marine, no building of nuclear powered ships, elimination of subsidies to passenger liners and rigid restrictions on other subsidies.

Joseph Curran, president of the National Maritime Union and chairman of the AFL-CIO Maritime Committee, had commented earlier that Boyd "has presented an inadequate, unimaginative and unsatisfactory program that is designed to kill the U.S. merchant marine."

Hall noted that the Boyd proposals were in large part the cornerstones of the Inter-Agency Task Force Report of 1965, strongly opposed by unions and members of Congress, and had been proposed in other forms by Boyd since then.

In his testimony before the House committee, Hall said that four problems must be resolved in drafting a new maritime program:

- "How to achieve a fair and equitable ship construction program that will protect the government's present contractual obligations (to subsidized operators) and still make possible the extension of this program to the rest of the merchant marine.
- "How to expand the construction differential program to prevent discrimination against the operators who have so long been denied this form of assistance.
- "How to enlarge the operating differential program to protect the interests of the entire fleet, instead of a single segment, and how to insure that this subsidy is utilized to achieve the intended goal of the 1936 legislation which is to stimulate competition, not with other American operators, but with foreign-flag shipping."
- "How to use the Cargo Preference Act as an effective tool for encouraging the growth and development of the U.S.-flag fleet, and how to prevent double subsidies which constitute a flagrant abuse of cargo preference."

Hall noted that the fiscal 1969 maritime budget reportedly faces virtual elimination in the face of the spending slashes proposed by Congress as part of the tax increase package. He warned that such a move would "not be cutting into fat—it would be slashing into muscle."

He said that the prospects of such a budget cut should not be allowed to stand in the way of enactment of a long-range maritime program. "As a matter of fact," Hall said, "it will increase the need, because we'll be that much further behind." He added:

"We must first have the principle of maritime expansion laid down. Without a program, we can do nothing. With a program, we will, at long last, be in a position to act as soon as this temporary budget problem is resolved."

EXHIBITING HIS MUSICAL skills is Rep. Jonathan B. Bingham (D-N.Y.) as he auditions for membership in Local 802 of the Musicians in New York City. Representatives of the local listen to Rep. Bingham play his own composition on a 261-year-old Guarnerius violin. He passed the test to earn his card. "A congressman should always have a secondary profession to fall back on," he quipped.

Compromise Rejected On Slash in Budget

motion by Rep. James A. Burke (D-Mass.) to direct House members of the conference committee to insist on a $4 billion budget cut instead of the $6 billion tentatively agreed on.

The House Democratic leadership, the AFL-CIO, the Civil Rights Leadership Conference and other liberal groups supported the move as the alternative to a bigger slash.

House Republican Leader Gerald R. Ford (Mich.) and House Ways & Means Committee Chairman Wilbur D. Mills (D-Ark.) led the fight against the Burke compromise.

A few liberals voted against the $4 billion cut, unwilling to endorse any reduction. Some conservatives who voted against the $4 billion figure may still turn around and oppose a package linked to a tax increase. But basically the vote was a showdown over the issue of bone-deep spending cuts in a period when the nation's urban crisis demands more rather than less federal effort.

The conservative coalition flexed its muscles on another controversial issue before the House.

Rep. Emanuel Celler (D-N.Y.), chairman of the House Judiciary Committee, made the routine motion that the House appoint conferees to meet with a Senate committee to try to resolve differences on the crime control bill.

Celler previously served notice that he would fight to delete from the Senate bill provisions which would deny to suspects and defendants rights which the Supreme Court has said they are entitled to under the Constitution.

Celler's motion to name conferees required unanimous consent, and was blocked by several objections.

The reason, it became evident, is that House conservatives have hopes of convincing the House to accept the Senate bill intact or else instructing its conferees to agree to the main provisions of the Senate bill.

Civil rights as well as the budget was involved in an appropriation bill including funds for the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission, which faces an increased workload this year as smaller firms come under the ban on race, religious and sex discrimination and a new age discrimination law goes into effect.

Deep Cut Made

The Appropriations Committee had cut a $13.1 million budget request down to $6.9 million. A bipartisan group of liberals moved to raise the appropriation to $11.8 million—but lost on a 121-113 non-record vote.

In one area where the Appropriations Committee had gone beyond the Administration request, the action was struck down on a technicality.

The committee had voted $245 million—more than twice the budget request—for merchant ship construction. But the item was stricken from the bill on a point of order based on the fact that the legislation authorizing the money to be appropriated had not yet finally cleared Congress.

In sharp contrast to the budget-cutting demands, the congressional Joint Economic Committee heard testimony urging a major new job-creating program from a senator and a congressman who served on the National Advisory Commission on Civil Disorders.

Sen. Fred R. Harris (D-Okla.) and Rep. James C. Corman (D-Calif.) said money invested in providing jobs for the hard-core unemployed would come back "many times over."

Senate Votes Low-Income Housing Bill

grams included in the omnibus bill include incentives for private industry to enter the low and moderate income housing field and a mandate for employment of people living in areas being rehabilitated wherever possible.

As in all authorization bills, the money to carry out the new federal programs must still be appropriated. Because of the time lag on construction funds, the decisive showdown won't come this year. Some $4 billion of the $5 billion in new authorizations would be spent in 1970.

Crime Bill

The big Administration victory on the housing bill came after a sharp setback when the Senate transferred the President's crime control bill into a controversial catch-all measure which would legalize wiretapping and strip suspects picked up by the police of what the Supreme Court has ruled are constitutional rights.

It does provide federal grants for local law enforcement agencies—the heart of the Administration bill—but it channels most of the money through the states.

It bans the mail-order sale of pistols and revolvers, but places no restrictions on rifles.

In one of the few victories for the Administration, the Senate knocked out a committee provision which would have severely limited the power of the Supreme Court to review a defendant's claim that a state court had violated his constitutional rights.

Labor Panel Scores Safety Council For Retreat on Federal Standards

Labor Arthur P. Gildea, secretary-treasurer of the Brewery Workers.

The joint memorandum of agreement reached in February led with two key points:

- "The federal government has the right and the obligation to be concerned with occupational safety and health.
- "There is need for reasonably uniform standards dealing with occupational safety and health, and there should be federal legislation designed to achieve this end in the most efficient and effective manner."

But this unequivocal position failed to appear in the NSC statement authorized by the Apr. 16 meetings of the executive committee and board. Instead, the statement contained this language:

"There is considerable consensus that the health and safety objectives of the bill need some attention now. If the Congress concurs and its judgment is that legislation should follow the pattern represented by the Occupational Safety & Health Act of 1968, then we respectfully urge that our recommendations be given every possible consideration to more effectively achieve the intent of the bill.

"If the Congress concludes only that more federal leadership and help to the states is needed at this time, we believe our recommendations will still be pertinent to the nature of the federal response."

Then followed a series of recommendations on regulations, development of standards, enforcement and financing.

But these, Connelley's statement charged, were originally intended as "reasoned adjuncts" to a "positive approach on the two points of basic agreement." When they are "detached from the basic agreement for a real federal-state partnership," the statement said, they "then become mere quibbles about detail."

"In other words," Connelley continued, "our agreement represents a vital unified, consistent, approach based on an informed and critical view of how this legislation can best meet the needs of the American public. To pussyfoot on the basic issues and talk in detail about the quibbles will do nothing for safety nor for the true interests of the National Safety Council."

He noted that in the past, the ground rules for establishing council policy on issues where two or more conferences might have differing views was to get the conflicting conferences to come to an agreement, such as the one reached in February by the joint committee of the Labor and Industry Conferences.

Once such an agreement is reached, Connelley said, "all precedent indicates that the executive committee and the board would recognize the combination of expertise and interest represented by such an agreement. On this particular issue, the rules seem to have been changed."

AFT Winner In Pittsburgh, Toledo Voting

The American Federation of Teachers won two major union representation elections—in Toledo and Pittsburgh—in a three-day period. The AFT defeated affiliates of the National Education Association in both elections.

In winning bargaining rights for Toledo teachers the AFT collected 1,217 votes, compared with 966 for the Toledo Education Association.

Pittsburgh teachers gave the AFT 1,772 votes over the NEA affiliate's 1,590. This election was a re-run of one held earlier this year in which neither group garnered a clear-cut majority.

The AFT faces three more important elections before the end of the 1967-68 school year. The teachers union will seek representation in Kansas City for 3,500 teachers, in Wilmington, Del., for 800, and in Willow Run, Mich., for 700.

Nation Called On to Rid Self of Hatred

Tragic Loss Mourned By Meany

A horrified nation, deep in grief over the senseless slaying of Sen. Robert F. Kennedy, moved toward taking a deeper look at itself to determine the cause and roots of assassination and violence.

As America paid final homage to the 42-year-old senator who had sought the presidential nomination of his party, Pres. Johnson summoned the country to the task of ridding the land of lawlessness and hatred.

It was a call reinforced and echoed by leaders in all walks of life. The trade union movement voiced its feelings in a statement by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany. He said:

"Sen. Kennedy's death is a national tragedy. But, beyond that, it is a profound reproach—not to the United States alone—but to a world that remains torn and shaken from one end to the other by political, social and cultural hostility, violence and lawlessness.

"Out of this tragedy some way must be found to contain or temper the blind, unreasoning waves of human hatred and discord that lead disturbed minds to violence and to the search for targets and scapegoats for their frustrations and animosities.

"Only then can there be any real hope that some element of good might come from this last act of madness."

The assassination in Los Angeles sharply revived memories of the slaying of Pres. John F. Kennedy, the senator's brother, in Dallas four and one-half years ago and the murder of Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr. in Memphis two months ago.

Pres. Johnson, recalling those assassinations in a speech to the nation, declared that "those awful events give us ample warning that in a climate of extremism, of disrespect for law, of contempt for the rights of others, violence may bring down the very best among us. And a nation that tolerates violence in any form cannot expect to be able to confine it to just minor outbursts.

He called on Congress to pass laws "to bring the insane traffic in guns to a halt" and announced the appointment of a special commission headed by Dr. Milton Eisenhower, former president of Johns Hopkins University, to

'68 Campaign Suspended By Kennedy Assassination

ROBERT F. KENNEDY

All Political Activities Halted by Tragedy

The 1968 election campaign was in a state of shocked suspension as the nation mourned Sen. Robert F. Kennedy, the victim of an assassin's bullet.

All major candidates abruptly cancelled their campaign schedules. The continuing struggle for convention delegates that follows the primary windup in California was for the moment put aside.

The assassination in Los Angeles came moments after Kennedy had thanked his supporters for helping produce a victory in the California Democratic primary. The New York senator edged out Sen. Eugene McCarthy by a 46 to 42 percent margin in the big West Coast state. Coupled with the 50 percent of the vote he rolled up in the South Dakota primary, Kennedy was making a firm bid to get back in the nomination race after a damaging loss to McCarthy in Oregon.

In a year of political surprises and upsets, the sickening slaying of Kennedy injected a deep note of personal grief into the campaign as well as a general uncertainty as to what happens next.

On the certain side were the line-up of delegates to the Democratic National Convention with all political analysts giving Vice Pres. Hubert H. Humphrey a substantial lead in committed votes toward the 1,312 needed to nominate, despite Kennedy's gain of 172 delegates in California and 24 in South Dakota.

On the Republican front former Vice Pres. Richard M. Nixon was way out in front with committed delegates. He did not enter the California primary and Gov. Ronald Reagan was unopposed as a favorite son.

New York Gov. Nelson Rockefeller and Reagan maintained, however, that Nixon did not have a first-ballot victory locked up in August.

On the Democratic side the Kennedy victories Tuesday—although narrow in California—were thought to have put McCarthy out of contention with the main struggle set between Kennedy and Humphrey—until the assassin's shots rang out in the Ambassador Hotel.

Humphrey was not entered directly in the South Dakota primary but an attempt to rally support for him in the form of voting for Pres. Johnson—whose name was on the ballot—fell short, gathering 30 percent of the vote. In California Humphrey was not involved and an uncommitted slate garnered only 12 percent of the vote.

In New Jersey, however, the vice president in effect picked up at least 60 of the state's 80 delegates when Gov. Richard Hughes, running as

California GOP Votes Out Kuchel

San Francisco — California's right wing scored another vital victory when it defeated U.S. Sen. Thomas H. Kuchel, a liberal voice in his party and the No. 2 Republican in the Senate.

Max Rafferty an outspoken ultra-conservative, serving his second term as State Superintendent of Public Instruction turned the trick in capturing the Republican senatorial nomination from the 16-year incumbent who also serves as assistant minority leader.

With his win, Rafferty is only a step away from joining the growing circle of California conservative Republicans office holders headed by Sen. George Murphy and Gov. Ronald Reagan.

Standing in his way will be former State Controller Alan Cranston who was an easy winner in a three-way race for the Democratic senatorial nomination.

Kuchel got off to a running start in the counting, with heavy pluralities in Northern California population centers. San Francisco, San Mateo, Alameda, Santa Clara

56 Cents in 3 Years:

30,000 Win Raises In Aluminum Pact

New York—The Steelworkers have approved new three-year contracts calling for an average 55.9 cents an hour wage increase for more than 30,000 members at five major aluminum companies.

The agreements call also for improved pension, insurance, vacation and holiday provisions and increased supplemental unemployment benefit payments. The new contracts were approved by the Steeelworkers Aluminum Industry Conference hours before the old contracts terminated.

USWA Pres. I. W. Abel described the settlements with the Aluminum Company of America, Reynolds Metal Co., Kaiser Aluminum, Olin Mathieson and Ormet as the "largest and best package" ever negotiated in the industry.

The Aluminum Workers, representing about 16,000 workers, were on strike at a number of Alcoa and Reynolds plants with both the size and the composition of the settlement and local issues involved. One Auto Workers local in Cleveland rejected the contract terms in a ratification vote and continued its strike. Other UAW units representing about 4,000 workers backed the pact.

USWA Director M. C. Weston, Jr., chairman of the union's Aluminum Industry Conference and chief union negotiator in Alcoa talks, indicated that during the negotiations, which began April 9 in New York City, hundreds of local issues and plant problems were resolved.

Under terms of the new agreements, a wage hike of 20 cents an hour became effective immediately on June 1. This will be followed by a general wage increase of 12 cents an hour in the second year and a 13 cent hike effective the third year of the pact.

The average increase during the first year will be 30.9 cents an hour,

Teachers Gain Right To Speak Up on Schools

A high school science teacher, fired nearly four years ago for criticizing inadequacies in the school system, will get his job back because his union took his case all the way to the Supreme Court—and won.

Teachers everywhere also won, since the unanimous decision declared that it is "essential" that teachers be free "to speak out freely" on questions of educational policy "without fear of retaliatory dismissal."

The teacher is Marvin L. Pickering of Lockport, Ill., who in 1964 wrote a letter to the community's weekly newspaper expressing his views "as a citizen, taxpayer and voter."

Pickering charged that academic needs and class facilities were being neglected while large sums were being spent for school sports programs.

The school board said Pickering's charges weren't justified—and fired him.

Pickering was a member of Local 1291 of the American Federation of Teachers—and his union stood up for him.

His local helped raise money to finance the case, but the biggest share came from the AFT defense fund which helps finance legal battles involving basic principles affecting the rights of teachers.

AFT Counsel John Lightenberg carried the case to the U.S. Supreme Court after both a county

Conventions Give Ovation To Humphrey

Vice Pres. Hubert H. Humphrey received warm, enthusiastic receptions as he addressed two major union conventions — the Textile Workers Union of America and the State, County & Municipal Employes.

TWUA's convention in Washington gave Humphrey a 15-minute, cheering, whistling, welcoming ovation and after he finished speaking the more than 1,100 delegates paraded across the speakers' platform to shake his hand.

Humphrey received the convention's unanimous endorsement for the presidency as the candidate with "the capacity and skill to unite the AMERICA MUST ACHIEVE "full and equal opportunity for every citizen," Vice Pres. Hubert H. Humphrey told the convention of the Textile Workers Union of America in Washington. TWUA Pres. William Pollock, seated left, introduced Humphrey as "one of the greatest friends labor has ever had" and the delegates endorsed him for the presidency.

Court Upholds NLRB's Order On Back Pay at Darlington Mill

Richmond, Va.—The U.S. 4th Circuit Court of Appeals has brought some 500 discharged workers and the Textile Workers Union of America within one step of final victory in a 12-year struggle for justice.

The court, in a 5-to-2 decision, upheld a National Labor Relations Board finding that Deering Milliken & Co., Inc. closed its Darlington, S.C. plant in 1956 to discourage unionism in its 26 other U.S. plants.

The decision also enforces the NLRB's order that the firm pay the discharged employes lost wages from the date of their layoff until they are offered reinstatement or placed on preferential hiring lists in other Deering Milliken mills.

The company has 90 days from the date of the decision, May 31, to request a U.S. Supreme Court review of the Appeals Court ruling. This would be its final move in the long-drawn-out case.

In Washington, where his union is convening, TWUA Pres. William Pollock hailed the decision as confirming all of the charges brought by the union in behalf of the workers who lost their jobs.

"It has taken 12 years for these people to achieve a measure of justice," Pollock said. "But it is clear that justice will be done and that textile workers in the South will inevitably win the same rights in fact as well as in law that are enjoyed by workers elsewhere in the nation."

He predicted the decision, coming on the heels of recent decisions upholding NLRB orders against J. P. Stevens & Co., will serve as a "strong stimulus" to the union's organizing activities.

The exact amount of wages that will be coming to the discharged Darlington workers if the Appeals Court decision sticks cannot be determined, he pointed out, because each worker's "lost wages" since 1956 will differ.

But the total "will likely run into the millions," he estimated.

The NLRB decided back in 1962 that Deering Milliken committed an unfair labor practice when it closed its plant immediately after TWUA won a representation election because the move was made to thwart union activity.

It ordered the firm to bargain with the union about effects of the shutdown, to restore employes to similar jobs and to make them whole for any pay they had lost because of the closing.

The 4th Circuit Court of Appeals denied enforcement of the board order, by a 3-to-2 vote, on grounds an employer has the "absolute prerogative" to go out of business in part or entirely, at any time.

However, the Supreme Court in March, 1965, held "that a partial closing" of a plant is an unfair labor practice "if motivated by the purpose to chill unionism in any remaining plants" of a single employer.

It returned the case to the NLRB to determine if this was what happened at Darlington.

In its decision of June, 1967—which is now upheld by the Appeals Court—the NLRB reaffirmed its 1962 decision and found that the "chilling" described by the Supreme Court "at least in part, lay behind the decision to close the Darlington mill."

The board, by a 4-to-0 vote, also found in reaching its conclusion that:

- Those in control of Darlington "had other business interests" sufficiently substantial to give promise of reaping benefits "from the discouragement of unionization in those businesses."
- The company spent $400,000 to improve the Darlington mill in the first eight months of 1956 and no serious consideration was ever given to closing the mill until it went union.
- The company directors, headed by Roger Milliken, met and decided to shut down just six days after the employes voted for TWUA.
- Milliken told his stockholders at a 1956 meeting that he would not run the mill with a union and he sent messages to officials of his other mills clearly indicating he would close unionized plants.
- Workers at other Deering Milliken mills testified that it was common opinion among many employes that their mills would be closed if they moved to organize.

Pilch Leads Progressives in ITU Victory

Colorado Springs—John J. Pilch led the Progressive Party to a clean sweep of the top elective offices in the Intl. Typographical union.

Pilch was elected president by almost a 2-to-1 majority over Independent Party candidate C. Robert Powers of Los Angeles. Pilch, from Chicago, collected 50,087 votes to Powers' 26,868.

The newly elected president had been serving as the ITU head since the death of former Pres. Elmer Brown in February. Pilch also was first vice president of the union almost 10 years.

William R. Cloud was re-elected secretary-treasurer with a vote of 66,885. He was unopposed.

In the other contests for the union's executive council A. Sandy Bevis defeated James P. Rayner for first vice president by a vote of 49,562 to 27,011; Joe Bingel, second vice president outpolled Roy K. Dennison 48,179 to 28,168, and Joe Bailey beat James A. Dunning for third vice president 50,031 to 26,225.

Priority on Organizing:

Textile Union Vows To Crack Holdouts

By Duane Emme

The Textile Workers Union of America has vowed "priority" organizing activity until the union has scored a full breakthrough in an industry described as "the last major bastion of industrial feudalism."

The pledge came in an organizing resolution adopted unanimously by more than 1,100 delegates to TWUA's 15th biennial convention in Washington, D.C.

Earlier, the convention heard TWUA Pres. William Pollock emphasize that the union must overcome "the industry's conspiracy which is denying more than half-a-million workers their right to form and join unions."

The vital importance of organizing and the determination to "intensify" it in an industry that has "illegally hounded and persecuted its workers" ran though every convention session.

The theme of the convention was "targets for tomorrow" and the major targets, illustrated at the front of the convention auditorium, were "organized the unorganized" and "political action in 1968."

Other targets—tieing in with resolutions before the convention—stressed the need for civil rights, an enlarged anti-poverty program, an increased minimum wage, improved unemployment benefits, expanded housing, new services for the aged and coordinated bargaining.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, in a message to the delegates pledged "full and unqualified" support to TWUA as a union "in the front line of the continuing drive to organize the unorganized."

"Only when unions like yours at last realize their full potential can the labor movement and the cause of social progress be assured of success," Meany said.

The organizing resolution called upon each TWUA member "to help make organizing a priority activity not only of our international union but also of each joint board and local union."

It traced TWUA's struggles to unionize an industry which "from its inception" has been "adamantly determined to maintain absolute power over their employes" and intimidate them from exercising their legal rights.

The problem, the resolution stressed, is best illustrated by the "barony" of the J. P. Stevens & Co., the textile chain which has "committed the most staggering list of labor law violations on record in this country."

While "the callous deprivation of workers rights" by Stevens has attracted national attention, the resolution continued, the firm's actions are "not an isolated example" of lawlessness in the industry.

"The tactics are increasingly being copied by textile owners throughout the United States, and are being imported into Canada as well," the resolution declared.

In his keynote address, Pollock charged that the industry's anti-union conspiracy "is masterminded by law firms and labor relation counselors who have made union-busting a science."

"Its tools," he added, "are coercion, intimidation and the brainwashing of workers, illegal discharges, the blacklist, mill-closing threats and the mobilization of the community power structure against efforts of workers to organize."

Despite all these obstacles—"due to the courage of workers," Pollock reported, the union has gained 18,200 members in the United States and Canada in the past two years, bringing workers under TWUA contracts to 210,000.

"More than 40 percent of these new members are in the South, where our major challenge lies," he pointed out.

Pollock also reported that bargaining efforts during the past two years, plus new minimum wage legislation, have brought textile workers "substantial" gains in wages and fringe benefits.

Pollock reiterated an appeal to the Administration to halt the flow of federal contracts to Stevens and other firms found guilty of labor law violations.

"It's a strange kind of system," he said, when textile workers can be jailed for violating strikebreaking injunctions while their law-breaking employers are rewarded with "lush" government contracts.

18.5% Increase in Wages, Benefits Won in 3-Year Western Union Pact

More than 25,000 Western Union employes have won wage and benefit packages valued at 18.5 percent over three years in new contracts negotiated by the Commercial Telegraphers and the Communications Workers.

A nationwide strike was averted when the company reached agreement with the Telegraphers less than an hour before the old contract expired. The CTU represents some 21,600 Western Union workers throughout the country.

A few hours later, agreement was reached with the Communications Workers for the 3,500 Western Union employes it represents in the New York metropolitan area. The CWA also had been poised to strike if necessary.

Negotiators for the two unions are ironing out details of the contracts to be submitted for ratification. The major provisions, however, have been agreed on.

About 16 percent of the negotiated increases will go into wages of both union contracts.

The CTU said that effective June 1 a 5 percent raise will go to all employes, except messengers. Another 5 percent increase will go into effect June 1, 1969, and a 6 percent raise will be given June 1, 1970.

Messengers with two years on the job will receive a raise of 6 cents an hour this year, and additional 6-cent raises in 1969 and 1970.

The CTU national bargaining committee, headed by E. L. Hageman, said: "We are sure the overwhelming majority of members will agree . . . we have won a victory and a very good contract."

The bargaining committee said the contract provides for a fund of 1 percent of the payroll to correct job classification inequities. These increases will become effective next year.

Western Union also has agreed to pay all hospital-medical insurance premiums for dependents starting in 1970. The company will pay 50 percent of the premiums this year and 75 percent in 1969.

The CTU contract calls for increased per diem allowances for relief employes; increased payments for on-the-job injuries and Washington's birthday to become a premium pay holiday.

CWA negotiators also won vacation improvements. The new pact allows four weeks after 15 years and five weeks after 25 years.

Columbus Day was added to the holiday list, giving the CWA members eight for the year. Double time and a half will be paid for working July 4, Thanksgiving Day and Christmas.

Other benefits in the new CWA pact include 100 percent contribution by the company on health care insurance; fully-paid life insurance for employes raised from $3,000 to $6,000, and upgrades in a number of job classifications.

The CWA also won a 35-hour work week for three of its Western Union units.

Must Do Better, Convention Told:

State-County Union Reports 60% Increase in Four Years

By Eugene A. Kelly

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The State, County & Municipal Employes have climbed close to the 400,000 mark in membership—a 60 percent increase since 1964—but must do better to keep pace with the membership potential, Pres. Jerry Wurf told the union's 17th convention here.

"Organization and collective bargaining must be our twin approaches to a better future," Wurf told 1,500 delegates in a report noting an increase of some 160,000 members in four years.

Wurf called on the delegates to go back to the home towns of the United States, Puerto Rico and the Canal Zone and "organize by the thousands, the tens of thousands and the hundred of thousands" to "roll the union on."

Wurf's opening-day address keynoted a five-day program including scheduled talks by Vice Pres. Hubert H. Humphrey, Pres. Paul Hall of the Seafarers, AFL-CIO Dir. of Organization William L. Kircher, Labor Under Sec. James J. Reynolds, Sen. Wayne Morse (D-Ore.), Rep. Claude Pepper (D-Fla.), Vice Pres. Dolores Huerta of the United Farm Workers Organizing Committee, and Pres. Heinz Kluncker of West Germany's Public Transport Workers.

A highlight of the convention was a memorial service honoring the late Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr., killed by an assassin on a visit to help striking sanitation workers in Memphis. Chief participants were Dr. King's widow, Mrs. Coretta King; the Rev. Ralph D. Abernathy, his successor as head of the Southern Christian Leadership Conference; and Executive Dir. Roy Wilkins of the NAACP.

The entire convention took part in the service memorializing Dr. King for his efforts to help win union recognition and a better life for 1,700 members of Local 1733, Memphis. The sanitationmen, who sent delegates to the convention, won their long strike for recognition and a first contract after the death of Dr. King.

Wurf presented a memorial plaque to Mrs. King and plaques for leadership of the Poor People's March to Rev. Abernathy, Rev. James Lawson and the Rev. H. Ralph Jackson all of the march organizers. Then, in a moment of deep emotion, the delegates joined with Mrs. King in the song of the civil rights movement "We Shall Overcome."

Rev. Abernathy urged the delegates to help "organize labor unions over the South" and declared "if you do we shall be right there, standing with you to make the dream of Martin Luther King come true."

Deficit Budget Planned

Wurf and Sec.-Treas. Joseph L. Ames presented an officers' report showing that the union is operating in the black as a result of a per capita dues hike voted two years ago. Wurf said the executive board has decided not to seek an increase this year, for a variety of reasons, but will present a "deficit" budget to the board that takes office June 9 covering increased services to the locals and district councils.

Wurf served notice that at the 1970 convention, the officers will ask for a substantial increase in per capita income to finance the organizing and bargaining programs that he called essential to continued growth.

It should be easy, Wurf said, to "yield to an orgy of self-congratulations" at AFSCME's spectacular growth except for the fact that employment in the public sector of American life is growing even faster.

Public employment has been climbing at a rate of about 1 million new employes a year and will by 1970 have reached 10 million in state, county and local service, Wurf told the convention.

This year, at least 2 million of the nation's 9 million public employes are "squarely in our jurisdiction and we must organize them," he told the convention.

"Against that figure, can we dare to be smug about our size, 25 percent of the potential?" Wurf asked. AFSCME is "healthy, more efficient and effective than ever before." But that is "not nearly good enough," he said, adding:

Call for Expansion

"All over the land there are people who want AFSCME, who look to a union to provide the means of gaining a little better life in the years ahead. If we meet our challenge, this union can be the Number 1 union in size and service to its members," he said.

The second big job for the union is to move ahead through collective bargaining, said Wurf. "Make no mistake about it," he said, "our future, our ability to improve the living standards and the quality of life for our members, all depend on our ability to extend collective bargaining through state and local government."

Wurf voiced opposition to compulsory arbitration for government employe unions and called for a truly neutral, independent fact-finding body with power to make recommendations in disputes. He said strikes—outside of the law enforcement field—are justified only when all other means have failed.

Wurf stressed the importance of union shop agreements as a major union goal and noted that more than 275 AFSCME contracts now provide some form of union security.

The union now bargains for some 600,000 "free riders," Wurf said. It would be a million-member union, he told the delegates, if all its locals had a full union shop or agency shop in the departments where they hold bargaining rights.

WITH LINKED HANDS at a memorial tribute to Dr. Martin Luther King during the State, County & Municipal Employes convention, Union Pres. Jerry Wurf, Mrs. Coretta King, Bernard Lee and the Rev. Ralph D. Abernathy of the Southern Christian Leadership join in singing "We Shall Overcome," the song of the civil rights movement.

High Court Strikes Out Union's Election Bylaw

The Supreme Court has ruled that a requirement that candidates for top union office first serve in lower-level union posts is not a "reasonable qualification" under the terms of the Landrum-Griffin Act.

It voted unanimously to overturn an appellate court decision which found nothing wrong in the election rules of the 27,000-member Local 6 of the Hotel & Restaurant Employes in New York City.

The local required candidates for citywide office to have some time been elected from their shops to serve in the 400-member delegate assembly or its predecessor body and some 1,725 of the local's members were eligible under this criterion in the disputed 1965 election.

The AFL-CIO, in a brief to the Supreme Court, said that a union has the right to establish reasonable qualifications for its officers.

The Labor Dept. had brought the Landrum-Griffin suit challenging the eligibility rules and asking the federal courts to order a new election.

The high court ruled that a new election be held under the Secretary of Labor's supervision.

The U.S. 2nd Circuit Court of Appeals, which was reversed by the high court, had taken the position that the Landrum-Griffin Act "strictly limits official interference in the internal affairs of unions" and did not intend to turn union government over to the Secretary of Labor or the courts.

However, Supreme Court Justice William J. Brennan said that "this emphasis overlooks the fact that the congressional concern to avoid necessary intervention was balanced against the policy expressed in the act to protect the public interest by assuring that union elections be conducted in accordance with democratic principles."

The union had argued that because of its size and the complexity of managing its $30 million of welfare and other funds, it was justified in limiting major offices to members who had become familiar with its problems by serving in lower offices.

The lower court had rejected the Labor Dept.'s suit, saying that union democracy does not "require that every union entrust the administration of its affairs to inexperienced rank-and-file members."

Justice Brennan, who wrote the high court's opinion, said rank-and-file union members are able to distinguish qualified candidates "without a demonstration of a candidate's performance in other offices."

Brennan further suggested that the bylaw enables incumbents to retain office and operates to the disadvantage of dissident groups within a union.

When an opposition group tried to put a slate in the field in 1965, only its candidates for president, general organizer and business agents in two districts were eligible. They were defeated by big margins —up to 7-1. But the Supreme Court said this did not mean that other candidates, who were ineligible, might not have won election.

95% in Medicare Under Insurance

The percentage of persons over 65 now covered by medicare who have enrolled in the voluntary doctor insurance part of the program has increased from 92 to 95 percent during the past six months.

The Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare announced that about 700,000 older people, who had missed out on their first chance to enroll for the medical insurance to supplement their basic hospital insurance under medicare, signed up between Oct. 1, 1967 and Apr. 1 of this year. The next enrollment period will begin next January and will end Mar. 31, 1969.

There are now 18,600,000 persons enrolled in the voluntary insurance program. Although the rate has gone up from $3 a month to $4 a month, only 36,000 persons quit the program as a result.

Humphrey Hailed in Bid To Meet Undone Tasks

American people" in solving domestic problems and bringing peace.

Textile workers "have particularly good reason" to support Humphrey, the resolution noted, recalling how in the early 1950's he took a leading role in a Senate investigation that spotlighted "injustices" to southern textile workers.

Since then, it add, "he has repeatedly demonstrated his friendship, sympathy and understanding for our problems."

The resolution traced his "major role," first as a senator and then as the Vice President, in causes ranging from medicare, jobs, civil rights and social security to the United Nations, disarmament and the Nuclear Test Ban Treaty.

"In short," it concluded, "he has kept full faith with the philosophy and traditions of American liberalism."

In Bal Harbour, Fla., delegates to the State-County convention gave Humphrey lengthy standing ovations when he arrived and when he ended an address that was frequently interrupted by applause.

State-County Pres. Jerry Wurf, a member of the National Labor Committee for Humphrey, introduced the Vice President as "our old friend," who has "consistently voted on behalf of the workingman."

Bargaining Supported

In his address, Humphrey told delegates that "there is no excuse for denying the rights of organization and collective bargaining to anyone just because he works for the public."

"It is wrong," he emphasized, "to ask or expect employes to subsidize public or non-profit organizations by working at submarginal wages. That doesn't help anybody—it hurts everybody."

At both conventions, Humphrey listed the accomplishments of the Kennedy and Johnson Administrations and declared there is still "much unfinished business" for the nation. "I want your help."

He voiced pride in having had a role in securing civil rights legislation, the Economic Opportunity Act, the Model Cities program, the Manpower Training & Development Act, medicare and other measures that have "helped democracy grow."

"It's not just our program, it's labor's program, too," Humphrey said, "I'm proud to have been your partner."

Noting that he recently looked back at his COPE voting record in Congress and found that on 60 rollcall votes "I was registered as voting right," Humphrey said, "You can't beat that performance."

Voicing assurance that "peace will come in Viet Nam," Humphrey asked "are we clear what we will do with the victory of peace? Will it be like 1954 when peace in Korea was followed by recession and retreat in America?"

It would be "shamefully wrong" if a cease-fire in Viet Nam meant a "cease-work order in the factories in America," Humphrey said. "That must not be."

And it would be "criminally wrong," he continued, if young men "who fought from an integrated bunker in Khe Sanh came back to live in a segregated slum in an American city. That must not be."

The nation must plan "right now" for what comes after Viet Nam, Humphrey declared.

Humphrey's convention speeches were made before the assassination of Sen. Robert F. Kennedy. He cancelled a scheduled address to the Ohio State AFL-CIO convention in the political moratorium following the Los Angeles tragedy.

Rise Forecast In Education Of Workers

Two out of three adult workers will have at least a high school education in 1975, according to an article in a recent issue of Monthly Labor Review, published by the Labor Dept.'s Bureau of Labor Statistics.

The article, "Education of Adult Workers in 1975," by Denis F. Johnston states that just less than one out of two workers had that amount of education in the late 1950s and the ratio was just over one out of two by the mid 1960s.

Johnston predicts that among workers in the 25-to-34 age bracket, nearly 80 percent will have a high school education or better and 20 percent of these will have completed college in 1975.

The proportion of adult workers at the lower end of the educational level—with eight years or less of elementary education—will be only one in six by 1975, Johnston states. This contrasts with a ratio of about one in three in this category in the late 1950s and one of four in the mid 1960s.

Johnston foresees men and women having, on the average, about the same amount of education by 1975, with a median educational attainment of 12.4 years for either sex.

Rebellion and Opportunity

JUNE COMMENCEMENT exercises on the nation's college and university campuses will doubtless touch off a rash of new incidents, demonstrations and protests as part of the "continuing revolution."

The protestors and the demonstrators will be overwhelmingly white youngsters from middle and upper-income families. Many of them will be acting out of idealistic convictions; others will tag along because it's a lark to take a swipe at the "establishment." A small minority will be using the campus as a jumping off point for what they hope will be a destructive attack on the very foundations of our society.

They have all "had it made" in economic terms. Their parents have put up an average of $10,000 to educate them in a private school; $5,000 for a state or public institution. Those that survived the four years of college are in a sense an educated elite, assured of economic security and a relatively high status in modern society.

Of all the issues raised by the campus protestors and demonstrators, however, very little if anything has been said of the millions of American youngsters who are not in the colleges and universities and never will be because their parents cannot afford the price of education; or because they have received a second-class education in a segregated atmosphere so that they cannot qualify for higher education.

If the campus "radicals" can detach themselves briefly from their simplistic moralizing about the state of the world they might well turn to the question of how can America assure every qualified and eligible youngster, regardless of his economic means, of a higher education—or at the very least a decent education through secondary school that will qualify him to hold a decent job with hopes for progress.

THERE IS without question a need for reform and change in the colleges and universities. Responsible students—and most of them are—deserve a larger voice in the government of the college, a freedom to raise issues, to be heard, and to secure action.

There is a need also for the university to give more attention to the individual student and his needs and desires and lesser attention to fat research contracts and business tie-ins.

The growth of the multiversity has brought an entire new series of problems on campus that are in need of searching investigation and solution. The universities have either failed to perceive them or failed to move quickly enough.

But if the American tradition of education as an avenue of opportunity for all is to be maintained and extended, the university —in conjunction with the government—must devise programs that will make it possible for all who want and need higher education to obtain it without reference to race, economic status, or any of the other factors that today enter into the question of college admission.

If the colleges and universities and the students pull together on this simple issue of educational opportunity, and by raising the issue focus public attention on the critical need for action, then they will have discharged one of the major functions of a university—to give intellectual leadership to the community.

Product Safety Newest Target For Consumer Protection Laws

The following is excerpted from an alddress by Betty Furness, special assistant to the President for consumer affairs, to the 22nd Annual Conference of the American Society for Quality Control in Philadelphia.

IT IS IMPORTANT ENOUGH for the consumer to know the weight and unit price of the packaged soap he buys, and be assured of the wholesomeness of his food. But it is essential that he can trust the safety of the mechanical devices which might otherwise injure him or endanger his life.

Most American households have a variety of mechanical and other equipment which can and often does cause serious mishaps. Gasoline-powered lawn mowers injure hands and feet; electric hedgeclippers, saws, drills, and other powered handtools cause burns, injuries, and electrocutions. So do washing machines, dryers, stoves, and electric frying pans.

In some cases, accidents are caused by the negligent user, who at times violates even the most elementary safety precautions. But recent studies have shown that the majority of mishaps cannot be charged to the customer alone. Frequently the potential for injury is built right into the mechanical equipment.

Indeed, Congress, alarmed by the number of accidents that occur each year through the faulty design of various products, established the National Commission on Product Safety late in 1967.

The Public Health Service, which gathers statistics on this sort of thing, estimated during Senate hearings on the bill that faulty heating devices cause 125,000 injuries a year; stoves, power mowers, and washing machines are involved in 100,000 mishaps; glass doors are responsible for 40,000 and electrical extension cords for 30,000 accidents.

Most people like coffee; but even coffee making has its hazards. There are many cases each year where coffee pots cause injuries through defective wiring, explosions, instability or other reasons involving improper quality control.

The fact is that sometimes accidents can be avoided by inexpensive little devices. For instance, power mowers most frequently injure the legs. The attachment of a 15¢ guard plate would stop machines from throwing stones, and thus avoid many a hospital bill.

One of the causes for the high casualty rates among consumers is the fact that there are so few testing standards. But even where testing standards do exist, they are not always followed by the manufacturers. So we do have testing standards for plate glass windows and doors, but they are all too frequently not observed by the industry.

Sometimes new equipment reaches the market much too early, before the bugs are ironed out and proper quality control measures have been taken. The idea may be good, but the product isn't. Color TV is a good example. It's certainly better now than when it was introduced.

WE ALL TEND to blame the worker at the assembly line for the shoddy product we are offered. You know the things that are said—workers don't care any more; they are clock watchers; they are only concerned about their pay.

But the hard fact is that the worker at the assembly line does not determine the conditions under which he works.

He is invariably pressed for time; his every movement has been studied by production engineers for the most economical use; forever under pressure, he sees the next piece of equipmnt moving inexorably towards him, and he has just so much time, and only two hands.

The problem of quality control is not new to our society; it has existed ever since the industrial revolution. But with the increasing flood of consumer goods that reach the market, it has sharply increased in recent years.

One could have expected that industry itself would have defined standards, adhered to them rigidly, and developed a program of policing itself.

Unfortunately, this has not been the case. And as a result, the inevitable happened—the government has had to fill the vacuum left by industry itself.

In 1964, Pres. Johnson established the President's Committee on Consumer Interests to give the American consumer a place to turn, a focal point for consumer interests. In 1967, he raised the committee to cabinet level.

The time when a leader of industry could with impunity say that "the public be damned" has long passed, and neither you nor I can regret its passing.

But the time when industry's interest is identical to that of the consumer is not yet here. It behooves you and me to work for its arrival.

In Mergers, Cross-Ownership:

Cobweb of Monopolies Grabs Hold of Communications Media

The following is excerpted from remarks by Sen. Philip A. Hart (D-Mich.) to a Federal Bar Association conference on antitrust and monopoly practices in the communications industries.

POLITICAL DEMOCRACY thrives only when there is free, unhindered exchange of many and diverse opinions and ideas. This is our strength. It is dissent, not conformity, which has moved us forward—as uncomfortable as it may be to the status quo. But an idea locked in one man's head has no existence as far as the general public is concerned. It lives only to the extent it is communicated. And to insure that all ideas—no matter how unpopular—can be communicated, this nation needs the widest spectrum of competition among the widest number of independent competitors that can be sustained.

The old philosophical concept "to be is to be perceived" applies particularly to those who would be in public office. We exist for practical purposes as we are perceived by media. A fair perception requires many points of view.

Communications, then, is one area—at least—where we should not get hung up on the perennial argument of whether antitrust exists to protect competition or competitors. In communications it must protect both.

What is the picture today?

The Senate Antitrust subcommittee hearings on the so-called "Failing Newspaper Act" give an insight into competition in news gathering media. We learned there are fewer than 1,600 cities in this country with daily newspapers and in more than 96 percent of these cities there is only one newspaper management. In 1955 about 28 percent of these dailies were controlled by chains. In 1965 this figure had risen to 43 percent. Today it is even higher. Only approximately 45 cities have two or more newspapers and only three cities have three or more newspapers with separate ownership.

In the top 25 markets with a total of 97 television stations, 15 are owned by networks and 34 —more than a third—are owned by newspapers. Newspaper-owned stations also account for 15 percent of the revenue of all commercial AM radio stations.

These figures, however, understate the problem. Certain chains, for instance, show a high degree of regional concentration. In addition, chain newspaper competitors in one area may be joint owners of broadcast properties in another.

In some regions, the largest advertisers are owned by the same corporations which own the largest newspaper and broadcast facilities.

Large publishers of magazines own radio and TV facilities and vice versa; and at least one is moving aggressively into the newspaper field through merger. Other newspaper corporations are moving into book publishing. Electronic companies, some of whom are already deep in broadcasting, are moving also into book and textbook publishing—all by merger. Major wire services are owned or controlled by large chain publishers.

Superimposed on this cobweb picture is the fact that many of the communication corporations have business interests which give rise to a continuing conflict of interest situation in news selection and reporting. This becomes particularly acute where those interests are in the same community as the owned newspaper or other media.

The pattern is becoming clear. We are moving —and rapidly—toward a nation in which all means of communications are becoming increasingly concentrated in a relatively few corporate hands.

MOST OF THIS MOVEMENT is through merger. Yet neither the Federal Communications Commission nor the Justice Dept. has distinguished itself by vigorous action to slow down the trend. Indeed, we have seen, on occasion, an Alphonse and Gaston act, leaving both agencies nodding to each other while the elevator doors close before them.

The trouble is that no one is anxious to take on the arduous, unrewarding, politically unwise work of doing what really must be done if our protestations are to be something more than sermonizing.

But I do have some suggestions: They begin with strict, aggressive, fearless application of the antitrust laws.

Specifically, mergers in this field must be challenged; predatory practices must be challenged. If the challenges fail, then we can consider legislation to limit the holdings of media or methods of communication by any one corporation. But as Thurman Arnold pointed out recently, it seems premature to talk about legislation until a case has been lost. Let's bring cases where they are justified.

The FCC must give broader interpretation to the "public interest, convenience and necessity" doctrine in order to limit cross-ownership of communications media. It is not sufficient to say this is the province of the Justice Dept. A minimum definition of "public interest" would include competition.

Further, the regulatory agencies should encourage parallel systems of electronic transmission of written material.

Finally, these electronic distribution systems should be treated as common carriers so that anyone willing to pay the price has equal opportunity to transmit. In this way monopolization can be avoided.

Inadequacies in Program:

Most Badly Disabled Workers Get No Public Income Support

DISABILITY IS A SOCIAL and economic problem of major dimensions. In 1966 it affected one-sixth of the nation's working age population, Lawrence D. Haber writes in the May issue of the Social Security Bulletin, a publication of the Social Security Administration.

His article, "Disability, Work, and Income Maintenance: Prevalence of Disability, 1966," presents first findings from the nationwide 1966 Social Security Survey of Disabled Adults which included all noninstitutionalized disabled persons aged 18-64.

Disability was found to limit some 18.2 million adults in their ability to work, of whom 17.8 million had been disabled longer than 6 months.

The survey classified the disabled into three categories. It identified the severely disabled as "unable to work altogether or unable to work regularly." A second category was the occupationally disabled—"able to work regularly, but unable to do the same work as before the onset of disability, or unable to work fulltime."

And there were those with "secondary work limitations—able to work fulltime, regularly, and at the same occupations but with limitations in the kind or amount of work they could perform in their jobs."

The article documents substantial losses of earnings and family income because of disability. It points out that public programs designed to offset the wage losses of disability paid out more than $8 billion in cash benefits and assistance to the disabled and their dependents in 1966. But these programs "are intended primarily to provide support for the severely disabled rather than for disabled persons with work capacity.

"More than half of the severely disabled received no income from public income-maintenance programs during 1965. Close to three-fourths of those with no support from public programs were women.

"Severely disabled men benefited from disability income-support programs to a greater extent than women. Three-fifths of the severely disabled men received income from one or more of the public programs, compared with less than two-fifths of the women."

Haber points out that "the number of severely disabled not employed on a fulltime basis who had accepted reduced benefits for early retirement or were not receiving any public income-maintenance benefits suggests that there are inadequacies in the present support and wage-replacement systems for the severely disabled.

THERE ARE MORE WAYS than one to milk the public treasury as the American people have frequently found to their great cost. One way, of course, is through the numerous tax loopholes that have been pushed through Congress by shrewd men and corporations over the years. Another is the more simple and direct device of overcharging the government, especially on defense contracts.

At a time when Congress is wielding a meat axe in its effort to knock at least $6 billion off the Johnson budget, largely at the expense of desperately needed social programs, it might be a great deal more profitable to spend its time examining the whole process of letting defense contracts, long a sore and touchy problem in American life.

How much fat is there in a contract system that involved $45 billion in 1967—a rate of $180 million each working day—a system that brought huge profits to a relative handful of giant corporations?

There are responsible and knowing men in Washington who believe that the American people are being scandalously overcharged in the letting of defense contracts and are entreating Congress to do something about it.

One of these men is Vice Adm. H. G. Rickover, father of the nation's nuclear submarine program, long a thorn in the side of the Navy brass as much for his brilliance as for his sharp tongue, and a highly knowledgeable critic of what goes on when military procurement agents sit down to negotiate billions of dollars of contracts with industry.

Adm. Rickover recently appeared before the House Banking & Currency Committee. His testimony ought to be "must" reading for every member of Congress.

"Our purpose today is to see to it that the government gets value for the money it spends," was the uncomplicated statement of his case that Rickover made as he began his testimony.

After that the story was one of monopoly control of many defense needs; "accommodations" with an industry far more interested in profit than in patriotic gestures; hidden profits that involve millions of dollars; lack of adequate government protection; lack of real teeth in renegotiation legislation, give-away patent policies—a multitude of manipulations and gimmicks about which the American taxpayer knows little but that take huge sums in the form of taxes from his pocket.

He cited from Moody's Industrials, figures showing the increase in profits of the five largest defense contractors for 1963-1965 through 1966-1967. The percentage increase for General Dynamics was 22; for General Electric 21.7; for United Aircraft 56; Boeing 65 and for Lockheed Aircraft 18.5.

He told how corporations "use much ingenuity in making expenditures for plant repairs and rearrangements, tools, manufacturing control techniques, computer programs and other items—items which can be charged to overhead but which actually serve to improve the company's commercial capability."

He retold the old story of how government procurement officers are too often prone to accept the industry "point of view" in contract negotiations and of how many of them end up working for the very corporations with which they have dealt in the past.

Two billion dollars is just half of what the Johnson Administration believes can be cut from the budget without too much hurt to the nation's social programs; it represents one-third of what the more economically-minded members of Congress want to cut.

Tax reform is likely to be a priority for the next session of Congress. Reform of defense procurement is obviously vitally important, too. Here are two areas that offer vast possibilities in meeting the nation's ever-increasing problem of paying the costs of its pressing social needs.

AFL-CIO IN THE ARTS is discussed in New York City by (from left) AFL-CIO Vice Pres. Herman D. Kenin, president of the Musicians and also president of the Council of AFL-CIO Unions for Scientific, Professional & Cultural Employes (SPACE); AFL-CIO Community Services Activities Dir. Militancy Fund Launched For AFT Activity

New York—The Teachers union has launched a drive for a "million dollar militancy fund" to help the nation's teachers establish their right to organize and bargain collectively.

The fund was launched at a dinner here of classroom teachers and representatives of national unions, state and local bodies which honored four teacher representatives who had served jail terms during the school year for violation of strike-breaking injunctions.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany saluted the courageous members of the AFT and declared that public officials "must learn that threats, injunctions and jail sentences will not educate children, provide better school systems, solve the problems of neglected youngsters in ghettos or provide the wage levels and decent working conditions that America's teachers need and desire."

AFL-CIO Vice Pres. P. L. Siemiller, president of the Machinists, told the dinner that "unionism will strengthen the educational processes of America by creating a new and better relationship between teachers and students."

The militancy fund will be used in legislative campaigns in a number of states and to aid families of jailed leaders.

Court Upholds Free Speech For Teachers

circuit court and the Illinois Supreme Court had ruled that the school board was within its rights in firing Pickering.

The Supreme Court said it did not matter whether the teacher's charges against the school system were fully accurate or not, so long as false statements were not made knowingly or recklessly.

Good faith criticism, the high court declared, is protected by the free speech guarantees of the First Amendment.

'Landmark' Ruling

AFT Pres. Charles Cogen said the "landmark" decision "substantiates the position of the AFT that teachers have the same rights as all citizens and in all respects."

He said the union "took its stand" to finance Pickering's case "on behalf of the entire teaching profession."

The outcome, Cogen declared, is "a liberating decision for all teachers on a matter of high principle."

Amalgamated Bank Won't Raise Rates

Miami Beach—The Amalgamated Bank of New York will not raise its interest charges on loans "under any circumstances," its chief officer told the Clothing Workers convention.

"There is no need for any bank to raise its rates," Bank Pres. Maxwell Brandwen said. "They're making enough money now."

So is the Amalgamated bank, according to ACWA Pres. Jacob S. Potofsky. He added: "We are making handsome profits" even at the bank's present interest rates.

A $10,000 CHECK presented by Pres. Jacob S. Potofsky of the Clothing Workers to Dolores Huerta of the AFL-CIO United Farm Workers Organizing Committee backs up a resolution of support voted by delegates to the ACWA convention in Miami Beach.

Clothing Workers Hail Pay, Membership Gains

Miami Beach—The Clothing Workers ended their 52nd convention here after commending the union's officers for their stewardship in achieving the best contracts and the largest membership in ACWA history. The convention urged even more active union involvement in the human welfare areas for which the ACWA is most noted—low-cost cooperative housing, college scholarships, the plight of the poor and co-op banking.

Nearly 1,500 delegates—another record high—renominated Pres. Jacob S. Potofsky and Sec.-Treas. Frank Rosenblum for new two-year terms by acclamation.

They started the names of 22 incumbent executive board members and 40 other candidates for 23 seats on the way to a September referendum among 400,000-plus members. And they adopted a series of policy statements on bread-and-butter union issues, good citizenship, and legislative programs for a "better America."

After Potofsky presented donations of $10,000 to the United Farm Workers Organizing Committee, AFL-CIO, and $50,000 to the Urban Coalition—with an additional $200,000 pledged to the latter for recreation and education programs in big-city slums—the delegates took these actions:

- Voted to intensify efforts to bring "every worker in Amalgamated jurisdiction" into the union; to seek better wages and improved conditions in the next round of bargaining; and to put more emphasis on ACWA programs in the field of worker education, medical care, and the buying of union-label goods and services.
- Directed continued development of cooperative housing and other services to members. A proposal made to the convention by Borough Pres. Herman Badillo of the Bronx, N.Y., was referred to the officers for study. Badillo asked that the union and the United Housing Foundation sponsor the building of 15,000 additional low-cost housing units in the Bronx on a site which he promised to "help you find." Union sponsors are ready to open 15,400 other Bronx units this year.
- Promised to pay particular attention to the problems of the poor in urban and rural areas, and urged Congress to strengthen and improve the National Labor Relations Act and the minimum wage law; to provide more adequate funds to the Office of Economic Opportunity; and to improve workmen's compensation laws and the Social Security Act—the latter by voting some form of guaranteed income for those unable to work for a living.
- Called for policies to keep interest rates down, and backed higher taxes on individual and corporate incomes based on ability to pay, with tax-evading loopholes eliminated.

The convention sent a telegram of regret to Executive Vice Pres. Hyman Blumberg, who missed the convention because of illness for the first time in 54 years. It expressed sorrow at the death of Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr., and two ACWA vice presidents; and heard the announcement that Vice Pres. David J. Monas is retiring after many years of service.

The union constitution was amended to provide for the election of 23 vice presidents instead of 25.

A resolution submitted by Canadian delegates stressed the bilingual nature of the Dominion and called for "recognition by all Canadians of the French language and culture."

Political Action Stressed

The convention made no political endorsements but Potofsky stressed the union will participate actively in the presidential election campaign after the party nominating conventions.

Major convention speakers included Urban Coalition Chairman John W. Gardner, Mrs. Dolores Huerta of the Farm Workers, Executive Vice Pres. Gerard Rancourt of the Canadian Labour Congress, Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz and Assistant Sec. Esther Peterson, and Adlai Stevenson III, Illinois state treasurer.

Wirtz gave what he called a "sort of valedictory" after nearly eight years in office, but cautioned "I am not announcing my resignation or retirement."

Describing "what it means to be an effective liberal," Wirtz said "labor, the great unifying force in American liberalism," can "move us ahead" in the direction of past gains. It must not, he said, "yield to critics who claim we can't have both" public order in the streets and social justice for the poor.

Mrs. Huerta urged all unions to help end the grape strike this coming summer by refusing to buy any California table grapes until big growers headed by the Giumarra Vineyard Corp. agree to recognize their striking workers.

'To Fulfill Its Mission':

ILGWU Ups Dues To Meet Challenge

Atlantic City—More than 1,000 delegates to the 33rd convention of the Ladies Garment Workers unanimously voted a dues increase to meet added organizing costs and other mounting union expenses.

ILGWU Pres. Louis Stulberg had urged the increase as a necessity "if this union is to fulfill its mission."

At the convention's final session, Stulberg was elected without opposition to a full three-year term as president. He will continue to serve also as the union's secretary-treasurer.

Stulberg, ILGWU secretary-treasurer since 1959, was chosen by the executive board to head the union when AFL-CIO Vice Pres. David Dubinsky retired from the top post in June, 1966.

The dues revision provides for a 50 cent increase in the present $2.25 a month per capita payments to the international, effective July 1, 1968. Local dues, which vary but now average $4.50 a month, will be increased by 50 cents, effective Jan. 1, 1969.

In a financial report to the convention, Stulberg said ILGWU's total income since the last convention in 1965 exceeded expenses by more than $2.5 million.

While this indicates "good financial condition," he pointed out that part of the income comes from investments. If the union had depended upon dues income alone, he added, it would have had a deficit of more than $600,000 in the three years.

'Challenges Ahead'

He emphasized that the union must increase dues to meet "the challenges ahead"—particularly the cost of a "prolonged and determined struggle against employers in our industry who have multi-millions at their disposal to perpetuate poverty among their giant corporations."

Prior to voting the dues change, the convention unanimously approved an expanding organizing program to include stepping up organizing in the South and West and seeking to unionize office employes in the garment industry.

As a measure of the union's militancy and determination, Stulberg said that the cost of strike benefits might go as high as $15 million in the next three years compared with a $1.6 million expenditure in the last three.

Just prior to discussion on the dues proposal, Stulberg called to the convention platform members of the union who were involved in recent organizing victories won by ILGWU at Laura Industries in Selma, Ala. and Marlene Industries, which has a number of plants in the South.

He introduced them as representatives of "our struggle all through the South and elsewhere." Pointing out that ILGWU is finding "a tremendously favorable response" to its organizing among the unorganized workers, Stulberg said:

"They want our help; they need our help and we intend to give it to them."

Report Adopted

The convention adopted an international report supporting the Administration's Viet Nam policy, including its "firm resolve for peace." The report condemned "an upsurge" of anti-Semitism in Iron Curtain countries, declared strong support for Israel's stand against aggression and backed AFL-CIO international programs.

Other resolutions included calls for a 35-hour work week and a $2.25 an hour minimum wage, federal standards for unemployment benefits, improvements in medicare, stronger consumer protection, curbs on the "import" of strike-breakers across state lines and improvements in a wide range of union programs.

In addition to electing Stulberg, the convention re-elected Vice Presidents Shelley Appleton, Angela Bambace, Morris Bialis, Israel Breslow, Sol C. Chaikin, Moe Falkman, David Gingold, Murray Gross, Edward Kramer, Philip Kramer, Henoch Mendelsund, E. Howard Molisani, Louis Nelson, Samuel Otto, William Ross, Alberto Sanchez, Matthew Schoenwald, Bernard Shane, Frederick Siems and Charles S. Zimmerman.

Molisani was moved up to first vice president to succeed Luigi Antonini, who retired after 43 years of service as a vice president. Salvatore Noto was elected a vice president to fill the vacancy created by Antonini's retirement.

Savings Bonds to Bring Higher Return to Buyers

Americans now can get a better buy for their dollars in U.S. Savings Bonds and Freedom Shares.

President Johnson has announced that the Treasury raised the interest rate on Series E and H bonds to 4.25 percent from 4.15 percent and on Freedom Shares to 5 percent from 4.74 percent.

The higher interest rates which went into effect June 1 apply not only to newly purchased bonds, but also to issues already held by buyers for the remaining period to maturity.

But the bonds will have to be held seven years until full maturity for the higher interest rate. This makes a "sort of bonus," the Treasury said for buyers to hold the bonds seven years or longer.

The application of the higher rates will be done by paying more than the face value of the bond at maturity. That is, bonds that cost $75 will return $100.64 after seven years, rather than the $100 face value.

The sales of the Freedom Shares also was liberalized. They now can be bought over the counter by anyone who is willing to make a matching purchase of E or H bonds. Previously, Freedom Shares were limited to sales in bond-a-month plans.

AFL-CIO Present Views:

Trade Policy Linked To Living Standards

The nation's future trade programs must be shaped on the basis of how they "mix" with the political, economic and social policies of America, the AFL-CIO told an inter-agency committee in Washington.

The federation's views were presented by AFL-CIO Research Dir. Nat Goldfinger to the Trade Information Committee of the Office of the Special Representative for Trade Negotiations.

The committee, composed of representatives of seven government agencies, was set up by Pres. Johnson in March, 1967, to conduct a major study of U.S. trade policies and make recommendations in 1969.

Goldfinger stressed that past international trade programs—based merely upon easing the flow of goods and services among nations—are "no longer satisfactory" because of the rise of "new trading blocs" and changes in the "competitive prowess" of nations.

"The new world that has arrived and the new trading world to come represent a highly sophisticated, highly technological, highly advanced network of trade patterns," he said.

These patterns, he continued, "are much more influenced by other non-trade government and private policies than ever in the past."

Labor believes the purpose of trade is "no longer merely to ease the flow of goods and services among nations, but also to assure that the flow . . . helps improve living standards of people in the world."

As an example of what he was talking about, Goldfinger challenged the committee to probe and find an answer to the question: "What is the impact of U.S. foreign investment on trade and U.S. national interest?"

Pointing out that U.S. firms have "at least doubled" their foreign investments in the first six years of the 1960's—from $11 to $22 billion, Goldfinger said:

"The United States cannot achieve an intelligent trade policy for the 1960's and 1970's unless it comes to grips with the issues directly related to this sharp rise."

He called upon the committee to come forward with "workable" proposals for establishing international fair labor standards so that trade will work to the advantage of people everywhere.

Goldfinger cited the current "runaway" of U.S. industries to Mexico as an example of how businesses take advantage of inferior labor standards to reap huge profits at the expense of workers and our trade laws.

Changes in our tariff law are needed to prevent these firms from shipping their products back into the United States and enjoying their "profit-hungry" schemes, Goldfinger declared.

He submitted a copy of the resolution adopted by the 1967 AFL-CIO convention endorsing the work of the committee in seeking out "new approaches to international trade."

Scouts Hail Labor Role, Elect Hall to Council

Chicago—The national executive council of the Boy Scouts of America elected its first labor member, AFL-CIO Vice Pres. Paul Hall, as it laid the groundwork to expand its programs.

The eight-year plan "Boypower 76" will concentrate its efforts in the ghettos and rural poverty pockets with an ambitious project to organize one-third of all boys in the country.

Over the years, organized labor has helped make scouting possible for 44 million boys and adults by service of union members in volunteer leadership work, the council said.

In a resolution, the council "expresses sincere appreciation for the labor-scouting partnership as we join hands in the interest of citizenship training, character development, and mental and physical fitness for the boys of America."

It further noted that the AFL-CIO leadership has urged local and international unions and their members to participate in scouting.

Wide support of scouting also comes from the AFL-CIO Community Services Activities Dept. About 25 percent of the adult scout volunteers are union members.

The aim of the "Boypower 76" program is to help prepare a new generation with the skill and confidence to master the demands of future America and supply its leaders, the council said.

The enrollment goal would bring 6.5 million boys into scouting by 1976. There are about 4.5 million boys in the movement today.

Hall, president of the Seafarers, is the first trade unionist ever selected to the Boy Scouts' national council. He was the only addition to the board this year.

Hall, active in a wide range of community work, is on the Advisory Council of the President's Youth Opportunity Campaign. He is a vice president of the Civic Center Clinic in New York, which helps youths in trouble with the law.

Last March, Hall was named "Man of the Year" by the Anti-Defamation League of B'nai B'rith for his leadership in efforts toward freedom, equality and justice.

Senior Citizens Urge Programs To Help Elderly Fight Poverty

Programs to help lift the nation's elderly out of poverty were proposed by more than 1,000 delegates to the seventh annual convention of the National Council of Senior Citizens in Washington, D.C.

A society that callously condemns millions of its older people to poverty should take a good look where it is heading, the 2.5 million-member organization warned.

John W. Edelman, 74-year-old president of the NCSC who was stricken with a heart ailment, said in a message from his hospital bed: "We have seen a tremendous drive by the enemies of progress to mangle or destroy essential services for the poor, including millions of the elderly poor.

"The forces of reaction have terrorized us with scare talk about monstrous deficits and inflation. They are using the elderly, who are hit hardest by inflation, as decoys in their struggle to escape an increase in taxes on their enormous profits which have grown by leaps and bounds year after year," he declared.

In the windup session of their two-day convention the delegates voted to concentrate efforts to bring social security benefits to levels high enough to lift the elderly poor out of poverty; improvements in medicare; expanded outlays for research of the aged, and other measures that would make life easier and more meaningful for the elderly.

Simultaneously, the Labor Dept. issued a report that it takes nearly $4,200 a year for a retired couple living in a large city to maintain a moderate standard of living.

The delegates also voiced support for the Poor People's Campaign and urged the NCSC to work for legislation that would snuff out poverty for all people.

Wilbur J. Cohen, secretary of health, education and welfare, told the delegates who represent 2,500 senior citizens' club in the nation, that action at federal and state-levels is needed to move the poor out of poverty.

"We cannot relax our efforts when 30 percent of our older population—5 million people—still live in poverty," he said. "In as prosperous a country as ours, where the gross national product has been increasing at an average annual rate of 5 percent a year, there is simply no reason why social security beneficiaries should not share in our expanding prosperity."

"Our goal must be to enable all retired people to command a purchasing power related to their needs. . . . We must assure them a basic income which permits them to participate fully in family and community life without being required to work and without the stigma of charity," he added.

He called for a complete range of services to restore those requiring institutional care to the mainstream of life around them.

Cohen was introduced by Nelson Cruikshank, retired director of the AFL-CIO Social Security Dept.

About 50 delegates picketed the headquarters of the U. S. Chamber of Commerce soon after the convention opened to protest attacks on a bill before Congress for federally regulated safety and health standards on the job.

Two senior citizens delivered a letter from Edelman to Winton Blount, president of the Chamber, asking for a correction "of false and misleading statements" in the April issue of Nation's Business, the Chamber's magazine, attacking the occupational health and safety bill.

The convention passed resolutions:

- Calling for speedy enactment by the House of the housing and urban development bill.
- Urging higher social security benefits to guarantee individuals at least $150 a month and couples $250.
- Recommending legislation requiring sale of drugs by generic name.
- Asking that medicare and medicaid be extended to cover more people with improved benefits.
- Praising Pres. Johnson for his leadership in enactment of medicare, the 1965 and 1967 social security increases, the Older Americans Act, and the law against discrimination in employment because of age.

The possibility of lengthening man's active years was held out by Dr. Bernard L. Strehler, a University of Southern California biologist.

He called for a crash program of research into the causes of senility and asked Congress to provide the additional money needed for such a program.

The delegates re-elected Edelman, former legislative director of the Textile Workers Union of America, to head the NCSC and a delegation was dispatched to notify him at the hospital.

Apprenticeships Hit 19-Year High

Some 275,000 apprentices—the largest number in 19 years—were in training at the start of this year, Sec. of Labor W. Willard Wirtz reported.

Programs registered with the Labor Dept. or state agencies accounted for 215,000 of the apprentices. Another 60,000 were in unregistered programs.

Apprentice training programs have grown in six consecutive years since 1961 when there was of a 15-year low of 155,600 registered with the Labor Dept. and state agencies.

including inequity adjustments and an increase of 1 cent per hour in the increment between job classes.

Revisions of the job classification manual with Alcoa and Reynolds will step up wages of most maintenance, trade and craft employes by one job class and also provide pay improvements for others.

The pension improvement benefit, effective June 1, 1969, increases the current $5 pension level to $6.50 per month for each year of service. It will enable workers to receive as much as $250 per month in addition to social security.

A survivorship benefit for dependent spouses which goes into effect during the second year of the agreement, provides a widow or widower a pension benefit of $100 a month with certain qualifications. Current pensioners will receive an additional $10 per month on top of their present monthly pension.

A variety of fringe benefits go into effect during the third year of the agreement including an additional paid holiday bringing the total to eight, a three-day funeral leave clause, an increase of reporting pay guarantee from four to eight hours and a guarantee of a day's pay for each day lost by workers called to serve as witnesses in court.

The new agreements also provide for an increase in shift premiums from 8 to 10 cents for second shift work and from 12 to 15 cents for night shift work effective Jan. 1, 1971.

The SUB improvements increase the weekly payments to a base of 28 hours of pay from the current 24 hours of pay with a corresponding increase in maximum payments of $15 per week to $52.50 while receiving state unemployment compensation and $20 a week to $80 when not in receipt of UC.

Substantial improvements were made in the hospital-surgical benefit plan including an extended major medical expense benefit which will pay 80 percent of covered medical expenses in excess of the benefits under the basic program.

IBEW Settles On New Pact At Jersey Bell

Newark, N.J.—Members of the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers have ratified a new three-year contract with the New Jersey Bell Telephone Co. ending a six-week strike.

The new contract covering about 8,300 IBEW members, calls for wage increases totaling 19.5 percent over the three years with initial increases ranging from $4 to $12.50 per week retroactive to May 26.

Members of the Communications Workers, who had accepted contract terms earlier, honored the IBEW picket lines and supervisory personnel manned the phones.

In Illinois, IBEW members continued their strike against Illinois Bell but talks were under way as the AFL-CIO News went to press and the union reported signs of progress towards a settlement.

The union is in negotiations also with two Western Electric plants in Columbus, Ohio and Omaha, Neb. Strike sanction has been granted to the IBEW locals at both plants.

Despite Kennedy Criticism:

Congress Approves 'Crime Control' Bill

The House sent to Pres. Johnson a distorted version of his crime control bill. It includes Administration and labor-opposed provisions opening the door to widespread wiretapping by police and seeking to reverse the Supreme Court on constitutional rights of suspects and defendants.

House conservatives used the shooting of Sen. Robert F. Kennedy to whip up a massive 317-60 majority for a motion to bypass the customary House-Senate conference procedure. The House then voted 368-17 to accept the Senate's bill intact.

The Senate bill included a watered-down ban on the mail-order sale of handguns. But it contained few restrictions on over-the-counter sales and no regulation of rifle purchases other than imported military-type weapons.

The Kennedy brothers had sought unsuccessfully to strengthen the gun control bill and Pres. Johnson, after the House action, said in a nationwide television and radio speech that he is asking Congress to pass strong gun control legislation. He criticized the provisions in the crime bill as "inadequate."

While conservatives sought to portray the bill as the "tough" congressional response to the assassination, the facts belied their claim.

Left unsaid was the fact that the two Kennedy brothers had spoken and voted against the provisions of the Senate bill that the conservative bloc most strongly supported—and that House Judiciary Committee Chairman Emanuel Celler had hoped to modify in conference.

The New York senator and his brother, Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) left the campaign trail to be present for key votes on the bill and the Massachusetts senator led an unsuccessful drive for a stronger gun control measure than the one included in the Senate bill.

While Robert Kennedy was not present for as many votes as his brother—the votes came in the midst of his primary campaigns—he was either paired or his position was announced on the amendments.

The Kennedy brothers took the same position as the Administration and the AFL-CIO in voting for amendments—all defeated— which would have:

- Deleted or sharply limited the wiretapping authority granted to police.
- Eliminated sections reversing the Supreme Court's order that suspects must be accorded and informed of their rights before a confession can be admitted as evidence.

The original Safe Streets & Crime Control bill proposed by Pres. Johnson was intended to channel federal funds into improvement of local police departments—on the premise that crime control is essentially a local function.

The final version of the bill includes federal grants—but most of the money will be channeled through the states.

Celler told the House that he will introduce a new bill to stiffen the gun control law.

LONG-TIME CRUSADER for truth-in-lending legislation, former Illinois Sen. Paul H. Douglas (left) returns to Capitol Hill for a victory reunion with Rep. Leonor K. Sullivan (D-Mo.) and Sen. William J. Proxmire (D-Wis.), whose joint effort helped pass the bill after an eight-year battle. The three were praised by Pres. Johnson in glowing terms at a White House signing ceremony. "With this bill," the President said, "we are entering a new era of honesty in the marketplace."

'68 Campaign Comes to Halt After Slaying

a favorite son, handily defeated a McCarthy challenge.

Earlier, Democratic party conventions in Michigan and Missouri indicated strong support for Humphrey in the August convention despite efforts by Kennedy and McCarthy supporters to pick up delegate strength. Humphrey has also won an overwhelming majority of the Pennsylvania delegates.

While the presidential primaries and conventions dominated the political news prior to the Kennedy shooting, there were a number of other developments:

In Texas the bid by liberal Don Yarborough to win the Democratic gubernatorial nomination fell short in a runoff primary. Yarborough, who led in the first primary, lost to Lt. Gov. Preston E. Smith, an ultra-conservative. Smith will face Republican Paul Eggers in November.

In Alabama Lt. Gov. James Allen apparently won the runoff primary for the Democratic senatorial nomination from Rep. Armistead Selden in the struggle to succeed Sen. Lister Hill who is retiring.

In Montana rightwinger Republican Gov. Tim Babcock won nomination for another term and will face the state's attorney general, Democrat Forrest Anderson, in November. Rep. Arnold Olson (D) won his bid for renomination.

In Mississippi four incumbent Democratic congressmen won renomination in contested primaries. In three of the contests the conservative southerners were opposed by Negro candidates.

Meany Calls on Labor To Help Quell Unrest

London—The trade union movements in the industrialized nations "must of necessity play a prominent part" in resolving problems that are causing "much of the dissatisfaction and unrest we are now witnessing," AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany declared here.

Officially opening the centenary exhibition of books and documents as part of week-long ceremonies marking the 100th anniversary of the British Trades Union Congress, Meany asserted that "it is my personal conviction that constructive change can be had through the greater development and perfection of the trade union instrumentality."

The federation president presented a silver service to the TUC on behalf of the AFL-CIO and attended a dinner in London's Guildhall marking the centennial.

The dinner, attended by Queen Elizabeth and representatives of all major British institutions, was the first time in the Guildhall's 600-year history that was not paid for by the city. The TUC footed the bill.

Meany was one of two non-British trade unionists invited; the other was Donald MacDonald, president of the Canadian Labour Congress.

In his speech at Congress House, TUC headquarters, Meany reviewed the 74-year relationship between the TUC and the former AFL and the AFL-CIO, noting that it has been of "great benefit" to the organized workers of America.

The history of the TUC, he said, "furnishes ample proof of the efficacy of the federated type of trade union center which brings together all the autonomous trade unions of a nation into one coordinating body," a center which furnishes "leadership by consent."

The TUC's success with this leadership role, Meany added, is evident in the day-to-day life of Britain's workers. But, he added, this is no time for a feeling of complacency on things accomplished.

"We see around us in many parts of the world a spirit of restlessness and perhaps even rebellion against established institutions—both public and private," Meany noted.

"There seems to be an urge and a drive for change—in some cases without a clear definition of the type of change desired," he said.

The answer, Meany added, is "not to be found in rioting, burning and looting—these methods invariably lead to anarchy which, in turn, must give way to tyranny of some sort or other."

In playing a major role in this time of change, the trade union movement, Meany stressed, must apply only one measuring rod—the standard of life and health and freedom of a nation's people.

The centenary exhibition opened by Meany contains books and documents highlighting the 100-year history of the TUC.

It was on June 2, 1868 that the first meeting of union leaders took place at the old Mechanics Institute on David Street in Manchester. The unions then had little more than 100,000 members. Today the TUC represents 9 million men and women.

look into the causes, occurrence and control of violence.

This would include, he said, "assassination that is motivated by prejudice and by ideology, and by politics and by insanity; to violence in our city streets and even in our homes."

In his statement Meany declared "the death of Sen. Robert F. Kennedy, ends in its prime a distinguished career bright with the promise of further achievement and service to his countrymen. It brings another intolerable heartbreak to a great American family that has already suffered far too much of humanity's burden of grief."

Meany views on the Kennedy slaying were echoed by trade union leaders across the nation in a flow of messages to Mrs. Kennedy and the family. Two AFL-CIO conventions in session when the shooting took place curtailed or cancelled their sessions.

Kennedy died June 6 in a Los Angeles hospital a little more than 24 hours after he was shot in the kitchen of the Ambassador Hotel. He never regained consciousness after six surgeons spent nearly four hours removing most of a .22 caliber bullet from his brain.

The Los Angeles police were holding Sirhan Bishara Sirhan, 23, on $250,000 bail and were planning to charge him officially with the murder of Kennedy. Sirhan, a Jordanian, had immigrated to the U.S. in 1957 with his family.

Kennedy's body was flown to New York where a requiem mass was scheduled for June 8 in St. Patrick's Cathedral with burial in Washington later in the day in Arlington National Cemetery alongside his brother, John F. Kennedy.

Five others who were with Kennedy as he left the hotel ballroom after a victory speech on the results of the California Democratic primary were also wounded but reported in good condition. Among the five were Paul Schrade, West Coast regional director of the Auto Workers, who underwent surgery for removal of a bullet in his skull.

The shooting brought an immediate move by Pres. Johnson who ordered the Secret Service to protect all presidential candidates and their families. Congress promptly passed legislation authorizing the action.

Steel Negotiations Open for New Pact

New York—The Steelworkers opened talks with 11 basic steel companies here for a new contract to cover 450,000 members in the industry with a substantial wage increase topping the union's demands.

USWA Pres. I. W. Abel presented the program outlined earlier in a bargaining policy statement of the Basic Steel Conference of the union at a session attended by about 200 union representatives and 150 company officials.

Prior to the opening session Abel declared that the union is approaching the negotiations "with optimism and confidence" and the expectation of a full agreement on all issues by Aug. 1 when existing agreements expire.

Right-Winger Defeats Sen. Kuchel in Primary

Counties gave him whopping margins. The heavy Rafferty votes from the right-wing strongholds of Los Angeles, Orange, and San Diego Counties, however, turned the tide. Rafferty's margin opened up as the slow vote count in the South piled up. With nearly complete returns Rafferty held a 70,000 vote lead, getting 50 percent to Kuchel's 47.

Kuchel has been in public service 31 years. He was in the State Assembly when then Gov. Earl Warren named him to serve as state controller. Warren, in 1952, named him to succeed Richard M. Nixon in the Senate.

The California AFL-CIO endorsed Kuchel in the Republican primary, in recognition of his voting record.

COPE left open its endorsement in the Democratic race, indicating that Cranston as well as his two principal opponents were equally acceptable. Cranston had carried labor's endorsements in three previous races for state controller. He won two, then lost out in 1966 in the Reagan sweep.

He lost out, too, in 1964 to Pierre Salinger in a tough contest for the Democratic senatorial nomination. Salinger, who had been press secretary to Presidents Kennedy and Johnson, went on to lose to Murphy.

Rafferty held back on making the senatorial race until he had piled up what he considered adequate financial backing. Much of it came from familiar conservative and right-wing Republicans who had been equally prominent in the Reagan and Murphy campaigns.

He campaigned against Kuchel on the grounds that he didn't represent the state's Republicans, that he too often voted with the Democratic majority, that he failed to endorse party candidates such as Barry Goldwater, Murphy and Reagan.

School, Hospital Employes Win Wage-Hour Protection

DEATH TOLL mounted to 34 in the Jonesboro, Ark., area alone as nearly 70 tornadoes ripped across 10 states in the South and Midwest. The disaster hit many union families, including that of Donald Guy, a member of Carpenters Local 1440 and Machinists Local 911. Mrs. Guy was killed and her husband and son injured. Standing in the ruins of the Guy home are, from the left, Jesse Crays, secretary-treasurer of the Northeast Arkansas Central Trades Council, State AFL-CIO Pres. J. Becker appealed to all unions to aid Red Cross disaster relief fund. (Related story, Page 2.)

High Court Rejects Appeal by States

By John M. Barry

The Supreme Court has upheld the extension of federal wage-hour standards to 1.7 million employes of state-operated schools and hospitals as a valid exercise of the government's power to regulate interstate commerce.

The high court, in a 6 to 2 decision, affirmed the ruling of a special three-judge federal court which rejected a challenge to the constitutionality of the 1966 amendments to the Fair Labor Standards Act.

The State of Maryland, joined by 27 other states and one school district, had urged the federal panel to declare the amendments unconstitutional as they applied to state employes and to enjoin Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz from enforcing them.

Both the AFL-CIO and the State, County & Municipal Employes filed briefs with the Supreme Court and earlier with the special District Court in Baltimore suporting the government's position that the amendments are constitutional.

SCME Pres. Jerry Wurf called the Supreme Court's ruling "another landmark in the increasing acceptance of public employes into first class citizenship."

Wurf noted that his union along with the AFL-CIO had helped secure passage of the amendments in which, he said, "Congress recognized that public employes pay the same amounts for bread or shoes as private employes."

The high court's action, he observed, "confirms the constitutional power of Congress to eliminate substandard working conditions for public employes as well as their private counterparts. It is my hope that Congress will exercise these powers to extend the protections of the Fair Labor Standards Act to all public employes."

The Service Employes Union, which played a leading role in winning the amendment extending protection to state employes, also ap-

Joblessness Unchanged At 3.5%

By Robert B. Cooney

The nation's jobless rate held at 3.5 percent in May while the employment picture showed continued strength, the Labor Dept. has reported.

"The jobless rate has remained between 3.5 and 3.7 percent for the last six months, the lowest sustained unemployment rate since late 1953," the report observed.

While there was little change in the job picture between April and May, the over-the-year changes illuminated long-term trends.

There was a strong recovery in manufacturing between May 1967 and May 1968, but four-fifths of the 2.1 million increase in payroll employment came in service-producing industries, the Labor Dept. said.

On the jobless side, there was marked improvement over the year in the unemployment rates of adult men, from 2.4 down to 2.1 percent, and for adult women, from 4.1 down to 3.7 percent. But the jobless rate of teenagers remained virtually unchanged at 12.6 percent, more than triple the national rate.

Victory for Consumers:

House Passes Poultry Bill, Sets Inspection Standards

By David L. Perlman

The House voted overwhelming 351-17 approval of a federal poultry inspection bill strongly supported by consumers, labor and the Administration.

The legislation sent to the Senate for action gives states two years to set up strictly-enforced inspection programs for the 13 percent of poultry and poultry products that does not cross state lines—about 1 billion pounds a year. The federal government will pay half the cost.

Poultry sold in interstate commerce is already covered by federal inspection and the House bill includes strengthening amendments to the 10-year-old federal program.

The bill requires that state programs "at least equal" federal standards, including continuous inspection and rigid sanitary standards.

A spot check by the Agriculture Dept. of retail markets in 16 states showed that 20 percent of uninspected chickens sold were unfit for human consumption—while none of the federally-inspected chickens in the sample showed signs of disease.

The House bill is similar to the meat inspection legislation enacted by Congress last year after a bitter fight in which aroused consumers proved a stronger lobby than the big meat packing trade associations.

By contrast, the extension of the principle to poultry stirred little controversy.

Congress had already felt the wrath of consumer opinion. And the big trade associations in the poultry industry represented processors who dealt almost exclusively in interstate commerce—and were already covered by federal inspection.

The House bill carries exemptions for small processors—those doing less than $15,000 worth of business a year—and permits exemptions of growers who do their own process-

Outraged Public, LBJ Call For Gun Controls

An aroused public rallied behind Pres. Johnson's call for a strong gun control law—to cover rifles such as those used to assassinate Pres. John F. Kennedy and Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr., as well as pistols, the weapon used to kill Sen. Robert F. Kennedy.

The House Judiciary Committee failed—on a 16-16 tie vote—to approve the Administration's gun control bill, introduced by Committee Chairman Emanuel Celler (D-N.Y.).

Only two Republicans joined northern Democrats in supporting the measure, and most southerners voted with GOP opponents.

But there were indications that the committee would reconsider its action in the wake of letters, telegrams and editorial blasts expressing outrage.

Pres. Johnson promptly denounced the committee's inaction as "a shocking blow to the safety of

Federal Employes to Get Pay Raises on Schedule

Federal employes and servicemen will get their scheduled pay raises early in July—despite the congressional budget-slashing mood.

Pres. Johnson issued executive orders paving the way for a 5 percent raise for 700,000 postal workers, increases ranging from 3 to 8.8 percent for 1.3 million employes paid under the Classification Act, and an average 6.9 percent hike in basic pay—but not allowances—of 3.5 million in the armed forces.

The increases were provided under a 1967 law, but there had been some concern that the economy drive might force a postponement. The classified pay increases are supposed to close half the gap between present salaries and comparable pay in private industry. A third step raise is due in July, 1969.

Iowa Unionists Respond in Scores To Clean Up Tornado-Ripped City

Charles City, Iowa—It was T-day plus three—three days since the massive tornado struck Charles City, ripping the insides from the community. Uprooted trees, piles of vari-colored brick, broken glass, steel girders, cement blocks mingled in a kaleidescope of tragedy and death.

Charles City, with half of its 10,000 population made homeless, was among the hardest hit in a day of horror which saw nearly 70 tornadoes tear through 10 states across the South and the Midwest, killing at least 68 persons.

Now the awesome task of clearing away the wreckage of this once thriving community was beginning. It would require not only willing hands but professional knowledge.

Thanks to the immediate response of AFL-CIO unions across the state, Charles City had both.

On the Saturday morning following the tornado, the union men started coming—plumbers, steam fitters, iron workers, electrical workers, painters, engineers, cement, auto and rubber workers.

The men responded whether there was an immediate need for their particular skills or not. They came with trucks, bulldozers, chain saws, prepared to start early and work late to get the job done. For many of them, it meant a long drive and a weekend spent in hard labor with the prospect of a long drive home Sunday night before reporting to their regular jobs Monday morning.

200 Workers Answer Appeal

But there was no hesitation when Ray Hodson, labor representative on the Des Moines United Community Service, put out the call for help.

Sixty men drove in from Des Moines alone; another 15 came from Mason City. In all, some 200 workers answered the appeal put out by their unions and broadcast over Des Moines television stations.

Hodson, who is president of Des Moines Bricklayers Local 2, realized the desperate need for help in Charles City. He met with officials of the Building & Construction Trades Council, the Iowa AFL-CIO, and the South Central Iowa AFL-CIO early Friday morning, two days after the tornadoes struck. As many members as possible were notified, and by 6 a.m. the following day the first group was on the way to Charles City.

The men reported to Jim Clark, president of UAW Local 1315, at his headquarters in the Charles City Labor Temple. They received tetanus shots from Red Cross volunteer nurses and went to work.

Side by side with the men was the Red Cross. Mobile feeding vans brought hot coffee and food to the field, and volunteers prepared and served hot food at the labor temple and at a canteen set up in St. John's Lutheran church.

Unions and their members also helped the Red Cross meet the emergency needs of the community and are continuing to work with the organization as it undertakes long-range rehabilitation assistance to the tornado victims. Because of the widespread damage caused by the tornadoes, an emergency fund appeal was issued from Red Cross Disaster Relief Headquarters, Mason City.

Solution to City Decay: Rebuild Homes, Lives

New York—Two union officials told an American Management Association conference here of organized labor's efforts to heal urban decay.

AFL-CIO Vice Pres. Joseph D. Keenan said that a solution to the urban crisis is more than clearing the slums. Labor—together with industry and government—must provide rehabilitation of people along with rehabilitation of housing, he noted.

Walter G. Davis, director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Education, called on society to make up for the years of neglect by the lack of training for the people of the ghettos.

"We aren't talking about 'just a job' any longer," he said in a preface on what is being done to train the hard-core unemployed.

"They must see some long range security," Davis stressed. "Therefore, it would be a mistake to think only in terms of training for a dead-end single job opportunity without a career ladder component built into the program.

Initiated by Labor

"It was organized labor, more than 30 years ago, which initiated the drive for low-rent public housing for low-income families," he recalled. Keenan is secretary of the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers and chairman of the AFL-CIO Housing Committee.

Keenan cited an urgent need to step up the public housing program for the construction of 500,000 low-rent units annually over the next two years.

He reminded the Management Association conference that unions have helped bring about legislation as rent supplements, model cities programs, state fair housing laws and the Fair Housing Act passed by Congress this year.

Keenan called for support of the efforts of the national Urban Coalition—made up of leaders in government, religion, civil rights, business and labor—of which he is a co-chairman on a housing reconstruction task force.

The goals of the unit, he said, are to stimulate:

- Massive increases in the production of housing available to low-income groups to eliminate substandard housing within ten years.
- More home-ownership for low-income families.
- Ways for private business to participate profitably in supplying the needs.
- Programs to apply state financial and legal resources and power to the production of housing and the creation of economically and socially balanced communities.
- Improvements in federal government administration to simplify and accelerate existing programs.

Davis cited the work of many labor and trade unions which have developed pre-apprenticeship training programs aimed at the unemployment of the city ghettos and disadvantaged youngsters.

He noted the AFL-CIO Community Services Dept. has designed a massive "buddy system" to assist recruits, which with the cooperation of the National Alliance of Businessmen and the Dept. of Labor will operate in about 50 cities.

Davis said most of the training activity in the trade union movement is designed to upgrade the "hard-core under-employed." He cited the efforts of the Steelworkers in cooperation with the steel industry where 1,500 men are training to qualify for better jobs in the steel mills.

Cooperation from industry is an important factor in the success of the training programs, Davis pointed out. He cited the C&P Telephone Co. in Washington, D.C., which had lowered hiring qualifications to take on the trainees.

In ILO Voting:

Worker Delegates Rap Imprisonment

Geneva—Worker delegates championed the cause of human rights from the outset of the Intl. Labor Organization's annual conference by refusing to join with the government and employer representative in electing Argentina's Secretary of Labor Reuben San Sebastian as president of the four-week session.

Jean Moeri, veteran Swiss labor leader, told the conference that by abstaining in the vote the workers were protesting against the imprisonment of an Argentinian trade unionist guilty only of "participating democratically in a decision of his organization's international trade union secretariat."

Moeri, chairman of the conference's worker-group, was alluding to the five-year prison sentence given earlier this year to Eustaquio Tolosa of the Argentinian dockers union.

The Argentinian government prosecuted Tolosa because he had voted at a 1966 meeting of the Intl. Transport Workers Federation in London in support of a boycott against it for its anti-labor policies.

Moeri stressed that by refusing to subscribe to San Sebastián's election the workers were not challenging his good will or ability. At the same time, Moeri continued, the workers' decision not to vote against him was to be interpreted as a "gesture of conciliation."

Seek Release of Unionist

"It is our earnest hope," Moeri said, "that the government of Argentina will seek to improve its relations with trade union organizations and that it will release the imprisoned trade unionist."

When opening the conference, or general assembly, of the 118-member United Nations specialized agency in Geneva's Palace of Nations, Roberto Ago of Italy, chairman of the ILO's Governing Body emphasized the session's human rights theme.

He urged the more than 1,000 delegates and their advisers to use the general debate as an opportunity to lay down guidelines that will enable the ILO to best address itself to the "highest and noblest" of its tasks. This is, he said, "the determination, the affirmation and the safeguarding of fundamental human rights."

The head of the ILO executive body urged that the agency make a special effort "to meet the aspirations and needs of young people."

Earlier, David Morse, the ILO director general, had urged the conference to draw new guidelines to achieve for all "the ideals of freedom and dignity, economic security and equal opportunity."

Human Rights Is Theme

Morse said in a human rights report setting the theme for the conference that there must be no slowdown in "the promotion of the rule of law, of political democracy and of civil and political rights."

In a special report on South Africa's apartheid policy, Morse said the racial segregation imposed on that country is leading "not towards parallel development but to oppression."

He said other nations have the responsibility to demonstrate "by their example" that racial divisions can be overcome by democratic means and values.

In a report to the ILO Governing Body, Morse noted that Spain is now stalling on an invitation it made to the ILO to send a committee to make an on-the-spot study of the Spanish labor situation.

The invitation was extended last year after repeated complaints by the Intl. Confederation of Free Trade Unions and national labor federations over the denial of union and human rights by the Franco regime.

Now, Morse said, the Spanish governments insists that the ILO committee postpone its visit until action has been taken by the Spanish parliament on new labor legislation.

The assassination of Robert F. Kennedy cast a pall over the conference. During the first plenary meeting following the announcement of the Senator's death the entire conference stood to observe a minute's silence in tribute to his memory.

After directing that messages be sent to the senator's widow and to Pres. Johnson to express the "very deepest sorrow of every member of the conference," the chairman asked that the minute's silence be used "to renew our common desire to strive for peace and justice among all men."

Human Rights Program

Affiliates of the Intl. Confederation of Free Trade Unions joined in submitting to the conference a resolution calling on the ILO Governing Body to assure the coordination of the agency's activities into a "significant concerted human rights program."

The resolution demands the allocation of "sufficient financial resources" for this purpose. It also asks that action be taken on the proposals made by Morse for new international stands on freedom of association as well as on income security and protection for the aged.

Another resolution by the free workers noted the growth of companies operating in more than one country and called for the ILO to consider measures designed to develop "international industrial relations."

Rudolph Faupl, the American worker delegate who heads a five-man AFL-CIO conference team, was elected by the workers to its executive committee. The group also named Faupl to sit on the conference's key selection committee, which directs the work of the session.

Summer School Tip Brings Union Win

When Ed Haines, AFL-CIO assistant organizing director, spoke to the Indiana State AFL-CIO's summer school last year, he told the group how useful organizing leads are in selecting targets for campaigns.

Wanda Phillips, one of the union members attending the course, knew of some workers at the Amerace Corp. plant in her hometown of Medora, Ind., who would be interested in a union. She passed on the suggestion.

Miss Phillips recently received a letter of thanks from AFL-CIO Regional Dir. F. J. Pat McCartney.

"Thanks to you and your help," McCartney noted, a successful organizing drive was conducted and the Papermakers & Paperworkers won bargaining rights in an NLRB election for a unit of 209 workers.

Convention Decision:

State-County Forms Political Action Unit

By Eugene A. Kelly

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Delegates to the State, County & Municipal Employes convention here gave the green light to stepped-up activities in two fields deemed vital to the union's security—organizing and legislative action.

The 17th SCME convention highlighted five days of committee meetings and floor debate by voting to mandate a "massive and concerted" drive to organize nearly 1.6 million nonunion employes of town, county and state governments. Also it established a permanent legislative and political action arm called PEOPLE to coordinate union efforts on behalf of legislation benefiting public employes, and in securing maximum collective bargaining standards in all states.

The committee—Public Employes Organized to Promote Legislative Equality—will work with AFL-CIO COPE and labor central bodies to forward the goals of the labor movement, with special attention to problems peculiar to the public service. Union Pres. Jerry Wurf will serve as chairman.

Delegates from 1,900 locals representing nearly 400,000 members re-elected Wurf by acclamation for another two-year term, and gave Sec.-Treas. Joseph L. Ames his first full term by a vote of 2,465-959 in a contest with Al Bilik of Cincinnati.

Four new vice presidents were chosen—James Curry, who defeated incumbent Ruby Wicker, San Bernardino, Calif.; James A. Hartford, Denver, Colo., winner over incumbent George L. Hammond; Juan F. Casanas, who defeated incumbent Saturnin Mauge, Canal Zone. Earl Stout beat Anthony Fiorello to succeed retiring William J. McEntee, Philadelphia. William Charron, Detroit, kept his seat by outpolling two opponents. John Sterrett was elected to a newly created vice presidency representing New York City. Twelve other vice presidents were unopposed.

The convention adopted 21 constitutional amendments designed to strengthen or improve union services. It created a skilled trades department authorized to develop a program to help members in skilled classifications and to develop apprenticeship programs.

The convention raised the pay of the two top officers $5,000 in two installments—to bring the president's salary to $32,500 and the secretary-treasurer's pay to $27,500.

One convention session was a memorial to the Rev. Martin Luther King, Jr., shot to death in Memphis while fighting to win union recognition for striking sanitation workers. The convention adopted a resolution introduced by the strikers' Local 1733 thanking all who helped win a first contract, and especially commending the AFL-CIO and Pres. Meany "for the unstinting financial, moral and fraternal support given us during the 9-week strike."

The convention urged Congress to extend social security coverage to all state and local employes, with a 50 percent increase in benefits; and called on the federal government to underwrite a massive program aimed at reducing unemployment and ghetto unrest by creating 2 million jobs, public and private, at wages above the poverty level; providing job training for those who need it most; improving education, providing 6 million housing units, new and rehabilitated, and taking other long-range steps to help the poor.

Organizing the unorganized, gaining collective bargaining rights and negotiating substantial wage increases is still, however, the "quickest and most effective method of bringing the working poor into the mainstream of our economy," the convention asserted.

IAM Contract Lands Gains in Aerospace Pay

Burbank, Calif.—The Machinists won a $1.15 an hour raise in wages and fringes for 1,016 members at Menasco Manufacturing Co. after a seven-day strike.

The three-year contract is the first settlement since the union started negotiations with several West Coast aerospace companies in late April. The firm makes aircraft and space components.

Menasco workers had walked out after rejecting a $1.04 an hour offer by the company.

The new contract will boost wages and fringe benefits 50 cents an hour retroactive to May 20, when the previous contract expired. Additional raises of 30 cents will come next year and 35 cents in 1970.

A cost of living bonus will be continued in the three-year pact.

The increased fringes include improvements in a pension plan, an additional paid holiday—making a total of ten—and larger contributions by the company for employe life and medical insurance.

All the costs of expanded benefits for dependents will be covered by Menasco. The company will reduce the employes' costs of medical coverage for dependents over the second and third years of the contract.

Employes will be given the choice of two medical plans. One includes psychiatric care, prepaid maternity coverage and prescription drugs.

The contract also provides for improved vacations. Workers with ten years service will receive three weeks paid vacation, compared with three weeks after 15 years in the previous contract.

The Machinists and the Auto Workers are continuing negotiations with McDonnell Douglas Corp., Boeing Co., Lockheed Aircraft Co., Aerojet-General Corp., and several others.

Jobless Rate in May Holds Steady at 3.5%

in the job situation for teenagers, white or Negro, in the past six months, Labor Dept. manpower expert Harold Goldstein told a news conference.

The jobless plight of teenagers is an ominous factor in the job picture. With the close of school in June, they flood into the labor market in search of work. Next month's job report may show how well the special summer jobs programs absorb this influx of youngsters.

Unemployment reductions since the first half of 1967 have been concentrated among blue collar workers in goods-producing industries, particularly durable goods, the Labor Dept. report added. The jobless rate for blue collar workers averaged 3.8 percent in April and May, about equal to the lows of the Korean war period.

The unemployment rate for Negroes was 6.4 percent in May, double the 3.2 percent rate for whites, the report noted. There was a relative over-the-year improvement in the Negro rate. While the white jobless rate improved slightly from 3.4 percent to 3.2 percent, the Negro rate dropped from 7.7 percent to 6.4 percent.

Nevertheless, as the Labor Dept. noted, the ratio between the white and Negro jobless rates has held fairly constant for the past 15 years.

Of the 2.3 million total unemployed in May, 1.8 million were white and some 466,000 were nonwhite. With this small base, the non-white rate would tend to be more volatile.

On hours, the Labor Dept. reported a rise of six-tenths of 1 percent to 40.6 hours in the factory workweek. This rise represented a rebound from the sharp drop in April which was attributed to religious holidays and civil disorders.

The workweek for all rank and file workers on private payrolls averaged 37.6 hours in May, down two-tenths of 1 percent from May 1967. Trade, where the workweek fell six-tenths of 1 percent over the year, was the only sector to show a significant drop.

A two-cent rise in average hourly earnings to $2.82, along with a small increase in hours, boosted the average weekly earnings of rank and file workers to $106.03 in May. This was up $1.59 from April and $5.48 or 5.5 percent from May a year earlier.

Institute Offers Data on Extremists

The Institute for American Democracy has offered full access to its files and tape library on extremist groups to the Eisenhower Commission, which is investigating violence in America.

Dr. Franklin H. Littell, chairman of the institute, warned in a letter to Dr. Milton Eisenhower that organized extremist propaganda is seeding violence. Eisenhower is chairman of the presidential commission.

"On both the far Left and the far Right, we find groups deliberately accelerating the polarization of American attitudes to advance their own self-interests," Littel said.

Ohio AFL-CIO Bids Full Use Of Voting Data

Cincinnati—The Ohio AFL-CIO followed up its success in the Democratic senatorial primary last month by urging all unions in the state to take advantage of its new computerized voting lists and data processing system.

The sixth convention of the state central body approved a recommendation from COPE calling for maximum use of the computerized registration lists of union members.

The computer operation was a major aid in turning out a strong labor vote in the primary for former Rep. John J. Gilligan, who defeated the conservative incumbent, Sen. Frank J. Lausche, by a margin of more than 125,000.

Use of the computer enabled the State AFL-CIO to break down more than 700,000 names and addresses of union members by county, ward, precinct, street and telephone number for an intensive get-out-the-vote drive.

Gilligan was a featured speaker at the state convention, which was shaken at mid-point by news of the assassination of Sen. Robert F. Kennedy. Gilligan devoted the bulk of his speech to a tribute to the Kennedy family, and the delegates adopted a resolution urging the nation "to live together without malice."

The assassination caused cancellation of appearances by a number of speakers, including Vice Pres. Hubert H. Humphrey.

The convention re-elected Pres. Frank W. King and Sec.-Treas. Warren J. Smith and chose 26 vice presidents who make up the executive board of the State AFL-CIO.

King, a state senator, is from Toledo and is a member of both the Bricklayers and the Teachers. Smith is a member of the Steelworkers and was legislative representative of the Ohio AFL-CIO before his appointment as secretary-treasurer last year.

2 Unions Set Up Organizing Pact

York, Pa.—An agreement to cooperate in organizing activities in Pennsylvania has been entered into by Steelworkers' District 7 and Machinists' Lodge 98.

The pact also provides that AFL-CIO's regional office in Philadelphia will serve as the intermediary in resolving any jurisdictional differences that might arise between the two unions.

The agreement was worked out in meetings here attended by Steelworkers' District 7 Dir. Hugh Carcella; Business Mgr. Carl Burtner of IAM Lodge 98; members of their staffs; and AFL-CIO Regional Dir. George Craig.

WORKMEN COMB THROUGH rubble of Crystal Mall in Arlington, Va. as government representatives who support strong job safety measures inspect the wreckage. Three men were killed when the third story of structure collapsed, bringing down an avalanche of wet concrete and reinforcing rods on the workers. Another 29 workers were injured. Inspecting the scene the day after the disaster are, from left, Asst. Sec. of Labor Esther Peterson, Rep. James G. O'Hara (D-Mich.) and Gene Newman, Labor Dept. safety expert. Sen. Ralph W. Yarborough (D-Tex.), who with O'Hara sponsored the Administration's Occupational Health & Safety bill in Congress, also viewed the construction sight after the tragedy. A county building inspector said supporting timbers gave way when concrete was being poured on the third floor. Virginia has no safety standards covering this type of construction.

Thunder on the Right

THE EXCITEMENT, glamor and drama of the 1968 campaign is gone. The nation mourns Robert Kennedy as it slowly emerges from the shock and horror of the assassination. The easy confidence and optimism characteristic of American political life has given way to new questioning, new doubts. The nation is troubled.

But slowly the political machinery is grinding again; there are primaries to be held and conventions scheduled to select delegates for the national conventions. And as the campaign continues in its new subdued and somewhat worried mood there are disturbing signs of a movement towards the ultra-conservatives, the rightists, the extremists.

Almost obscured by the tearing tragedy of Los Angeles was the defeat in the California Republican primary of liberal Sen. Thomas H. Kuchel by Max Rafferty, a Goldwater Republican with wide support from the radical right including the John Birch Society.

The Rafferty victory, coming after the previous elections of Gov. Ronald Reagan and Sen. George Murphy, indicates the continuing erosion of moderate-liberal Republicanism in the most populous state in the nation from the highwater mark of the Earl Warren days.

IN TEXAS, growing liberal strength fell short in the battle for the Democratic gubernatorial nomination when Don Yarborough lost in the runoff—after leading the first primary—to an ultra-conservative Democrat.

In Montana, Gov. Tim Babcock, a loud voice for Goldwater in 1964, easily won the GOP nomination for another term.

In Alabama, the Democratic primary to select a successor to retiring Sen. Lister Hill produced two runoff candidates who were supporters of former Gov. George Wallace, with the more conservative of the two securing the nomination.

The rightists have taken a few defeats, however. In Ohio, the ouster of Sen. Frank Lausche by former Rep. John J. Gilligan was a stunning victory for the labor-liberal coalition in the state. In West Virginia, a labor-liberal candidate edged out a conservative to win the Democratic gubernatorial nomination. And in Florida former Gov. Leroy Collins managed to squeeze out a victory for the Democratic senatorial nomination over a conservative opponent.

WHAT EMERGES to this point is a resurgent right wing in areas of the country where it had exhibited strength earlier and where for the past few years the extremists had been relatively quiescent.

There is a real danger, however, that the resurgence will spread to upcoming primaries as the conservatives step up their campaign to win control of the new Congress and key state houses.

The labor-liberal coalition has proved effective in the contests where it has been alerted to the danger of the rightwing thrust, where it has put aside internal differences and concentrated on the real enemy of reaction.

This must continue in the difficult days ahead as the campaign moves into a new mood that could generate a dangerous apathy.

'Who's Extinct?'

Violence, Hate, Assassination:

Find the Causes, Seek Cures, Senate Leader Asks of Nation

The assassination of Sen. Robert F. Kennedy plunged the nation into despair and despondency over ever-increasing political and social violence. The questions raised by the slaying, and other recent murders, were eloquently posed in the Senate by Majority Leader Mike Mansfield. Here are excerpts from his remarks and those of Vice Pres. Humphrey, who was granted the unusual privilege of addressing the Senate.

SEN. MIKE MANSFIELD

THE ASSASSINATION of Robert F. Kennedy marked the passing from the living scene of a man of courage, dedication, integrity, and patriotism.

I grieve in a personal sense for this man's passing, and I grieve in a national sense because I wonder what is wrong that there can be a killing not of just a Robert Kennedy but also a President Kennedy, a Medgar Evers, a Martin Luther King, Jr., a Lt. William G. King, Jr., USMC of Orlando, Fla., a Lt. Thaddeus Lesnick, of Fishtail, Mont., a small ranching town in my state, and a Thomas Williams of the District of Columbia.

We have a lot of questions to ask ourselves; a lot of answers to find, and not too much time to do it. The very best will be expected of all of us to see us through the travail of our domestic and foreign difficulties, and we cannot afford not to measure up.

What does it take to awaken us from our deep sleep? What in the name of God has happened to us?

Are we so blind that we cannot see?

Are we so deaf that we cannot hear?

Are we so dumb that we cannot understand?

Are we so filled with hatred that we cannot love and appreciate one another?

Are we so immersed in ourselves that we cannot live with one another in peace and amity?

Are we so violent that we fail to comprehend the basic tenets and needs of a democracy?

Are we too sorry for ourselves; too involved with our materialism; too far away from the spiritual values of our heritage; and too wrapped up in our self-esteem?

How do we learn? How do we mature as a nation? How do we overcome the divisiveness which marks our country in this hour of trouble?

We can learn by recognizing and living up to the Constitution and the Bill of Rights; by recognizing that we are a government of laws and not of men; and by punishing those who flout the Constitution and the laws made thereunder and by protecting those who live by them.

The killing of all of these men from Massachusetts, from New York, from Mississippi, from Georgia, from Florida, from Montana, my own state and my own constituent and from the District of Columbia was totally callous. Criminals who perpetrate these crimes must and will be called to account or otherwise the law has no meaning, responsibility, no credit, and anarchy will become the norm of our society.

We cannot recall the lives of any of the human beings whom I mentioned. We can, however, learn from what has taken place and attempt to find out the causes, seek the cures, and do what we can to bring an end to the disrespect, irresponsibility, and outright contempt for life and law which is so prevalent today.

VICE PRES. HUMPHREY

THIS IS A DAY of national sorrow and personal grief.

A valiant, brave, and good man, a gifted colleague to every member of this body, and a personal friend of many, has been taken from us.

We have lost a great American, a man whose deep concern, compassion, conscience, and commitment have inspired all of us in this chamber—as well as millions of fellow Americans and countless other men and women throughout the world.

As has been said—and well said—Sen. Robert F. Kennedy was an uncommon man, with uncommon faith in the ultimate worth of American democracy and its processes. He underwrote his faith with a life of vigorous action, and was taken from us by an irrational act of hatred while doing the most sacred work of a free man; namely, the work of public policy and public affairs.

It is now the obligation of all of us, in our sorrow and pain, to realize the society of human and individual justice which Sen. Kennedy sought. For the high purposes to which we have dedicated our nation cannot longer survive except in the reality of freedom and justice.

May our nation find the strength, the faith, and the wisdom to dispel the forces of unreason and hate—of extremism and violence—from our midst. May it find a way to replace them with the love of man and the love of God.

The New Brotherhood:

'New Left' Making Its Mark On World in Waves of Violence

The following is excerpted from an article in the June 9, 1968 edition of the Washington Post by Brian Crozier, a British journalist, entitled "The New Brotherhood of Violence."

WHAT HAVE THESE names in common: Stokely Carmichael, Che Guevara, Regis Debray, Frantz Fanon, Houari Boumedienne, Fidel Castro, Tariq Ali, Daniel Cohn-Bendit, Herbert Marcuse, Rudi Dutschke, Karl Dietrich Wolff?

Answer: All advocate revolutionary violence and all have shown, by word or deed or both, that they consider Marx and Lenin obsolete. One might go so far as to add three more names to the list. Mao Tse-tung, Lin Piao and Vo Nguyen Giap.

If one is searching for a common denominator, an all-embracing label for the philosophy these people preach and practice, one might do worse than to term it "post-Leninist violence."

Take, for instance, Tariq Ali. This young Pakistani, living in England and apparently aware that he is safer there than he would be at home, would not, I imagine, object to being called a professional agitator.

In the current fashion of this unusual calling, he has been seen heading demonstrations—to be accurate, students' protest demonstrations—not only at universities up and down the United Kingdom but also in several European countries. Interviewed not long ago on television and asked about his politics, he hesitated, then said: "I suppose you could say I'm a Guevarist."

Similarly, Rudi Dutschke, the German student leader critically wounded in an affray in Berlin in April, named his baby son Hosea Che. The late Che Guevara, deprived so early of his life after the collapse of his guerrilla movement in Bolivia last October, would surely have been sensitive to this sincerest of compliments.

Daniel Cohn-Bendit, much in the news lately as a major leader of Parisian student riots, goes further. "We claim freedom of expression within the faculty," he said in a recent interview, "but we deny it to supporters of the Americans."

This, of course, is totalitarian talk, and it is well to be aware of it. But there is another strand in Cohn-Bendit's equipment: identification with the colored peoples' "struggle," especially in the Third World. As he sees it, it is the duty of the militant students to help the struggle of the Third Worlders by destroying the centers of exploitation in France and other Western countries.

SIMILAR VIEWS are expressed by such American student leaders as Tom Hayden, Carl Oglesby and Mark Rudd. The countries such young people visit for inspiration are North Viet Nam and Cuba.

More nihilistic is the philosophy of the late Frantz Fanon, the French-speaking Negro psychiatrist from Martinique who became the ideologist of the Algerian National Liberation Front during its long war against France. In his major work, "The Wretched of the Earth," he expounds a simplistic philosophy.

The Negroes turned to Black Power and to the inspiration of Frantz Fanon. It was not surprising to find Stokely Carmichael turning up in Algiers last summer and declaring that the works of Fanon had introduced him to Algeria's revolutionary struggle.

Nor was it surprising that his travels had taken him to Cuba and North Viet Nam as well as Algeria. In Havana, where Carmichael had attended the Latin American Solidarity Organization's conference, he described the American Negroes as "internal Vietnamese" and called for Negro guerrilla warfare in the streets of American cities.

Fanon, revered in Houari Boumedienne's Algeria and Fidel Castro's Cuba as a major revolutionary prophet, thus serves as a spiritual link between Black Power and the Fidelista guerrillas in Latin America.

Regis Debray is the link between the rebellious students of the West and the Latin American guerrillas.

The Debray story had all the elements to attract rebellious youth: his own youth, his rejection of an impeccably bourgeois background, his intellectual prowess, his decision to join Che Guevara's guerrillas in the Bolivian mountains, his utopian advocacy of rural warfare and dismissal of the Communist Party's leadership in favor of the charismatic figure of a Fidel Castro. As he languishes in his Bolivian jail, his legend grows, and so do the sales of his explosive little book, "Revolution in the Revolution?"

The Che myth, carefully fostered by Castro's intelligence service, is of the great guerrilla leader and theorist, liberator of a half-continent, the Simon Bolivar of the 20th century. Objectively, the truth is that he was a moderately successful tactician whose only major success was a pushover victory against a bankrupt regime in Cuba, and he was uniformly unsuccessful elsewhere.

No matter: the students want their myth and they will have it. Che Guevara is therefore the greatest revolutionary pinup of today, greater than aging Ho Chi Minh and even than that truly masterly strategist of revolutionary war in all its horrors, Gen. Vo Nguyen Giap. And he is greater, certainly, than Mao Tse-tung, for all the welcome excesses of his Red Guards, or Marshal Lin Piao, for all his utopian calls to the countryside of the world to rise up and encircle the "cities" of capitalism.

'Hungry For Knowledge':

Youth Responds in Eagerness To School on Labor Movement

TWO UNION-SPONSORED projects to involve younger members more directly in the labor movement's operations and activities have produced encouraging results, the AFL-CIO's director of education reported in a network radio interview.

Student reaction at a series of 10 labor education schools held exclusively for younger trade unionists around the country shows they are "hungry for knowledge" about the labor movement and "anxious to join in its role" as a socially progressive force, said Walter G. Davis.

The sole criterion for enrollment in the projects was age, Davis said, with 30 the ceiling. Local unions and central bodies were asked only to send "young people who should show an interest in the local union," he added.

Response from both unions and members was good, Davis said; "We had to turn down prospective students for every school." Davis appeared on Labor News Conference, an AFL-CIO produced public affairs program broadcast Tuesdays at 7:35 p.m. EDT on the Mutual Radio Network.

The union educator said the pilot programs were shaped in light of a recent study indicating a rapidly-growing proportion of younger union members in the United States, and another showing that textbook and other classroom treatment often leave high school graduates with many "misconceptions" of what the labor movement is all about.

DAVIS SAID that while there was some apprehension that such efforts might draw resistance from older union leaders, such fears proved baseless.

"We have been encouraged by business agents and other leaders of the unions," he said. They have cooperated by recruiting students and by setting up committees and other local activities to keep the younger workers involved with the union after they have completed the course, he reported.

The aim, he emphasized, is to give young members a better background in labor's history and goals and keep them active in the union movement at the local level.

Reporters questioning Davis were Sam Sharkey, labor specialist for the Newhouse Newspapers, and Murray Seeger, Washington correspondent for the Los Angeles Times.

IN THE SCHEME OF THINGS, retirement is becoming part of the life pattern for most Americans.

Greater longevity and pensions, improved social security and other programs have combined to make retirement at an earlier age more attractive.

"Retirement," said Sen. Walter F. Mondale (D-Minn.) "has become an institution in itself. We are in the midst of a retirement revolution involving significant and far-reaching changes in both the nature and dimensions of retirement."

Mondale should know. He has become an authority as chairman of the Senate Subcommittee on Retirement and the Individual, a panel of the special Senate Committee on the Aging.

Not only the Senate, but also the House of Representatives and numerous government agencies, particularly the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare, are devoting much of their energies and resources to problems of retirement and aging.

The number of Americans 65 and over has increased sixfold—from 3 million to 19 million—since 1900.

Mondale predicts that in the next 15 to 20 years, we will have over 25 million—an increase of 40 percent—and by the year 2000 we will have over 28 million, an increase of 55 percent.

"One out of every three Americans alive today," Mondale said, "some 65 million people, reach retirement age between now and the year 2000."

Mondale poses this question: "Are we ready for the retirement revolution?"

"In terms of income," he answered, "we obviously are not. To become retired now usually means that the individual must subsist on half or less of his previous income."

Recently, the Bureau of Labor Statistics of the Dept. of Labor released its study on a moderate standard of living for a self-supporting, retired couple in urban areas in the autumn of 1966.

BLS said that such a budget would require an average expenditure of $3,869 a year at 1966 prices—about $4,000 in larger metropolitan areas. Since the study was made, however, the cost of living has gone up 4.7 percent.

This budget dollar is broken down so that more than 61 cents goes for food and housing. Transportation takes 8.9 cents and clothing and personal care a similar amount. Medical care is 7.3 cents, gifts and contributions 6.0 cents and other family consumption 7.6 cents.

IT IS POSSIBLE for an elderly couple to live on such a budget if they have a mortgage-free house or pay no more than $950 a year in rent, spend no more than $284 for medical care, eat out little or not at all, have a pretty decent wardrobe, etc.

Then there are the possible contingencies:

What about maintenance of the home? Suppose there is a major illness? How can needed travel be sustained?

Some communities are finding partial answers to these questions. Transportation and movies are provided the elderly at reduced costs. Cooperatives are heaven-sent for some retired.

Fundamentally, though, as Mondale points out, we are unprepared for retirement in terms of attitude.

The other day, the National Council of Senior Citizens held its seventh convention in Washington. It has 2.5 million members.

The 1,000 delegates didn't pretend to have all the answers to the retirement problem, but they asked for more safeguards to make the twilight years more liveable.

For example, they are seeking protection of private pension plans; they seek better housing and more realistic funding for housing programs; they want to stop the gouging on drug prices.

Possibly, for many younger persons, there are far more urgent needs than those of the elderly, but with older citizens becoming more numerous in proportion to the general population, the needs cannot be overlooked.

ENCOURAGING RESULTS of worker education programs to involve younger members more directly in union activity were reported on Labor News Conference by AFL-CIO Education Dir. Walter G. Davis, center. He was questioned by Sam Sharkey, left, of the Newhouse Newspapers and Murray Seeger of the Los Angeles Times. The AFL-CIO produced program is broadcast Tuesdays at 7:35 p.m., EDT, on the Mutual Radio Network.

Furniture Workers Increase Dues For Organizing Drive, Strike Fund

Memphis, Tenn.—"The real way to abolish poverty is to unionize America," Pres. Morris Pizer told delegates to the 15th constitutional convention of the Furniture Workers here.

Blasting the Taft-Hartley Act as a "massive stumbling block in the path of progress," Pizer called for an all out drive to repeal the repressive sections of that legislation. He urged a program of full employment and called for an organizing drive to give every worker a union wage.

In a resolution that was unanimously adopted, the delegates made organizing the "primary" task of their union.

At a special night session which ran past midnight, they voted to increase per capita payments by 25 cents a month to expand the UFWA organizing campaign and bolster the strike fund. On the same ballot, the delegates raised the local union minimum monthly dues to $4, instead of $3.50.

Present to help the UFWA leaders with their organizing plans was AFL-CIO Organizing Dir. William L. Kircher, who was greeted with a standing ovation.

A major organizing victory was reported at the convention with the signing of a collective bargaining agreement with Louisville Chair Co. in Kentucky—where the Furniture Workers had won the drive they began in 1962. Special thanks was given to guest speaker Joseph Lewis, secretary-treasurer of the AFL-CIO Union Label Dept. which gave major support to the Kentucky campaign.

The union won two NLRB elections at the plant by solid margins over a six-year period—but the dinette manufacturing company refused to bargain and it took a strike of nearly 10 months to win a contract.

The new three-year agreement announced at the convention provides pay increases, vacations and holidays, grievance procedures and seniority provisions.

But it also includes—at the company's request—a clause which Pizer said provides for the UFWA to advise the company's customers "that it's all right for them to buy from this company now."

He cited it as testimony to the effectiveness of the "don't buy" campaign.

AFL-CIO COPE Dir. Al Barkan told the delegates that labor "early recognized the relationship between the ballot box and the bread box. When we stick together," he stressed, "we win."

As Barkan sounded a call for "dollars for COPE," UFWA Sec.-Treas. Fred Fulford rose to announce that "28 locals here today have already fulfilled their COPE quota for this year."

Pizer and Fulford were re-elected to the union's top offices. Also re-elected were Vice Presidents Frank Marino of the Eastern Region, Sam Sloan of the Midwestern Region, Carl Scarbrough of the Southern Region and Fred Stefan of the West Coast Region.

Pizer termed the convention "hardworking and exciting." He said that "from the first day, when we opened with one moment of silence to commemorate the memory of Dr. Martin Luther King, to the final day when we adopted a resolution of all-out support for the Poor People's March, our members showed their dedication to the program of the labor movement for a better America."

IBEW Project Updates School Shop Courses

The Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers is helping to make possible a whole new approach in teaching craftsmanship in junior high schools in the technological world of today.

IBEW, along with the National Electrical Contractors Association, helped plan the electrical program. The two organizations are contributing $80,000 to provide scholarships to train the teachers.

Other building trades unions have announced that they plan to cooperate in the program for their particular jurisdiction.

Working under a government grant, the program has been three years in preparation. It was introduced in some junior high schools last September to replace the old "shop course." Within a five-year period, it is expected to be a standard course in every junior high school in the United States, the IBEW said. The course is called "Industrial Technology."

The construction technology teacher-training program is the first of its kind. IBEW and NECA have agreed to support 20 students per year over the next four years. Each student will get a four-year, $4,000 scholarship to cover tuition, fees and other expenses.

In addition, a work-study summer job for degree credit is part of the scholarship program. The IBEW and the contractors will work together in placing each student in a ten-week job in some phase of construction work, usually in or near his home town.

Push for Liberals:

Textile Union Girds For Election Drive

By John R. Oravec

The Textile Workers Union of America convention, cut short because of the assassination of Sen. Robert F. Kennedy, pledged an all-out drive this year to elect liberal candidates who align with the aims of the labor movement and basic needs of the American people.

The 1,100 delegates to the TWUA's 15th biennial convention stressed that their political efforts are "not prompted by any desire for political power or the advancement of selfish interests" but as citizens to bring "what is good for America . . . and good for labor."

A resolution called for the setting up of machinery in all the union's locals and joint boards "to get the vote out" on Election Day.

The delegates noted that the defeat of liberal congressmen in the 1966 election led to a "retreat from the great social welfare programs" of the 89th Congress.

A coalition of conservative Republicans and Dixiecrats—spearheaded by giant business associations—is counting on further political gains in 1968 to pave the way for restrictive labor legislation in 1969, the resolution warned.

The political action resolution also called on locals to break down union membership lists by wards and precincts for an all-out program to register TWUA members and their families for the elections.

Dolores Huerta, of the United Farm Workers Organizing Committee, brought tears to the eyes of the delegates as she reviewed her feelings in Los Angeles the night of Sen. Kennedy's assassination. Mrs. Huerta was on the podium in the Ambassador Hotel with Kennedy minutes before he was shot.

She said Kennedy showed his love for the farm workers by going into the fields to study their problems and needs.

The convention was halted for silent prayer after word of his death and the remainder of the program was compressed to permit an early adjournment.

In another resolution, the TWUA called on the textile industry to face the responsibilities of automation. It asked the managements of the companies to offer workers displaced by technological changes equivalent jobs or training and education to obtain such jobs.

It asked for the establishment of a Textile Automation Fund to finance severance pay; provide necessary assistance for retraining and education, and for relocation of the displaced workers.

Early in the convention, the delegates had unanimously endorsed the presidential candidacy of Vice Pres. Hubert H. Humphrey as the man who could best "unite the American people."

A delegation was dispatched to Resurrection City of the Poor People's Campaign and presented a check for $2,000 to Rev. Ralph D. Abernathy, head of the Southern Christian Leadership Conference. Another $2,000 was voted to support the June 19th march.

TWUA Pres. William Pollock and Sec.-Treas. Sol Stetin were re-elected without opposition. Twenty incumbent vice presidents were elected from a field of 23 candidates.

Other resolutions called for:

- Federal legislation for the protection of consumers on auto insurance, drug prices, product standards, sanitary foods and clothing.
- An increase of 25 percent in strike benefits to locals.
- A consumer boycott of J. P. Stevens and Kayser-Roth textile products.
- Federal import quotas on textile products and improved wage standards in the domestic textile industry.
- National health insurance, expanded medical education and training, and construction of more hospitals and nursing homes.

The convention also voted to invite other unions in the textile industry to consider merging into a single industrywide union.

Lumber Industry Honors Terzick

Boca Raton, Fla.—The National Forest Products Association honored Peter E. Terzick, general treasurer of the Carpenters, for his "cooperative efforts in seeking solutions to problems of mutual interest."

Terzick received the 1968 Forest Products Industry Award for Industry Cooperation. He was cited for his struggle to gain relief for a lumber industry in the Pacific Northwest troubled by increasing log exports.

Terzick was credited with bringing national attention to the problems of the lumber and sawmills in Oregon and Washington on which 40,000 workers are dependent.

Delegates Clear Tables Of J. P. Stevens Labels

It was like waving the red flag in front of a bull when a delegate to the Textile Workers Union of America convention discovered that his tablecloth at the Washington Hilton Hotel bore the label of a J. P. Stevens Co. brand

He stood up and announced he was not going to sit at any table covered by the cloth of a firm which has repeatedly been found guilty of law violations in denying textile workers the right to organize.

With that he gave a mighty yank and off came the cloth. Other delegates followed suit. Ashtrays, water glasses and other objects clattered to the floor. The convention, minus the tablecloths, resumed its business.

A hotel official was apologetic: "We're a union house, that's why they (union conventions) stay with us. We try to buy union goods but you can't look into everything."

The consensus was the hotel would "look" a lot closer in the future.

Supreme Court Rejects States' Appeal:

plauded the Supreme Court decision, and SEIU Pres. David Sullivan called on the states to pay back wages "immediately."

"Those recalcitrant states which have held back wages in escrow," Sullivan said, "must pay overtime and even the difference in the minimum wage. . . . It is only true justice that these workers be treated as those in private employment. . . ."

Sullivan noted that the union has been fighting for years for proper wages and conditions for workers in hospitals, nursing homes, state mental institutions and schools.

The 1966 amendments to the wage-hour law, among other things, extended protection to 9.1 million more workers including employes of schools, hospitals and bus lines, whether publicly or privately operated. Nearly 1.7 million workers at publicly owned schools and hospitals were covered by the amendments.

The amendments set the minimum wage for the newly covered workers initially at $1 an hour effective Feb. 1, 1967. This went to $1.15 on Feb. 1, 1968, and is scheduled to increase by steps to $1.60 in 1971.

Overtime pay of time and one-half would be payable to the newly covered employes after 44 hours a week in the first year, 42 hours this year, and 40 hours next year (80 hours over two weeks for hospital workers).

The amendments specifically exempted teachers and persons "employed in a bona fide executive, administrative, or professional capacity." Both the Supreme Court and the special District Court construed this language as excluding professional medical personnel as well.

The states made clear that their main concern was the requirement for payment of overtime. Maryland said this section of the law would cost it $4.4 million in the first year alone. It had agreed with the Labor Dept. to keep complete records of pay and overtime pending resolution of its suit.

The Labor Dept. said there was an understanding that if the amendments were upheld, state workers would be paid retroactively any money due them under the FLSA formula.

States' Rights Argued

The states first attacked the "enterprise" concept of the FLSA under which all employes of "an enterprise engaged in commerce or in the production of goods for commerce" are protected by the Act. The Supreme Court's majority opinion, delivered by Justice John M. Harlan, said that the constitutionality of the "enterprise concept" was settled in 1941 in U.S. v. Darby and that the ruling "is as rational now" as it was then.

Maryland and the other states also argued that Congress had no right, even acting under its commerce power, to interfere with "sovereign state functions."

But the Supreme Court said "this argument is simply not tenable."

It is clear, Harlan's opinion declared, "that the federal government, when acting within a delegated power, may override countervailing state interests whether these be described as 'governmental' or 'proprietary' in character."

The court cited the specific exemptions of classroom teachers and other professionals and said the states' claim that Congress was trying to tell them how to perform medical and educational functions "is not factually accurate."

Congress, the court said, "has 'interfered with' these state functions only to the extent of providing that when a state employs people in performing such functions it is subject to the same restrictions as a wide range of other employers whose activities affect commerce, including privately operated schools and hospitals."

The high court observed that "it is clear that labor conditions in schools and hospitals can affect commerce" and cited Maryland's admission that 87 percent of the $8 million it spent on school supplies and equipment in 1965 went for direct interstate purchases.

Continued Review

The commerce section of the opinion concluded with the declaration:

"This court has examined and will continue to examine federal statutes to determine whether there is a rational basis for regarding them as regulations of commerce among the states. But it will not carve up the commerce power to protect enterprises indistinguishable in their effect on commerce from private businesses, simply because those enterprises happen to be run by the states for the benefit of their citizens."

The high court agreed with the District Court that questions of enforcement by the Labor Dept. and the law's application to employes of specific schools or hospitals should be decided in future cases.

Justice William O. Douglas, in a dissenting opinion joined by Justice Potter Stewart, charged that the majority ruling is "such a serious invasion of state sovereignty protected by the Tenth Amendment that it is in my view not consistent with our constitutional federalism."

Justice Thurgood Marshall did not participate in the case.

MARKING THE 100TH ANNIVERSARY of the British Trades Union Congress, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany presents a silver service to George Woodcock, general-secretary of the TUC. Meany was in London for the TUC anniversary festivities, which included a dinner attended by Britain's Queen Elizabeth.

High Court Allows Suit Challenging School Aid

The Supreme Court opened the door to suits by individual taxpayers challenging the constitutionality of federal expenditures on the grounds that they violate the First Amendment's ban on an official "establishment of religion."

By a vote of 8-to-1, the court swept aside a 45-year-old ruling that had barred such taxpayer actions. It sent back for trial a suit by a group of New Yorkers challenging provisions of the 1965 Elementary & Secondary Education Act.

The suit, which had been dismissed by a special three-judge District Court, charged that the education act violates the "establishment of religion" clause by providing federal funds to pay for textbooks and other educational materials for students of parochial schools.

The high court, in clearing the way for such taxpayer suits, did not rule on the merits of the case. But in another decision it raised doubts as to the chances for success, at least as far as textbooks are concerned.

The court, by a 6-to-3 vote, ruled that a New York state law requiring public school systems to loan textbooks to private and parochial school students does not violate the constitutional separation of church and state.

Warning Cited in Brief

In the case involving the taxpayers' suit, the AFL-CIO had joined the Justice Dept. in urging the court to continue to bar such suits. To permit them, the federation's brief warned, "would mean that every action of the legislative and executive branches of the government would be subject to judicial review."

The high court's majority opinion, delivered by Chief Justice Earl Warren, said there is "no absolute bar" to taxpayer suits challenging "allegedly unconstitutional federal taxing and spending programs."

But, the court said, the taxpayer must establish a "logical link" between their status as taxpayers and the federal expenditures being challenged. And the challenge must involve a "specific limitation" on the congressional taxing and spending powers.

In other actions, the court:

- Agreed to hear three cases from Mississippi and one from Virginia charging that recent changes in state laws were aimed at reducing Negro voting power.
- Upheld the authority of policemen to "stop and frisk" suspicious persons when there are reasonable grounds to believe the safety of the police or other persons is threatened.
- Agreed to review a Florida state court order limiting picketing by three of the unions on strike against the Florida East Coast Railroad. The state court limited picketing by the three unions—the Trainmen, Conductors & Brakemen, and the Locomotive Firemen & Enginemen—to a single entrance at the Jacksonville terminal.
- Ruled in two New York City cases that public employes cannot be fired for refusing to waive immunity in testifying before a grand jury since this presents them with a choice "between surrendering their constitutional rights or their jobs."
- Denied review of a case in which the Steelworkers were upheld by both the National Labor Relations Board and the 9th Circuit Court of Appeals when the union suspended a member for five years for seeking its decertification.

Hearst Balks on Moves To Step Up Bargaining

Los Angeles—A special meeting called by federal mediators to end the 185 day strike-lockout at the Hearst-owned Herald Examiner collapsed when the company refused to begin serious, continuous negotiations.

Mediators, in a surprise move, had summoned top international officials of the key unions involved to what was expected would be meaningful bargaining.

But the company's posture, union leaders reported, indicated no purpose could be served by holding a meeting.

The dispute has idled 2,000 members of 10 AFL-CIO unions and the Teamsters since last Dec. 15. It is the longest newspaper dispute in California history.

Union leaders who flew here from Washington and elsewhere for the abortive meeting included John J. Pilch, Typographical Union President; W. J. Farson, Newspaper Guild executive vice president; George Hardy, Service Employes vice president; James Sampson, president, and Ray Jeffers, vice president, of the Stereotypers, and Dan Streeter, treasurer, Lithographers & Photoengravers.

Others on hand were Don McGaughan, Pressmen's vice president, and John Snider and D. O. Townsend, Machinists.

William Rose of the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service convened the session. Four other federal and state mediators stood by for expected bargaining. Company negotiators made no comment.

Farson said the meeting was designed "apparently to develop some realistic bargaining. This did not materialize."

Publisher George R. Hearst Jr., grandson of William Randolph Hearst, founder of the press empire, has been publishing the Herald-Examiner with the aid of about 100 imported professional strikebreakers and regular non-union personnel.

Circulation and advertising of the onetime flagship of the Hearst newspaper chain have plummeted, however.

Numerous earlier peace attempts by mediators—including a special three-man city panel—failed in the face of Hearst indifference to the moves.

Hearst also has spurned pleas by the clergy of Los Angeles to end the use of strikebreakers.

Unlike nearly 100 U.S. cities and 14 states, Los Angeles has no law banning the use of professional strikebreakers.

PROTESTING ATTACKS by the U.S. Chamber of Commerce on the occupational health and safety bill, delegates to the National Council of Senior Citizens convention picketed the Chamber's headquarters in Washington, D.C.

Welfare Group Elects Perlis As Secretary

AFL-CIO Community Services Activities Dir. Leo Perlis has been elected secretary of the National Conference on Social Welfare, the largest organization of professional social workers in the nation.

Sec. of Health, Education and Welfare Wilbur J. Cohen was elected president.

Perlis, in an address to 8,000 delegates assembled in San Francisco, said "the only answer to extremist minorities is a consensus of the majority committed to reform and reconciliation."

The only question confronting Americans todays, he said, is whether "we have the will to reform our society peacefully—and pay for it by eliminating poverty and by promoting participation."

He called for the election of "a catch-up Congress, not just another do-nothing Congress or even a do-something Congress."

AFL-CIO Testifies:

Trade Bill Impact On Jobs Stressed

The Administration's foreign trade bill contains "constructive suggestions for interim action," the AFL-CIO declared, but does not come to grips with a number of serious problems affecting American workers.

The federation "supports most of the purposes" of the bill, AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller told the House Ways & Means Committee. But the basic consideration is to "view what is actually happening in the world" and to direct the nation's attention "to the kinds of problems which are arising . . . in a changing world."

Biemiller and Nathaniel Goldfinger, AFL-CIO director of research, said that the bill's provisions on adjustment assistance are a "forward step" toward a "meaningful program" that would end the "shameful mockery" of the experience of the past six years of Tariff Commission rulings.

The section providing safeguards and/or assistance to workers or firms adversely affected by imports is "absolutely essential," the AFL-CIO declared, if the promise of the 1962 Trade Act is to be realized.

The statement supported sections providing for extending tariff-cutting authority of the 1962 law for interim trade agreement operations but stressed that "truly reciprocal action" is necessary especially in terms of non-tariff barriers erected by some nations.

Biemiller emphasized that "the AFL-CIO will oppose any effort to undercut social and economic progress in the name of supposed international amity or economic efficiency."

The federation reasserted its convention position that no industry should be asked to absorb a tariff cut greater than 50 percent by any change in the valuation of imports.

It voiced its support for extension of the Automotive Products Trade Act of 1965 for three years on the grounds that the adjustment assistance program set up by the act has worked well.

Beyond the specifics of the Administration's bill—supported earlier in testimony by a large group of cabinet officers—the AFL-CIO testimony centered attention on a number of problems connected with international trade.

It pointed out that since 1960 the major change in the trade picture has been "the shift to rising imports," and that since 1965 the U.S. competitive position has weakened.

These problems, it said, are not directly related to unit labor costs, pointing out that while units costs were declining from 1960 to 1966 the trade surplus varied up and down. The glib explanation of higher labor costs as the villain in the trade picture does not hold water, the statement declared.

Turning to the role of foreign investment by U.S. firms, Biemiller traced the doubling between 1960 and 1966 of direct investment in manufacturing in other countries, adding that if the United States is going to make adequate decisions on trade policy "it must know in some detail about the activities of U.S. companies abroad and their impact on exports, imports and employment now and in the future."

There has been no real action, either, Biemiller said, on international fair labor standards and the necessity persists for "an effective system of assuring that the benefits of international trade flow to workers in various countries . . . there must be assurance of rising standards for labor."

The testimony included the text of the recent AFL-CIO convention resolution on trade and its support for agreements with other countries on textiles, wools and cottons and similar agreements in areas of unfair competition.

Outraged Public, LBJ Call For Gun Controls

every citizen" and "a bitter disappointment to all Americans and to the President."

Johnson said there is "no excuse for failure to act . . . Of the two million guns added each year to the arsenal already in the hands of millions of Americans, one million are sold by mail order houses in interstate commerce, and 30 percent of the murders by firearms committed each year in this country are by rifle and shotgun fire."

The AFL-CIO at its 1967 convention called for a ban on mail order sales of all firearms and had supported an unsuccessful effort in the Senate to add a ban on mail order rifles as well as handguns to the crime control bill.

The final version of the crime bill, which includes sections permitting wiretapping and electronic eavesdropping, was still on Pres. Johnson's desk as the AFL-CIO News went to press. There were reports that some Judiciary Committee members were using a hold-up on stronger gun legislation as a means of putting pressure on the President to sign the bill.

In the Senate, supporters of strong gun control legislation appeared to be picking up strength —particularly among senators from sparsely settled hunting states who previously had been adamant against any restriction on rifle sales.

Sen. George S. McGovern (D-S.D.) announced that he is switching his position in the belief that South Dakota sportsmen "will agree with me that additional restrictions on purchases of rifles and shotguns are not an unreasonable price to pay in the hopes of reducing the horrible misuse of firearms in our society."

Another group of senators sponsored additional legislation to require national registration of all firearms. The Justice Dept. has urged all states to consider registration and permit systems for guns.

Meanwhile, the Post Office Dept. announced that it will notify local police departments before delivering any firearm.

Glass Union Is Victor In Pennsylvania Vote

Pittston, Pa.—The Glass Bottle Blowers won bargaining rights for employes of the newly-established television bulb plant of the Owens-Illinois Co. in an NLRB election here.

Pres. Lee W. Minton said the GBBA also represents several hundred employes of a similar Owens-Illinois television operation in Columbus, Ohio.

Stop It!

Rockefeller, McCarthy Renew Campaign Drives

Gov. Nelson Rockefeller and Sen. Eugene J. McCarthy opened come-from-behind drives to capture the Republican and Democratic nominations for president as the 1968 political campaign resumed.

All of the candidates had suspended public political activity during the grief-filled pause that followed the assassination of Sen. Robert F. Kennedy.

The full and immediate impact of the slaying, which brutally narrowed the presidential contest, was still uncertain less than two weeks after the night of horror in Los Angeles.

But a choice must inevitably be made by the nearly 400 delegates to the Democratic convention already committed to Kennedy as the result of primaries and state conventions.

The New York Times, following a state-by-state survey of delegates committed or leaning to Kennedy, predicted that the great majority of them—more than 400—would shift their allegiance to Vice Pres. Hubert Humphrey. This would build the Vice President's convention strength to more than 1,600 delegates, far more than the 1,312 needed for nomination.

Considering only firmly committed delegates, a United Press Intl. survey found that Humphrey had added 100 convention votes in the week after Kennedy's slaying, sending his total to 662½. McCarthy, the UPI survey reported, picked up fewer than 10 convention votes in the week, for a total of 264.

McCarthy insisted, nevertheless, that Humphrey still does not have the Democratic nomination locked up.

Announcing the resumption of his campaign, he expressed doubt over the delegate counts showing Humphrey far out in front.

"I don't think there has been a final judgment yet on what the Democratic party will do next August," he said. The Democratic National Convention opens in Chicago on Aug. 26.

Because of the assassination, McCarthy said his campaign from here on will be "somewhat more restrained, more personal." He acknowledged that "overtures" were being made to Kennedy supporters and announced plans to visit a number of states in the quest for delegate support. The first stop will be New York, where district convention delegates will be chosen in the state primary June 18.

Both McCarthy and Rockefeller returned to the campaign trail after meeting separately with Pres. Johnson. The President, following his withdrawal from the race last Mar. 31, had offered to provide all candidates with Cabinet briefings on the nation's foreign and domestic problems. After the Kennedy slaying, Johnson immediately ordered Secret Service protection for all the major candidates, and Congress promptly passed authorization for the step.

Rockefeller made it clear that he was mounting a major drive to head off former Vice Pres. Richard M. Nixon, who had piled up big majorities in most of the Republican primaries and has a 5-to-1 lead over the New York governor in committed convention delegates.

Kicking off the stepped-up Rockefeller efforts were a college commencement address, a speech at the National Press Club, a half-hour network television broadcast and the first of a series of full-page newspaper advertisements in 40 major cities.

In other political developments:

- Illinois Republicans renominated Sen. Everett M. Dirksen by a margin of nearly 500,000 votes and chose Richard B. Ogilvie, president of the Cook County (Chicago) board of commissioners, as the GOP candidate for governor. The Democratic statewide candidates ran unopposed. Dirksen will face Atty. Gen. William G. Clark and Ogilvie will seek to unseat Gov. Samuel H. Shapiro. One incumbent Democratic congressman, Rep. Barratt G. O'Hara, 86, the oldest member of the House, was defeated in the primary by Abner Mikva, who ran with the support of the Democratic organization.
- In South Carolina, large numbers of Republicans crossed party lines to give conservative incumbents easy victories in the Democratic primary. These included Sen. Ernest F. Hollings and Representatives L. Mendel Rivers and John L. McMillan who had been challenged by more liberal opponents. A runoff appeared necessary between James Mann and E. C. Burnett for the seat being vacated by Rep. Robert T. Ashmore.
- Texas delegations to the national party conventions committed themselves to favorite sons—Gov. John Connolly for the Democrats and Sen. John Tower for the Republicans. The Democrats bound their 104 delegates to the unit rule, and a clear majority reportedly favors Humphrey's nomination. State GOP officials said the 56-vote Republican delegation includes "12 to 16" supporters of California Gov. Ronald Reagan, with the rest favoring Nixon.

Clean Poultry Bill Approved In House Vote

ing. The House voted down a Republican amendment to raise this exemption to $100,000.

The legislation permits a state to take more than two years to put its program fully in effect if it is already well under way when the two-year period is up. However, if a state fails to set up an adequate program, or lets its enforcement standards slip below the promised level, the federal government will step in with its own inspection program.

Major support for the legislation came from the Meat Cutters, whose members risk infection and disease when they work in uninspected plants.

The union's top officers, Pres. T. J. Lloyd and Sec.-Treas. Patrick E. Gorman, hailed the House passage of "a strong consumer protective and worker protective bill" and expressed the hope that the Senate will "act quickly" to complete action on the legislation before Congress adjourns.

There has been no congressional action, however, on Pres. Johnson's concurrent request for the start of a fish inspection program.

"If poultry inspection is spotty today, fish inspection is virtually non-existent," Johnson told Congress.

Ironically, it is because of the magnitude of the problem that opposition from the fish processing industry is so great. In both the meat and poultry areas, there had been a substantial federal inspection program in operation and the problem was reduced to extending coverage to the minority of meat and poultry sold without crossing state lines.

Dr. Ley Named Food & Drug Commissioner

A strong supporter of consumer protection programs, Dr. Herbert L. Ley, Jr., has been named head of the Food & Drug Administration.

Ley has been assistant to Dr. James L. Goddard, the retiring FDA commissioner. His appointment to the top post, made by HEW Sec. Wilbur J. Cohen, had the strong support of labor and consumer groups.

Other top HEW appointments have been announced by Pres. Johnson. He nominated James Henry McCrocklin, president of Southwest Texas State College, to be the new HEW under secretary, the post held by Cohen before he became department head.

Edward C. Sylvester, Jr., presently director of the Office of Federal Contract Compliance, has been nominated assistant secretary for community and field services. Lynn M. Bartlett, now a deputy assistant defense secretary, becomes assistant secretary for education.

House Passes Tax Boost, $6 Billion Budget Slash

Efforts Seen to Keep Key Programs Intact

Congress moved towards final passage of a bill tieing a $6 billion budget slash to a tax increase that Pres. Johnson has termed "essential" to the nation's economy.

The House approved the spending cut-tax hike package by a 268-150 vote on June 20 and final Senate action was expected the following day.

Pres. Johnson had fought for three months to get Congress to accept a smaller budget cut but the House late last month decisively rejected a $4 billion compromise as too little.

The exact impact of the bill remains to be seen. It sets a spending ceiling $6 billion below the amount proposed in the President's budget for the fiscal year which starts July 1. But a significant part of the reduction is being made by Congress itself through cuts in appropriations bills.

In effect, Congress is telling the President that if it does not cut the budget by $6 billion, it is up to the White House to determine where additional cuts should be made.

Administration sources have indicated that every effort will be made to avoid cutbacks in high priority domestic programs.

The AFL-CIO had supported the efforts to reduce the amount of the budget cut, and the federation's Executive Council warned that the "meat-ax approach" of the conservative coalition in Congress "can only lead to chaos."

The legislation imposes a 10 percent surcharge on both corporate and individual income taxes. But while the corporation tax hike is retroactive to Jan. 1, 1968, the individual tax hike goes back only to Apr. 1. In effect, that means individuals will be paying 7.5 percent more in income taxes for this year and corporations the full 10 percent.

The bill also continues excise

Meat Unions Sign Pact On Merger

Chicago—The Meat Cutters & Butcher Workmen and the Packinghouse Workers have signed a merger agreement that will unite the two unions into a single 500,000-member organization.

The agreement is subject to approval by conventions of both unions scheduled for the week of July 8 in Los Angeles and San Diego.

If the delegates to the conventions ratify the actions of their top officers and executive boards, the two unions will meet in joint session at San Diego on July 12. The Meat Cutters are meeting in San Diego; the Packinghouse Workers in Los Angeles.

The merger agreement was signed in Chicago on June 6 by the two principal officers of each union: Pres. Thomas J. Lloyd and Sec.-Treas. Patrick E. Gorman of the Meat Cutters and Pres. Ralph Helstein and Sec.-Treas. G. R. Hathaway of the Packinghouse Workers.

The new union will carry the name of the Meat Cutters & Butcher Workmen and it will be governed by the Meat Cutters constitution.

The merger pact calls for a president, secretary-treasurer and 26 vice presidents. The two principal officers and 21 vice presidents will be nominated and elected at the Meat Cutters convention; five vice presidents will be nominated and elected by the UPWA convention.

Officers Indicated

The agreement made no mention of specific plans for the officers of the new union. But the release announcing the merger pact declared that "it is understood, however, that Pres. Lloyd and Sec.-Treas. Gorman will be candidates for reelection and that UPWA Pres. Helstein will be a candidate for election as special counsel and vice president—the designation of one of the five vice presidents to be selected by UPWA. One of the UPWA vice presidents will be a Canadian.

The agreement provides that at the next convention of the Meat Cutters in 1972 delegates from local unions in the UPWA this year will nominate and elect five vice presidents who will be confirmed by the convention. From 1976 on, all the officers will be elected by regular procedures.

J.P. Stevens Again Hit By NLRB

The National Labor Relations Board has again found J. P. Stevens & Co. guilty of illegally firing union supporters, spying on union meetings and threatening workers.

It is the fifth consecutive NLRB ruling against the nation's second largest textile manufacturing chain, which the labor board earlier accused of "flagrantly, cynically and unlawfully" preventing its workers from organizing.

Pres. William Pollock of the Textile Workers Union of America said the latest decision "brings nearer to reality the day when Stevens workers will be able to take part in a truly free representation election."

He said the NLRB ruling also reaffirms the need for an executive order denying firms which consistently defy the National Labor Relations Act the right to receive government contracts.

The NLRB upheld the recommendation of a trial examiner that four workers fired last year from J. P. Stevens plants in Dublin, Ga., on trumped-up charges be rein-

AFL-CIO Rallies Support:

Strong Gun Curbs Urged as Essential

The AFL-CIO termed passage of effective gun control legislation before Congress adjourns "essential" and urged its state and city central bodies to help rally support for a strong bill.

Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller called for enactment of a law which would:

- "Provide for the registration of all guns in private possession.
- "Prohibit the interstate sale or shipment of rifles and shotguns, as well as pistols and revolvers and ammunition to be used in them.
- "Ban the sale of guns and ammunition to persons under the age of 21, and persons convicted of major crimes, drug addicts and persons of unsound mind."

Such a law, Biemiller said in a letter to state and local AFL-CIO officers, "will not curb the hunter or gun hobbyist, but will go far to make our streets and communities safer."

He noted that the most recent AFL-CIO convention called for effective gun control legislation. Since then, he said, "the tragic assassination of the late Sen. Robert F. Kennedy has dramatized the urgent need for such a law."

Congress, meanwhile, began responding to an unprecedented outpouring of public opinion demanding a strong gun control law.

Tens of thousands of letters and telegrams poured in on Capitol Hill. Persons who had never before circulated petitions knocked on neighbors' doors and collected signatures in their shops and offices.

The House Judiciary Committee did an about-face and voted 29-6 approval of the Administration's bill, barring mail order sales of all weapons and prohibiting interstate sales of ammunition.

The bill also limits over-the-

Johnson Asks For Revisions In Crime Law

Pres. Johnson signed the crime control bill but strongly criticized many of its provisions and called on Congress to repeal or modify them.

He said he approved the legislation because it included large-scale federal grants to improve local law enforcement—the main thrust of the original Administration bill. It also includes a new program of college tuition grants to attract better-trained police officers.

But, Johnson added, Congress "has taken an unwise and potentially dangerous step by sanctioning eavesdropping and wiretapping by federal, state and local officials in an almost unlimited variety of situations."

The President urged Congress to repeal these "unwise provisions," warning that they could result in "a nation of snoopers bending to

CWA Votes Support of Humphrey As Key to Nation's Unity, Progress

The Communications Workers 30th anniversary convention in Washington endorsed Vice Pres. Hubert H. Humphrey for President, calling him a man "who can mold national unity and forge national progress."

The convention, which drew more than 1,800 delegates and alternates, overwhelmingly adopted a resolution backing Humphrey's candidacy.

The Vice President originally had been scheduled to address the convention banquet, but because of his moratorium on political activity following the assassination of Sen. Robert F. Kennedy he spoke briefly to thank the delegates for their endorsement.

The CWA resolution recited the high points of Humphrey's record as a senator and as Vice President, declaring that since he first came to Congress in 1949, the nation's progress "has been stamped with the ideas and ideals of Hubert Humphrey."

It noted the key role he played in conceiving or winning enactment of such programs as the Peace Corps, arms control and the Nuclear Test Ban Treaty, the Food Stamp and Food for Peace programs, and federal aid to education.

"The entire field of social legislation, minimum wage, jobless pay, trade union welfare, manpower training, area redevelopment, urban problems and consumer protection has been directly affected by his legislative leadership and imaginative concern for the well being of his fellow man."

The convention recalled Humphrey's direct support for the CWA as mayor of Minneapolis during the union's battle with the Bell System in 1947 and observed that against this background its endorsement was "appropriate."

The delegates followed up with another resolution calling for strong registration and voting drives by every local in cooperation with COPE during this "critical" presidential election year.

Earlier, CWA Pres. Joseph A. Beirne had keynoted the conven-officials of the UPWA. This includes Hathaway who will be in the headquarters staff in charge of merging locals.

The ever increasing size of business enterprises, the agreement notes, is "destroying equality at the collective bargaining table" and "it has become categorically imperative for local unions to achieve more effective representation in collective bargaining by integrating their membership in the same and allied industries and combining their resources at every level of operation."

A statement of principles and purposes incorporated into the merger agreement notes that under the merger "rivalry will be replaced by cooperation, conflict will be converted into mutuality of enterprise and the waste of duplication will be replaced by conservation of resources." An earlier attempt to bring about a merger, in 1956, was unsuccessful.

The Meat Cutters was chartered by the AFL in 1897. Lloyd has been president since 1957; Gorman secretary-treasurer since 1942.

Started in 1937

The Packinghouse Workers Organizing Committee was created by the CIO in 1937 and became the UPWA in 1943. Helstein, who had first served as general counsel, was first elected president in 1946; Hathaway was elected secretary-treasurer in 1952.

The co-chairmen of the merger negotiating committee were Clifton C. Caldwell for the Meat Cutters and Jesse P. Prosten for the UPWA.

Both unions are headquartered in Chicago. After merger it is contemplated that the present offices of the UPWA will be consolidated into the building owned by the Meat Cutters.

LABOR'S JOB extends beyond wages and hours and involves the welfare of people and the health of the nation's communities, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany declared as he addressed the 30th anniversary convention of the Communications Workers.

Fair Housing Decision Cites Power to Ban Bias

Congress' constitutional power to legislate against discrimination—"the badges and incidents of slavery"—has been spelled out in a U.S. Supreme Court decision banning bias in all sales and rental of property.

In a 7 to 2 decision finding that an 1866 civil rights law is a fair housing statute—more sweeping than the law enacted by Congress earlier this year—the court declared that under the 13th Amendment abolishing slavery Congress has the power to determine the relics of slavery and the "authority to translate that determination into effective legislation."

The court's decision means that persons can sue under the 1866 law to bar racial discrimination in sales or rentals by private homeowners. These transactions are not covered by the 1968 statute.

The century-old statute was passed to enforce the 13th Amendment and Justice Potter Stewart, for the majority, said Congress intended the law to be a fair housing law.

The case grew out of a suit brought by a couple—the husband Negro, the wife white—charging that a St. Louis suburban subdivision refused to sell them a home site because the husband was Negro. They invoked the 1866 law but two lower courts dismissed the case on grounds that neither the law nor the Constitution banned racial discrimination by private owners in real estate transactions.

The high court accepted the case for review before Congress had enacted the present fair housing law.

In other actions the court:

- Ruled unanimously that an Alabama law denying welfare benefits to dependent children of mothers who engaged in extra-marital sexual intercourse was in violation of the Social Security Act of 1935.

Under the act, states participating in the dependent children program are required to furnish aid to all eligible individuals and a child is eligible for aid if he has been deprived of parental support through death, absence or incapacity.

- Divided 5 to 4 in finding that jailing chronic alcoholics for public drunkenness did not violate their constitutional rights.

- Ruled that community antenna television systems (CATV) do not have to pay license fees for copyrighted shows they relay to subscribers' television sets because the programs are not performed within the meaning of the Copyright Act.

Balanced Trade Policy Urged to Insure Jobs

Three AFL-CIO unions called on Congress to adopt a balanced trade policy that contains safeguards against the flow of imports and the loss of jobs.

The Steelworkers told the House Ways & Means Committee, which is holding hearings on the Administration's trade expansion act and numerous other bills, that there is a real need for steel and iron ore quotas because of the sharp rise in foreign steel capacity well beyond the needs of these countries and a reasonable share of the U.S. market.

The Clothing Workers and the Ladies' Garment Workers, in a joint statement to the committee, urged international agreements in the apparel and textile industries regulating trade in these areas.

USWA Pres. I. W. Abel, in a joint appearance with steel industry spokesmen, said the union's position lies "within the framework of an expansionary trade policy—but one which is balanced." Quota restrictions of 10 percent should be enacted, he urged, "until such time as world overcapacity is moderated."

He pointed out that competition should arise from lower cost factors and not from the compulsion of excess facilities. Overcapacity is the "crucial malady."

The apparel unions declared that "as a result of the peculiar characteristics of the apparel industry, it is urgent, in the national interest, that it be safeguarded against the impact of cut-throat foreign competition, much of which originates in the lowest wage areas of the world, and against the destructive consequences that would follow as some irresponsible domestic firms yield to the temptation to produce garments abroad for export to the United States."

The need for regulating trade in apparel is not a question of "choosing between free trade and protection," the unions said. The problem is one of weighing the full consequence for the nation as a whole—of permitting the erosion of an indigenous industry which provides a large number of jobs to persons for whom few alternative job opportunities exist.

Swankin to Head Labor Standards

David A. Swankin, a 34-year-old career federal employee, has been appointed by Labor Sec. Willard Wirtz as director of the Labor Dept.'s Bureau of Labor Standards.

Swankin will head the bureau where he began his government career as a management intern in 1957. Since last January, he has served as acting head of the bureau.

The Bureau of Labor Standards develops and administers safety and health regulations for several federal laws, promotes occupational safety and health, and develops standards in the field of labor legislation and law administration.

On CWA's 30th Anniversary:

Beirne Issues Call For Social Action

tion with a call for a sweeping program of social action to improve the quality of life in America.

Beirne outlined the record wage increases won by CWA last month after an 18-day strike against the Bell System, but added, "Today, with major social and economic problems staring us in the face, we cannot afford to think only of ourselves. Self-interest and patriotism meet this year at the cross road. This land is our land, and we must be concerned with the broader aspects of our nation."

After contrasting CWA's current contracts with the average wage in the telephone industry when the union was founded 30 years ago, Beirne cautioned:

"A solid wage rate won't buy happiness in a land of violence, a land of slums. Five weeks vacation won't buy you a good time in a land of poisonous air and polluted waters.

"What I'm saying is that, in the America of the coming 1970s, this union cannot be an island. We must be community-minded. We must contribute our ideas to the commonwealth. We must think in terms of the common good, not just our own special interest."

More Than Wages

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany struck a similar note the following day in an address to the delegates, declaring that "our job is more than just wages and hours. . . . The health of the community is involved; the health of our neighbors; the health of the nation."

Meany observed that "in perhaps the most affluent period in the history of the American economy . . . we still have too many millions of people living at poverty levels, and we still have a long way to go before the promise of the civil rights law becomes a reality for those whose skin is not white."

"We must build the houses that America needs," he continued. "We must build the schools that we need to educate our children in this age when education is more important than ever before. We must build the hospitals and health centers and more and better cultural and recreational facilities that America should have."

Such a program is not going to be accomplished, he suggested, "by burning and looting." These things lead to "anarchy," he declared, "and if I know my history, anarchy . . . is always succeeded by a dictatorship of some kind." It is, he said, going to be accomplished by private industry and the federal government. In the area of jobs, he said, the government must be "the employer of last resort" and in housing it must be "the landlord of last resort."

This, he continued, means political action, and "this means pressure by pressure groups, and frankly we concede we are a pressure group, and we are going to continue to press Congress."

Meany said he could not "buy" the suggestion that America is "sick" because of the assassinations of Dr. Martin Luther King and Sen. Robert F. Kennedy. The slayings, he said, were the products of diseased minds which represented not a national sickness, but problems the nation could solve.

He urged the CWA delegates not to "sell America short," because it has produced a system that has enabled workers to advance "to a greater degree than in any other land."

Meany also reviewed for the convention the AFL-CIO procedures under which the Auto Workers recently withdrew from the federation. He expressed "regret" over the withdrawal, "for anything that divides the labor movement cannot help and must harm us in some way." But, he said, "we have to carry on, and I am quite sure that we will carry on effectively."

He noted that the loss of the UAW reduces the federation's membership total to 13.5 million, but this is "still 700,000 more than we had three years ago."

Harry Damino, Doll Workers President, Dies

New York—Harry O. Damino, president of the Doll Workers since 1953, died June 17 of a heart ailment. He was 75.

Damino had been elected to a fourth term as president of the Doll Workers at the union's convention last month in Liberty, N.Y.

He also has been serving as manager of Local 223, the largest affiliate of the union with 15,000 members in the New York City area, since 1953.

Damino was born in Italy and came to the United States in 1914 to work as a doll maker. He participated in a general strike in 1933, the first walkout in the toy industry to protest low wages and intolerable working conditions.

He is survived by his wife, two sons and two daughters.

Louis Isaacson, first vice president of the union, will step up as president to fill the unexpired four-year term held by Damino.

MORE THAN 1,800 delegates and alternates were on hand for the Communications Workers convention at the Sheraton-Park Hotel in Washington. Photo was taken from balcony where additional hundreds of visitors observed the convention proceedings.

Elected New President:

'Vital' Role for IUD Promised by Abel

The Industrial Union Dept. will continue as a "vital and progressive force" within the AFL-CIO. I. W. Abel, the newly elected president of the department declared.

Abel, president of the Steelworkers, was elected by the IUD Executive Board at a special meeting in Washington on June 14 to fill the post left vacant by UAW Pres. Walter P. Reuther. The UAW's decision to withhold its per capita payments to the AFL-CIO led to its suspension by the federation's Executive Council and the consequent ineligibility of Reuther to hold the IUD presidentcy.

The Steelworkers president told a news conference that he regretted "the recent development that has led to this change in leadership . . . We will miss those who have severed a long and rewarding relationship and we would have preferred that the relationship could have continued."

Noting that the IUD has a dues-paying membership of more than 5 million involving 59 international unions, Abel stressed that the department will be a "strong and viable arm" of the federation.

He commented, however, that "there will be a period of reappraisal of IUD priorities because of the changed financial condition." The UAW is no longer eligible for membership in the IUD.

Flanked at the news conference by Jacob Clayman, administrative director and Nicholas Zonerich, organizing director, Abel announced that the board had voted to continue them in their present posts. The post of executive director, held by Jack T. Conway, who had announced his resignation earlier, was not filled pending a further examination of the department's needs and future functions, Abel said.

He told reporters that AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany had addressed the board meeting and reviewed the events leading up to the change in leadership. Meany praised the activities of the IUD, Abel said, voiced his regret at the latest turn of events and expressed the hope that all segments of the labor movement will be eventually united.

Abel, in reply to a query, said that the IUD's finances were "not the best" but that the department was "not broke" with reserves of over $600,000. The department has an income of about $100,000 per month, based on a 2 cent monthly per capita.

IUD's overall situation will be reviewed by a special committee, the new president said, and will make necessary adjustments in programs and priorities. He did not forsee the need for outside assistance.

The board adopted resolutions expressing appreciation for the work and leadership of Reuther and Conway. Reuther had been president of the IUD since its establishment in 1955; Conway had served as executive director since 1963.

The board also adopted a series of statements urging Congress to reject the House-Senate conference report linking a 10 percent tax surcharge to a $6 billion cut in federal expenditures because of the cuts to be made in urgently needed social programs; asked the President to veto the crime control bill because of its "wholesale destruction" of democratic safeguards, and called for tax reform legislation to plug flagrant loopholes.

NLRB Again Condemns Stevens Union-Busting stated with back pay plus 6 percent interest.

It went beyond the examiner's recommendations for the customary posting of a compliance notice to direct that the notice be read to all employes on the job and mailed to their homes as well as be posted on the bulletin board.

The board also directed the firm to provide the TWUA with the names and addresses of workers in the two plants and to give the union access to the plants and to company bulletin boards for a one-year period.

'Iron Curtain' Penetration

This, the TWUA said, will enable the union "to penetrate the iron curtain" erected by the Stevens firm to keep its plants unorganized.

The three-member NLRB panel was unanimous in its decision, but the J. P. Stevens firm announced that it has filed a court appeal—the same delaying tactics it has used in all the other NLRB rulings.

An early decision directing the rehiring of 71 union supporters finally took effect this year after a federal appellate court upheld the NLRB and the Supreme Court refused to review the case. The union said the latest case bring to 111 the total of Stevens employes found to have been illegally discharged since the TWUA and the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept. began the organizing campaign five years ago.

The notice which the NLRB said must be read to all workers at the Dublin, Ga., plants includes a promise by the company that:

- "We will not discharge any employe because of union activities . . .
- "We will not spy on union meetings or on employes attending them . . .
- "We will not threaten employes with loss of jobs or the closing or moving of the plant . . . because they attended union meetings or engaged in union activities or chose a union to represent them.
- "We will give back to Robert Brown, Rollin Dewitt Loyd, Larry Kelley and Larry Greenway [the fired workers] their jobs and seniority, and we will make up the pay they lost and also pay them 6 percent interest."

The record of the case includes graphic descriptions of top management officials, including the plant manager and personnel director, driving slowly back and forth in front of the union meeting place and parking across the street to watch every person entering.

It contains testimony detailing the interrogation of workers as to union meetings and warnings by supervisors that "this mill is not going to operate under a union" and that "it would shut down first."

The NLRB panel on the case was composed of Chairman Frank W. McCulloch, John H. Fanning and Gerald A. Brown.

Dues Assessment Boost Sought To Rebuild Guild's Defense Fund

Cleveland—Top officers of the Newspaper Guild called for action to strengthen the union's international defense fund, drained of almost $1.5 million by strikes in Los Angeles, Detroit and San Francisco.

Sec.-Treas. Charles A. Perlik, Jr., noting that the defense fund had spent more in benefits during the last six months than in any half-year in its history, urged the Guild's annual convention to approve an international executive board program designed to increase the fund's assessment income.

The program, which includes an increased and more equitable schedule of assessments, would boost the fund's present monthly income of $115,000 from assessments by approximately 65 percent, Perlik said.

The fund is presently paying $240,000 a month in benefits to Guild members on strike in Los Angeles and locked out in Detroit.

To prevent the fund's depletion, Perlik reported, the Guild has had to negotiate a $500,000 loan from the Auto Workers and is presently negotiating elsewhere for an additional $500,000.

Urging approval of the assessment program, Perlik declared:

"I don't believe this convention will do other than provide the reassurance our valiant members in Los Angeles are looking for as they pursue their fight against one of the most ruthless employers this or any industry has ever encountered."

Calls For Boycott

Pres. James B. Woods asserting that events have demonstrated Hearst is "out to break the newspaper unions" at the struck Los Angeles Herald-Examiner, urged a nationwide boycott against any advertiser utilizing the Herald-Examiner.

Executive Vice Pres. William J. Farson, reviewing the six-month-old strike, voiced confidence in its outcome. Noting that union solidarity has been instrumental in winning recent newspaper strikes in San Francisco, Vancouver and Utica, Farson said he was convinced that "continued interunion co-operation will also carry the day in Los Angeles and Detroit."

Farson reported that the Guild has been meeting informally with officers of the Communications Workers "to explore a CWA suggestion that we jointly consider the feasibility of the Guild's becoming an autonomous division of the CWA." He said the Guild plans to continue these discussions "as well as with our sister unions in the publishing and communications industry."

Sen. Eugene J. McCarthy told the delegates that his campaign for the Democratic presidential nomination had succeeded in bringing youthful dissenters "back inside the system," refuting the claim that "the spirit of independence, the spirit of revolt," cannot be effective "within the system."

Pres. Johnson, in a special message to the convention, hailed the Guild for "vital contributions" to recent progress in enacting "a wide range of humanitarian legislation to train our unemployed, raise minimum wages, provide better health care for our elderly, rebuild our cities, improve health and educational facilities and end discrimination."

"There were at least two bright spots in the depression year 1933," Johnson declared. "One was the inauguration of Franklin D. Roosevelt; another was the founding of the American Newspaper Guild."

Vice Pres. Humphrey sent a message applauding the Guild's efforts in encouraging the hiring and promotion of minority-group members, and helping to alert the American people to "this nation's deeply rooted diseases of poverty, prejudice, ignorance, crime and violence."

"I have great faith in the heirs of Heywood Broun," said Humphrey, referring to the newspaper columnist who was the Guild's founder and first president.

Meeting in the city where the Guild's Local No. 1 was organized 35 years ago, the convention paid tribute to 11 founders of the Cleveland Guild. They were presented with busts of Broun, following the convention banquet.

At the banquet, Cleveland Mayor Carl Stokes called on the government to "provide an incentive program so that private employers can be encouraged to take on the hard-core unemployed—to give them jobs and to train them."

Laborers' Project To Train 100 Men

St. Louis—One hundred jobless men will be trained here as construction laborers under Pres. Johnson's JOBS program, Sec. of Labor W. Willard Wirtz announced.

The contract, funded with $365,400 from the Labor Dept.'s Manpower Administration, was signed with a new nonprofit corporation in St. Louis, Construction Job Opportunities, Inc.

The Laborers union and the National Alliance of Businessmen participated in the contract signing.

Training of the student construction workers will be conducted in a variety of job fields. The men will be paid while they learn in the program which provides for 13 days of classroom instruction spread out over the training period of one year.

They are expected to earn $4.72 an hour upon completion of the training period, the Labor Dept. said.

Equal Working Rights Due For 6 Million More

Six million more workers will get protection from job discrimination when the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission extends coverage July 2 to an additional 195,000 employers.

The expansion of coverage is provided in the 1964 Civil Rights Act. It will give the EEOC jurisdiction over a total of 328,000 employers and protection for about 44 million workers, said EEOC Chairman Clifford L. Alexander.

But Alexander expressed concern whether the commission could properly handle complaints if budget cuts voted by the House are imposed.

He said the volume of complaints is heavy now and that it takes nearly 16 months to process the average case. The volume is expected to increase as the coverage is expanded, Alexander stated.

Closer to the Goal

THE 30-YEAR-OLD wage-hour law has reached another milestone as it moves closer to its goal of providing a full-time, year-round worker with a minimum wage above the poverty level.

The U.S. Supreme Court decision upholding the extension of wage-hour standards to 1.7 million employes of state-operated schools and hospitals is a highly important step toward the goal.

The court swept aside the challenge to the constitutionality of the 1966 amendments to the Fair Labor Standards Act by 28 states which claimed that Congress had no right to interfere with "sovereign state functions." The only interference, said the court, is that a state "is subject to the same restrictions as a wide range of other employers whose activities affect commerce, including privately operated schools and hospitals."

This adds up to the simple proposition that whether a worker is employed as a school custodian in a private or public school or in a similar function in a private or public hospital he is entitled to wage and hour protection under the federal law.

The thrust of the decision is to affirm once again the power of Congress to help eliminate substandard working conditions—in this case for public employes. This power should be extended to assure that no state or local government can create a situation where it can pay its employes less or work them longer without overtime than the minimum established on the national level.

The cry of "states' rights" has for too long been used as a dodge by many states to walk away from their responsibilities in the areas of social welfare legislation, consumer protection as well as basic standards on wages, working conditions, safety and other areas of direct and critical interest to those who work for wages.

THE COURT DECISION has cleared the air on the legality and validity of the wage-hour law coverage for state workers in specific areas. But much more remains to be done.

There are 11 million workers in the United States who are not now protected by the FLSA. If the drive to wipe out poverty is to be in any sense meaningful, then minimum wage protection must be extended to these millions—most of them in low-wage jobs and occupations.

To really have an impact on those living in poverty—millions of them in the category of "the working poor," the wage floor must be increased to $2 an hour and that floor must be applied across the board, including the farm workers given protection for the first time in the 1966 amendments but whose minimum is limited to $1.30 an hour.

To those who would throw up their hands in horror at the prospect of further improvements the words of Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz in evaluating the impact of the 1967 improvements are worth noting: that the changes have benefitted workers at the bottom of the wage ladder without causing additional unemployment or price increases.

The wider coverage, the higher minimums provided a positive, healthy effect in increasing purchasing power by $4.3 billion—buying power that generates new strength in the American economy.

The court has struck an important blow for progress. The job now is to secure continuing advances from Congress—a job that will be in large part decided in the November elections.

Sharing Prosperity:

Affluent Society Seen Obliged To Meet Basic Social Needs

The following is excerpted from an article in the June 1968 AFL-CIO American Federationist by Elizabeth Wickenden, "Sharing Prosperity—Income Policy Choices."

THE ROLE OF WORK in the modern society is central to any income policy discussion. Popular attitudes place the highest value on work not only as the basis for income, but also for self and community esteem.

Most of the current self-help efforts of the poverty program are directed toward fitting the poor to work and creating new job opportunities for that purpose. Yet some writers maintain that cybernation is already making obsolescent this traditional nexus between work and income. They look to the day when every individual or family would be paid a stipend as consumer, somewhat in the tradition of the Townsend old age pension plan. To my mind, this makes much better sense than the complexities of a largescale, all-purpose program based on income deficiency.

But this dream of lying under the cybernetic bread-fruit tree has its setting in an unpredictable future. At the present time, it is consistent neither with technological realities nor most people's wishes.

It seems an absurdity to talk about work as obsolescent when we have not enough houses, schools, hospitals, cultural centers, parks and playgrounds; when we lack teachers, nurses, librarians, social workers, youth leaders, day care for children, social centers for the aged, homemakers for the ill and handicapped, doctors, lawyers, merchants, chiefs; when our streams and our air are polluted, our parks neglected, our highways and airways corrupted by commercialism and our choices for enriching our spare time similarly constricted.

And all this leaves out the desperate needs of the rest of the world for our food, our machinery, our scientific know-how, our support for the instruments of cooperation.

I DO NOT THINK EVERYONE should have to work or work so long and so hard as many do at present. Considering that we are all born dependent, die dependent and spend varying periods of our life dependent, our fear and rejection of "dependency" is somewhat absurd.

But for the moment work still offers for most people the most satisfying sense of identity and achievement, the most acceptable source of current and deferred income.

Most people are quite willing and conditioned by habit to spending their money for benefits derived from the work of others. But they need to place as high a valuation on direct services as they do the products of labor and as high a valuation on services financed by taxes as on those purchased in the marketplace. For the more mechanical become our processes for producing things, the more we can free our energies for the fundamental human task of mutual service.

I feel that the government should guarantee a job at standard wages to everyone willing and able to work, should pioneer in the development of new kinds of work for persons of all ages and backgrounds, should subsidize retraining and relocation for all those displaced by economic change, should facilitate work for those with family responsibilities through social services such as day care and visiting nurse service, should treat education at the higher levels as compensable work, should place a value on work in the home (the Chase Manhattan Bank recently evaluated the average housewife's labor at over $8,000 a year), and should extend expanded social insurance protections to all these categories.

THE IDEA OF a guaranteed job, implicit in the Employment Act of 1946 though never implemented, seems revolutionary to many laissez-faire advocates who see in the labor reserve a necessary good to industry and effort.

But in 1906, Beatrice Webb noted in her diary a speech by Winston Churchill advocating a minimal guarantee of income with the state as a "reserve employer of labor." It is evidently not ideas and proposals that are lacking, nor even in our time the means—but rather the will to implement them.

It seems obvious that no system based on work-related benefits and universal public services can meet all needs. Some people, either because of physical or emotional disabilities, are never connected with the workforce.

But a national income policy that sets its sights on the prevention of poverty and alienation does not reduce the obligation to provide protective, alleviative and restorative measures on a basis of decency and dignity when they occur. It is simply that we cannot afford to risk the destruction or weakening of preventive measures by an ill-conceived emphasis on alleviative measures which carry such a seductive allure of economy to the rest of society.

'To Keep the Record Straight':

Msgr. Higgins Takes on Critics Of American Labor Movement

This commentary on "The Future of American Labor" is contained in The Yardstick column by Msgr. George G. Higgins, director, Social Action Dept., U.S. Catholic Conference.

"THE AMERICAN labor movement, one has been repeatedly told in recent years, is either dead or dying. In fact it may well be stirring to new life. . . . The unions have indeed organized a decreasing percentage of the labor force. Yet, in terms of numbers, they are, and will remain, the largest institution in the country committed to domestic social reform." Thus writes Michael Harrington in his new book, "Toward a Democratic Left."

The late Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr., had made the same point on more than one occasion —and, in fact, had gone even further than Harrington. "The two most dynamic and cohesive liberal forces in the country," he told the 1961 AFL-CIO convention, "are the labor movement and the Negro freedom movement."

Civil Rights Leader Bayard Rustin has also repeatedly voiced the same opinion during the past two years. Echoing Dr. King, he has called for a Negro-labor coalition. This coalition, "whatever differences now exist within and among its constituent forces," he wrote, for example, shortly after King's assassination in Memphis, "must resolve to unite this fall in order to defeat racism and reaction at the polls. Unless we so resolve, we may find ourselves in a decade of vindictive and mean conservative domination."

Harrington and Rustin have been pilloried by the New Left for voicing such a "reactionary" point of view with regard to the liberal or progressive potential of the American labor movement.

THE NEW LEFT is not alone, however, in thinking that the American labor movement is "either dead or dying" and that talk on the part of labor leaders about a Negro-labor coalition is nothing short of hypocritical in view of labor's record in the field of race relations. All sorts of liberals who stand, in varying degrees, to the right of even Harrington and Rustin—to say nothing of the latter's venomous critics on the New Left —are busy writing uncomplimentary obituaries of organized labor.

The most recent examples that have come to my attention appeared within the past month in two Catholic periodicals—the Commonweal and U.S. Catholic.

The Commonweal, in a May 31 editorial on Walter Reuther's threat to disaffiliate from the AFL-CIO, says in summary, that the House of Labor has become "merely an adjunct of the state, its leaders having succeeded in their quest to breakfast with Presidents and convene in the Fontainbleau."

The editor of U.S. Catholic goes the Commonweal one better. "Some people won't admit it," he writes, "but there was a time when there was much idealism in the American labor movement. There is undoubtedly idealism in labor unions today but apparently very little of it in high places. As the arteries of the American labor chiefs harden, so do their social attitudes. And ironically the most creative, even idealistic leadership for social renewal in the United States is today coming from industry and commerce."

This would be very "ironic," indeed, if it happened to be true—but, with all due respect to my good friend R.E.B., the editor of U.S. Catholic, I wonder if it is really as true as he thinks it is and so dogmatically states it to be.

I have great admiration for the "creative, even idealistic leadership" of many industrialists, but off-hand I can't think of any major piece of social legislation that "industry and commerce" have put through in recent years, whereas I can think of many significant reforms—including several in the field of race relations—which the labor movement has vigorously supported and which never would have been adopted if the leaders of the so-called House of Labor were as conservative as the Commonweal and U.S. Catholic have so blithely made them out to be.

I say this not to praise the labor movement—which, God knows, has more than its share of faults and imperfections—but simply to keep the record straight. And if I am wrong about the record, I trust that R.E.B. and the editors of the Commonweal will put me straight—with a minimum, preferably, of disgruntled liberal rhetoric and a maximum of cold hard facts, including some verifiable information as to precisely which organizations in our society are doing more than organized labor to enact the "unfulfilled New Deal programs" referred to in the Commonweal May 31 editorial.

I also have great admiration for many rank-and-file union members, but I have yet to come across any reliable evidence that union rank-and-filers, on the average, are more progressive than the allegedly sclerotic officials who preside over the House of Labor. On the contrary, every available scientific study of rank-and-file attitudes on current social issues—and notably in the field of race relations—clearly indicates that this is definitely not the case.

If these polls are accurate—and I have no reason to think that they are not—it would appear that the Commonweal and U.S. Catholic may be oversimplifying a complicated problem by aiming so much of their critical fire at the labor movement's top brass. Surely the labor movement is too conservative in many respects, but if the rank-and-file are, on the average, more conservative than their elected officers (in the UAW incidentally, as well as in some of the old line crafts) where do we go from here?

I really don't know, but I have a hunch that doctrinaire anti-Meany rhetoric, spiced with peevish cracks about labor leaders who like to foregather at the Fontainbleau, isn't going to take us very far. (Some of the most "liberal" conventions of recent years have been held in hostelries every bit as fancy as the Fontainbleau.)

Incentive for Efficiency:

Soaring Cost of Medical Care Spurs Proposals for Controls

THE SOCIAL SECURITY director of the AFL-CIO has called for hospital efficiency incentives and reasonable controls on doctors' fees to check the medical care cost spiral.

"We are doing neither now," charged Bert Seidman, and medical care costs "continue to go upward at a tremendous rate." Seidman was questioned by reporters on Labor News Conference, aired Tuesdays at 7:35 p.m., EDT, on the Mutual Radio Network.

Seidman said that the present cost-plus system for reimbursing hospitals under public and private insurance plans actually encourages inefficiency.

He urged that "average costs" for all hospitals be used as the reimbursement standard, which he said would spur hospitals to trim costs. He pointed out that under such a system, "the more efficient a hospital was, the more it would get in terms of reimbursement over its costs."

Seidman turned aside a suggestion that recently-improved hospital wage rates are the main factor in the medical costs spiral.

"HOSPITAL PERSONNEL . . . the nurses, the orderlies, people who work in the cafeterias and laundries . . . have been among the lowest-paid workers in this country," he asserted, and "in effect, have been paying the cost of medical care for the rest of the population." Extension of minimum wage law coverage to these workers and stepped-up organizing have stimulated the beginnings of a wage catch-up for them, he said.

"Hospitals should have taken steps to improve their efficiency in other ways, but they haven't," he asserted, "and this is what has really contributed to the increase in costs."

Reporters questioning Seidman on the AFL-CIO produced public affairs feature were Theodor Schuchat, nationally syndicated columnist for the North American Newspaper Alliance, and Harry Conn, editor of Press Associates, Inc.

By Press Associates, Inc.

AT A TIME WHEN LABOR is coming in for all sorts of denunciation by industry, notably for union efforts to work cooperatively on collective bargaining goals of mutual interest, a statistical report on large mergers during the past 20 years is of particular significance.

Briefly, the report made by the Bureau of Economics of the Federal Trade Commission clearly reveals "a striking increase in the number of large mergers taking place."

The report deals specifically with manufacturing and mining mergers from 1948 through 1967. The figures are simple, but overwhelming:

In 1948 there were four mergers of companies with more than $10 million in assets. In 1967, there were 166 such mergers of companies with total assets of $8.17 trillion.

Over the 20-year period, there were 1,083 of these large mergers for a total agglomeration of $39.5 trillion in assets.

What is obvious, in the face of such statistics, is the vast growth of manufacturing and mining corporations, both in the number of workers and in assets, that today's labor movement must face across the bargaining table.

Perhaps of even greater significance is the change in the character of mergers which has made it essential that the labor movement use new techniques in bargaining for their members on some semblance of equality.

During the past 20 years, there were 193 "horizontal" mergers. These are mergers that involve companies which produce one or more closely related products in the same geographic market.

During this same period, there were 156 "vertical" mergers. These are mergers involving companies with a buyer seller relationship, such as an aluminum ingot manufacturer with an aluminum product fabricator. In the past, this type of merger has helped create the "vertical" or industrial kind of union set-up.

BUT TODAY'S MERGERS are of a type to further complicate the problem of unions—"conglomerate" mergers which have grown at a startling rate. During the past 20 years, such "conglomerate" mergers among companies with assets of more than $10 million have totaled 734—more than two-thirds of the total mergers for the period. Total assets of the companies involved were $26.6 trillion, also more than two-thirds of the total assets involved in all mergers.

A breakdown of the conglomerate mergers is also of extreme importance to today's unions, since they create new and complex relationships between labor and management.

One type of conglomerate merger is that which involves companies which produce somewhat related products which, however, are not in direct competition, such as a soap manufacturer and a bleach manufacturer. There have been 529 mergers of this type during the past 20 years.

Another type of conglomerate merger is that between companies that produce the same product, but in different areas of the country. There have been only 54 of such mergers during the 1948-1967 period, but enough to cause labor-management problems.

Finally, there are conglomerate mergers that involve companies producing entirely different products. The report suggests as an example, a ship builder and an ice cream manufacturer. There have been 151 such weird mergers—frequently tax loss gimmicks —during the past 20 years, further complicating the labor-management picture.

Inevitably, unions representing different segments of the working populations caught up in these mergers have found it essential to cooperate despite the efforts of giant industry to thwart such cooperation. The fight of General Electric against the "Committee on Collective Bargaining" representing 11 AFL-CIO unions—a fight that has reached the level of the National Labor Relations Board—is an example of how vital labor cooperation is in meeting the challenge of today's giant corporations.

HOSPITAL EFFICIENCY incentives could help break the medical care cost spiral, AFL-CIO Social Security Dir. Bert Seidman, center, told reporters on Labor News Conference. Questioning him were Harry Conn, left, of Press Associates, Inc., and Theodor Schuchat of the North American Newspaper Alliance. The AFL-CIO produced program is broadcast Tuesdays at 7:35 p.m., EDT, on the Mutual Radio Network.

Jersey Unions Put Emphasis On Elections

Atlantic City—The New Jersey AFL-CIO was warned that a shift of 25 seats in the November elections could produce a "reactionary" Congress and that four liberal seats were in danger in the state.

Officers of the state body at its 7th annual convention called for a massive registration drive aimed at the 750,000 unregistered voters in the state and set a special one-day convention in September to make endorsements of presidential and congressional candidates.

Pres. Vincent J. Murphy told the 1,500 delegates representing 500,000 AFL-CIO members in the state that history will rate Pres. Johnson "as one of the finest Presidents." He scored those opposing the President's Viet Nam policies as encouraging "our enemies in the belief that we are so divided that we are too weak to continue our efforts."

The assassination of Sen. Robert F. Kennedy caused the cancellation of scheduled addresses by Vice Pres. Hubert H. Humphrey and Sen. Edward M. Kennedy.

New Jersey Gov. Richard J. Hughes hailed the state body's role as a "full partner" in his administration's efforts "to raise New Jersey from a fifth to a first class state." Murphy had called on the delegates earlier to support the governor's program of a billion dollar bond issue for housing, roads and other institutional aid.

Sen. Clifford Case (R-N.J.) told the delegates that the nation's attempts to eliminate poverty and racism were being slowed by a fear that the levels of income and education of those above the poverty level would be reduced to help the poor rise. Case called for reforming the tax structure as the best method of combatting poverty and raising the necessary funds.

The convention adopted resolutions urging Congress to pass the "strongest possible" gun control bill and mourning the assassinations of Robert Kennedy and Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr.

It voted also to finance an annual state college scholarship program.

HONORARY DEGREE from Columbia University was awarded AFL-CIO Vice Pres. David Dubinsky, right, for being an "enthusiastic advocate for the oppressed . . . and counselor to government in international labor matters." University Pres. Dr. Grayson Kirk, center, bestowed the Doctor of Laws degree on Dubinsky, who headed the Ladies' Garment Workers for 34 years. At left is sculptor Jacques Lipchitz, who also was honored at the commencement.

Organized Labor Seen Major Unifying Force

Chicago—The greatest issue facing the nation today is unity, Leo Perlis, director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Community Services Activities told 250 unionists at a conference sponsored by the Chicago Federation of Labor and Industrial Union Council.

Perlis described organized labor as a major unifying force in the country with its programs of collective bargaining, community service and political and legislative activity.

Perlis spoke at a luncheon of the CFL-IUC conference on "Union Responsibility—Action in the Community."

Workshop sessions were held on consumer counseling, social security, model cities, family services, youth and unions, pollution, the Committee on Political Education in 1968 and civil rights and human relations.

Perlis said that what the nation needs is "people power" as opposed to black power or white power. He called for a new kind of movement—"militant moderation"—to help solve the problems of the poor and reinstate them to full citizenship.

Too much poverty and too little participation are in a large measure responsible for riots in the streets and revolts on college campuses, Perlis commented.

"Poverty becomes even more unbearable in the midst of affluence and exclusion of some becomes less tenable in the face of freedom for the many," he said. If we are to survive as a free society, then we must open all doors to all our facilities and institutions to all our people, black and white.

"And we must have the national will to tax ourselves equitably to provide the funds for the rehabilitation of our cities and the training and employment of the unemployed," Perlis said.

John Ballard, executive director of the Welfare Council of Metropolitan Chicago, described the work the council is doing to bring social welfare agencies closer to the people. The idea is to have the agencies work in the community "where the problems are" rather than wait in downtown offices and have people come in with their problems.

Arthur Kruse, executive director of the Community Fund and Crusade of Mercy—Chicago's joint appeal for the Community Fund and Red Cross, praised labor in helping to raise funds for social welfare agencies.

Other speakers included Albert Towers, first vice president of the CFL-IUC, and Paul A. Iaccino, assistant to the president of the CFL-IUC, who arranged the conference. Resource personnel on the workshop panels included representatives of labor, government and the community.

New York Teachers Give Shanker 3d Term

New York—Albert Shanker was re-elected president of the United Federation of Teachers here—largest local of the American Federation of Teachers—easily defeating two other candidates.

Shanker polled 20,254 votes in the final count to win his third consecutive two-year term. Candidate Sol Jaffee garnered 2,273 and Keith E. Baird 2,101.

For Workers 40 to 65:

Age Discrimination Barred by New Law

A new federal anti-discrimination law went into effect this month—aimed at giving equal job opportunity to persons between the ages of 40 and 65 who too often have been turned away, or turned out, as "too old."

The problem of age discrimination in employment has been around since the industrial revolution, Harry Conn observes in an article in the June issue of the American Federationist, the AFL-CIO's magazine.

Conn, an editor of Press Associates, Inc., notes that in the early days of industrialization it was not uncommon for employers to fire an older worker and replace him with a youngster.

Few employers use—or could get away with—such tactics today. But age discrimination still exists because, once unemployed, the older worker has a much harder time finding a job.

Conn cites findings of a study conducted for the Upjohn Institute for Employment Research by Dr. Harold L. Sheppard.

Sheppard says the older workers become unemployed for a number of reasons: mass layoffs because a firm goes out of business or moves to a new location; or due to illness, or particular job skills become obsolete because of automation.

The longer they are unemployed, Sheppard is quoted, "the more discouraged they become, the less they continue to search actively for new jobs."

It was not until the late 1940s that the federal government gave any serious attention to the problems faced by older workers. In 1950, special studies were conducted in five areas to determine the specific nature of job problems affecting the older workers. Guidelines were issued by the U.S. Employment Service to its local agencies in 1951 as a result of these studies.

Further studies by Congress in the late 1950s and in the early 1960s by Pres. Kennedy's Council on Aging brought the problems into sharper focus.

Limited progress was made with the passage of the Older Americans Act of 1965. But it left much to be desired, Conn writes.

Last year Pres. Johnson called for stronger legislation against age discrimination in employment in his "Message for Older Americans."

In testimony at Senate hearings, Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz pointed out that there are 37 million men and women in this country between the ages of 45 and 64, and by 1975 there will be 44 million between 45 and 54.

Wirtz also noted that in 1964 about half of all private job openings were barred to applicants over 55; a quarter to those over 45 and almost all to those over 65.

This and other testimony led to the passage of the Age Discrimination Act of 1967 which became effective this June 12.

The law protects individuals 40 to 65 years old from age discrimination by employers of 25 or more persons in an industry affecting interstate commerce, by employment agencies serving such employers and by labor unions.

An employer cannot fail or refuse to hire or to discharge or to otherwise discriminate against any individual as to compensation, terms or privileges of employment because of age.

In addition, an employer cannot limit, segregate or classify his employes so as to deprive any individual of employment opportunities or adversely affect his status, as an employe, because of age. And, finally, it is against the law for an employer to reduce the wage rate of an employe to comply with the Act.

An employment agency violates the law if it fails or refuses to refer for employment, or otherwise discriminates against, any individual because of age or to classify or refer anyone for employment on the basis of age.

Unions cannot discriminate by excluding or expelling any individual from membership because of age or by refusing to refer any worker to a job because of age.

There are some exceptions, particularly when bona fide occupational qualifications are of such a nature that age is an undeniable factor. However, it should be noted that no employe benefit plan shall excuse the failure to hire any individual.

The Secretary of Labor is charged with enforcing the law. He can make investigations, issue rules and regulations for administration of the law and enforce its provisions by legal proceeding when voluntary compliance is not obtained.

N.Y. Non-Profit Groups Get Bargaining Rights

Albany, N.Y.—A bill bringing employes of non-profit organizations into the mainstream of New York labor topped a series of solid gains for workers enacted by the state legislature before its recent adjournment.

State AFL-CIO Pres. Raymond R. Corbett said the legislature produced "a second Magna Carta for labor" when it ended the 31-year-old exclusion of non-profit organizations from the state labor relations law.

The action means that workers at such institutions—schools, colleges, charitable and religious agencies—are now protected by the state labor law and under the jurisdiction of the State Labor Relations Board.

Another major gain, Corbett noted, was a bill to give supplemental cash to victims of job-connected total disability or their widows.

Until now, benefits under workmen's compensation laws have been frozen to living costs at the time of injury or death, and as a result some beneficiaries receive as little as $5 or $10 a week. The new bill could bring their benefits up to $50 a week depending on prior wage income.

In addition, the legislature voted increases of $10 a week in benefits to workers who are injured, ill or unemployed. Maximum benefits were hiked to $65 under jobless insurance, to $65 for non-job-related illness or injury, and to $70 under workmen's compensation, plus an additional $15 during periods of total disability.

Repeal of the state labor law's exclusion of non-profit organizations was a major goal of locals of the State, County & Municipal Employes and the Service Employes, both of which represent workers employed by such institutions and agencies.

An original sponsor of the measure was Assemblyman Seymour Posner (D-Bronx), a former member of SCME Local 1707, which is made up of community and welfare agency employes.

UNION LABEL AND SERVICE TRADES DEPT., AFL-CIO

VETERAN TEAM was re-elected to the top offices of the Furniture Workers at the union's 15th convention in Memphis, Tenn. Fred Fulford, left, starts his 10th term as secretary-treasurer; Morris Pizer begins his 12th term as president.

Kenin Cites Advances:

Musicians' Future Tied to Arts Gains

Shreveport, La.—Cultural progress in the nation, aided by subsidies for the performing arts, will bring closer the day "when the professional musician will come into his own" and receive the financial reward he deserves, Pres. Herman D. Kenin told the Musicians 71st convention here.

Kenin reviewed for the more than 1,100 delegates representing 290,000 members of the AFM, his 10 years as president of the union, the activities and progress of the past year and the prospects ahead.

The convention was preceded by a traditional entertainment by local and national musical groups.

Kenin's review touched on the recent U.S. Supreme Court decision which culminated an eight-year legal fight and in which the court upheld the foundations of the entire union structure in terms of the federal anti-trust laws.

He cited the creation of the AFM Employes Pension & Welfare Fund, which now covers 55,000 members in all phases of the musical industry, and the Phonograph Record Special Pay- of Actors' Equity since 1964, which this year will distribute $5 million to AFM members.

The Music Performance Trust Funds, set up in 1948, have disbursed about $78 million to furnish free live music to the American people and provide employment for musicians, Kenin reported.

He noted with particular pleasure the increasing economic security established for symphony orchestra members, recalling an AFM survey in 1960 which showed the average annual take-home pay of such musicians as less than $75 per week over the year.

On national subsidies, the AFM president declared: "I can think of no single aspect of both our country's cultural and artistic growth which has developed so rapidly and holds so much real future for performers."

Kenin touched also on the creation of the Council of Scientific, Professional and Cultural Employes, of which he is president, and the pilot programs now under way in the development of community cultural programs.

As to the future of the American musician, Kenin told the delegates progress in the cultural areas "may be closer than we suppose and when it does come, it is bound to bring with it a new and unprecedented flowering of the arts—in which music will have an indispensable role."

This will bring closer the day also when the professional musician "will at last receive the financial recompense he deserves, and the individual respect and appreciation which he so fully merits as a practitioner of a great and noble profession."

"This is the great promise of the next decade," he predicted.

The convention was greeted by Shreveport officials, Sen. Russell B. Long (D-La.) and Victor Bussie, president of the Louisiana AFL-CIO.

Fire Fighters, Community Services To Join in 5-City Neighborhood Plan

'Round the clock neighborhood Community Service referral centers will be established in five test cities by the Fire Fighters and the AFL-CIO Community Services Activities. The centers will guide people in need to agencies which can help them.

Fire Fighter Pres. William D. Buck and AFL-CIO Community Services Dir. Leo Perlis announced that the programs would be launched in Dayton, O.; New Orleans, La.; Birmingham, Ala.; Des Moines, Ia. and Bridgeport, Conn.

"Our members have long been involved in community services," Buck said. "In working with the AFL-CIO CSA on this project, we hope to provide a long-needed service that we are uniquely equipped to give."

The United Community Funds & Councils of America, coordinating body for all community fund groups in the United States and Canada, issued its endorsement of the program, Perlis reported. It has urged all of its affiliated agencies to cooperate with the Fire Fighters and the AFL-CIO in the program.

Perlis welcomed the aid of the Fire Fighters in the program, noting:

"Fire Fighters know their community. They are dedicated to protecting and enhancing their cities. They are well trained to know their neighborhoods. And they are available 24 hours a day, every day of every year to lend assistance.

"They are devoted to protecting people, and the number of lives saved by their acts of bravery each year is enormous," he added. "Fire fighters are truly the friends and protectors of their communities."

Buck and Perlis, in a joint announcement, said CSA representatives and agency personnel will train fire fighters to be "effective referral agents, a bridge between the person with a problem and the agency with a solution."

"We have found that many citizens in our communities simply do not know where to turn for help," they added. "Even though there are many health and welfare agencies, they and their functions are not clear to most people in the community."

CSA staffers will instruct the fire fighters on the functions and responsibilities of the agencies. The union members participating in the pilot project will then know where to send those with personal and family problems, such as the need for medical care, hospitalization, aid to the aged, child welfare, adoptions, housing, transportation, legal aid and the multitude of other services that are available.

Perlis suggested the program to the Fire Fighter executive board last September. The board endorsed the program, and mayors and fire chiefs in the five pilot cities have agreed to cooperate in the venture.

Actors Win New Gains As 3-Day Strike Ends

New York—The lights were turned on again in New York's theater district as an all-night mediation and bargaining session brought agreement on a new three-year contract and an end to a three-day strike by Actors' Equity Association.

The announcement was made by Mayor John F. Lindsay shortly before 6 a.m. on June 20. He had brought both sides together for intensive negotiations held at Gracie Mansion, the mayor's official home.

The new contract, outlined at a membership meeting that afternoon, provides a $15 increase above the former $130 weekly minimum the first year of the contract, and additional $5 raises the second and third year. It also includes an agreement on conditions under which foreign actors may be employed in Broadway shows.

Angus Duncan, executive secretary of Actors' Equity, said he was "very pleased that the mayor has interceded and helped us come to this happy solution."

Curtain Down on 29 Shows

The strike closed 19 Broadway shows and ten road companies, June 17. It affected 500 Equity members in the Broadway casts and about 330 in the road companies.

Leading the strike was Frederick Douglas O'Neal, president of Actors' Equity since 1964, who stressed that the public doesn't realize that 80 to 85 percent of those in Equity's jurisdiction earn less than $5,000 a year.

Four other Broadway productions with separate actor-management contracts and a wide assortment of off-Broadway shows were not involved in the dispute.

Equity members earlier had rejected a "final offer" from the owners and producers proposing a $35-a-week pay increase to be spread over 48 months.

Other issues involved the proposed increase in the weekly road company differential, strict regulation of the use of foreign actors and foreign companies on the Broadway stage, and elimination of the practice of reducing the size of the chorus of a musical after it has been playing 20 weeks.

Meadiators Brought In

Efforts were undertaken immediately at City Hall in cooperation with the State Mediation Board to seek a basis for agreement since such a shutdown has repercussions in other areas, particularly midtown restaurants and taxicabs.

Meanwhile actors and actresses carried signs as they picketed in front of theaters informing the producers and the public, "Actors on Strike—No show until we get a decent contract—Actors' Equity Association, AFL-CIO."

Road shows halted had been playing in Los Angeles, San Francisco, Detroit, Chicago, Boston, Las Vegas, Wilmington, Del., and Lambertville, N.J.,

The strike was the third by Equity since 1960. The 1960 stoppage lasted 11 days and brought the union members their first pension plan. That in 1964 caused cancellation of only two Sunday matinees before an agreement was reached.

State-County Wins In University Vote

Amherst, Mass.—An AFL-CIO union won bargaining rights for 800 employes of the University of Massachusetts in a representation election conducted by the State Labor Relations Board.

The State, County & Municipal Employes were the choice of employes in three units where an unaffiliated union also was a contestant. SCME won in the service maintenance unit, 348-196; agricultural college, manual unit, 27-9; security unit, 27-11.

Organizing staffs of the AFL-CIO and the SCME worked together on the campaign.

Blind Strikers Guided To Better Deal by IAM

St. Louis—A 14-month strike by about 50 blind workers against the Lighthouse for the Blind here is over. And an agreement to correct working conditions is being pressed by the Machinists District 9.

More than a year ago the blind workers presented their case to the IAM. Working conditions were intolerable, they said.

But the National Labor Relations Board refused to order a representative election. It contended the Lighthouse was a charitable institution and was exempt from the federal labor law.

The workers also had no coverage under federal minimum wage standards or Workmen's Compensation.

As their efforts to negotiate any improvements failed, they struck the Lighthouse and joined IAM Local 1345.

They began receiving strike benefits from the district and the local even though they had never paid union dues. After six months their benefits were raised to $40 a week when the Grand Lodge added its contributions.

The strike was settled after the IAM requested the St. Louis United Fund to withhold its $66,000 annual disbursement to the Lighthouse. The 30,000-member district is one of the major supporters of the United Fund campaign.

Joseph Cointin, directing representative of the district, said the strike ended with an agreement in principle. It provides for:

- IAM advice and assistance for Lighthouse workers in legal and grievance matters.
- A guarantee that all strikers will be recalled if they want to return to the Lighthouse.
- Improved services for the blind, including vocational guidance counselors and training programs.
- Creation of an employes committee to handle safety problems and grievances.

"With guidelines now firmly established," Cointin said, "we can sit down, discuss and work out particular details to re-establish the Lighthouse as a training institution and an employment center for the blind and handicapped workers—as it was originally designed to do."

Kansas City Vote Picks AFT Unit

Kansas City — The American Federation of Teachers won bargaining rights for Kansas City teachers as the AFT affiliate here defeated the Kansas City Education Association by a vote of 1,317 to 1,100.

This is the third major victory in representation elections for the AFT over a three-week period. AFT affiliates earlier won elections in Toledo and Pittsburgh.

Humphrey Asks Dual Agenda On Civil Order, Social Needs

By John M. Barry

Vice Pres. Hubert Humphrey returned to the battle for the Democratic presidential nomination with a call for a two-pronged attack on the nation's domestic problems through an "agenda for civil order" and "an agenda for social justice."

Humphrey outlined his proposals in a speech at the National Press Club in Washington, D.C., his first political appearance since the assassination of Sen. Robert F. Kennedy.

He gave full endorsement to the recommendations of the National Commission on Civil Disorder, the so-called riots commission, and called for a domestic version of the Marshall Plan to help solve the poverty of the nation's urban ghettoes.

The Vice President declared that "it must be clear that violence, crime, looting, burning cannot be condoned and must be stopped."

"It must be equally clear," he asserted, "that the conditions that breed crime and violence have to be sought out—and then rooted out."

New Phase

The speech represented the start of a new, "issues oriented" phase of the Humphrey campaign, but the newsmen questioning him concentrated on political matters, particularly his allegiance to the Johnson Administration's policies on Viet Nam and other issues.

Humphrey responded that the U.S. goal in Viet Nam has always been a political solution rather than a military victory, and that he has always agreed with this. He said there was now "reason for hope" in the Paris peace talks, but warned that the efforts for peace at the conference table would be no easier than those on the battlefield.

As for his relationship to the Johnson Administration, he noted that as Vice President he was part of that Administration.

"One does not repudiate his family in order to establish his own identity," he declared. But, he noted, Pres. Johnson had never asked him to create a Humphrey Administration identical to the Johnson Administration.

"Hubert Humphrey as Vice President is a member of a team," he said. "Hubert Humphrey as President will be captain of the team. There's a lot of difference."

Humphrey's resumption of campaigning came two days after his rival for the Democratic nomination, Sen. Eugene J. McCarthy, a fellow Minnesotan, posted a surprising victory in the New York State primary election.

McCarthy supporters won more than half of the 123 contests for district delegates to the Democratic national convention, and a McCarthy backer, Paul O'Dwyer, was the upset winner of a three-way contest for the nomination for U.S. senator.

McCarthy won 63 of the delegate seats at stake, with 30 going to supporters of Kennedy, 11 to Humphrey and 19 uncommitted. In the aftermath of the assassination of Kennedy, Humphrey had withdrawn his support of the delegate slate pledged to him, but this appeared to have little impact on the result.

McCarthy's showing in the district delegate contests prompted his campaign aides in New York to demand that the Democratic State Committee give the Minnesota senator more than half of the 65 delegates-at-large to be selected at a meeting, June 28.

'Third Man'

O'Dwyer had been regarded as the third man in the race for the senatorial nomination, with most of the attention focused on Eugene H. Nickerson, the candidate of the Kennedy organization, and Rep. Joseph Y. Resnick, a Humphrey backer.

With reports in from 12,583 of the state's 13,408 election districts, O'Dwyer had 266,500 votes to 250,405 for Nickerson and 217,141 for Resnick.

A former city councilman, O'Dwyer is strongly opposed to the war in Viet Nam and has attacked the Administration even more vehemently than McCarthy himself. He helped form the Coalition for a Democratic Alternative, an anti-war organization. In 1965, O'Dwyer ran last in a four-way contest for the Democratic nomination for mayor, but in Tuesday's primary he carried all five boroughs of the city. He will oppose the Republican incumbent, Sen. Jacob K. Javits, in the November election. Javits also won the Liberal Party nomination.

The results for convention delegate seats reflected a wholesale shift of Kennedy supporters in the state to the McCarthy camp. Among the resulting casualties was Theodore C. Sorensen, one of the late senator's principal campaign managers who headed a slate of three in the 17th disrict which lost by more than 10,000 votes to a McCarthy slate.

Sorensen had sought the election of himself and other Kennedy delegates, despite the loss of their candidate, to permit them to go to the convention committed to the senator's "ideals" in influencing the choice of a presidential nominee.

Although the primary results were being hailed by McCarthy followers as a vote against the Viet Nam war, there were major contradictions to this view.

Incumbents Win

In contests for the House of Representatives, for example, not a single pro-Administration incumbent was defeated, even in districts where McCarthy supporters swept the delegate seats. This was the case in Manhattan's 19th district, where Rep. Leonard Farbstein easily turned back the challenge of City Councilman Theodore S. Weiss, the only congressional candidate given a personal endorsement by McCarthy.

Other incumbents who defeated anti-Administration candidates were Rep. John M. Murphy and Rep. John J. Rooney.

In one district, Nassau County's 5th, a sharp critic of the Administration's Viet Nam policy, Allard K. Lowenstein, won the Democratic nomination for the House seat being vacated by Rep. Herbert Tenzer, while the McCarthy delegate slate also won. In November, Lowenstein will oppose Mason L. Hampton, Jr., the nominee of both the Republican and the Conservative parties.

In other major contests, Rep. Bertram L. Podell, a Kennedy supporter, won renomination over two challengers in the 13th District; Adam Clayton Powell, who had been denied his seat in the current Congress, narrowly defeated a former aide in the 18th District; and Rep. Emanuel Celler held on to the 10th District against the challenge of Rep. Edna Kelly, who had been redistricted out of her old seat.

Labor Rallies Support For Strong Gun Curbs

counter sales to residents of the state where the store is located, sets a minimum age for purchases, bars possession of firearms by persons who have been convicted of felonies, narcotics addicts, mental defectives and other categories.

Just nine days earlier, the same committee had been blocked by a tie vote from acting on the legislation.

A similar bill won 9-0 approval from a Senate Judiciary subcommittee and the full committee was expected to act on it quickly.

Pres. Johnson, in signing the crime bill, prodded Congress again to act "immediately" on gun control legislation. "We dare delay no longer," he declared.

The main unresolved question appeared to be the extent of controls—and particularly whether a federal registration of guns will be included in a new law.

The Administration's original bill left registration to the states, but many key senators and congressmen now believe that the votes are on hand for the strongest possible law.

Senators Switch

Just a month ago, before the latest assassination of a national figure, the Senate had voted 53-29 against adding a mild ban on mail order sale of rifles to the ban on hand gun sales through the mail which was included in the crime control bill.

Indicative of the switches is that of Senate Majority Leader Mike Mansfield of Montana who, along with most western senators, had opposed legislation which might be resented by hunters.

Mansfield has told newsmen that he will now support any move on the Senate floor to strengthen gun control legislation by requiring registration of all firearms and permits to own them.

The powerful National Rifle Association, chief lobbyist against gun controls, sought to drum up a counter volume of mail to congressmen and senators.

To keep up the pressure on Congress, a citizens' group supporting effective gun curbs and registration was set up under James V. Bennett, former director of the U.S. Bureau of Prisons.

In a parallel area, there were demands for stronger gun curbs and licensing laws at the city and state levels.

San Francisco's Board of Supervisors, by a 7-3 vote, gave tentative approval to a law requiring that every one of the estimated 700,000 pistols and rifles in the city be registered with the police. The measure is subject to a final vote on July 1.

Police in a Los Angeles suburb nervously appealed to the public to please unload their firearms before turning them in.

Following the assassination of Sen. Kennedy, there was a rush of people voluntarily handing over their guns. But it quickly became apparent to the police officers that a lot of the well-intentioned gun owners hardly knew one end of a weapon from the other.

House Approves Increase in Taxes Linked to $6 Billion Slash in Budget taxes on automobiles and telephone bills, postpones for one year the "freeze" on the number of children in each state eligible for aid to families with dependent children, and lifts the tax exemption on new industrial bond issues amounting to more than $1 billion.

In other major congressional developments:

- Pres. Johnson hailed House committee approval of legislation authorizing some $5.5 billion over the next three years to provide 1.2 million new or renovated housing units for low and moderate income families.

The bill, similar to that already passed by the Senate, would be a big first step towards the 6 million apartments and homes the President has set as a 10-year goal.

- The House Foreign Affairs Committee cut nearly $600 million from the President's foreign aid budget request, even though the amount sought was the lowest in the 21-year history of the program.

Republicans had sought even heavier cuts and indicated they will renew their fight when the bill reaches the House floor. Further battles over the program can be expected when Congress gets around to appropriating the money authorized in the bill.

- Two Republican opponents of bargaining rights for farm workers stalked out of a closed session of the Senate Labor Committee, leaving it without a quorum to act on a subcommittee-approved bill. Sen. Harrison A. Williams (D-N.J.), sponsor of the bargaining rights bill, accused Senators Paul Fannin of Arizona and George Murphy of California of trying to filibuster to block action and then leaving to break the quorum.

- The House again this year knocked out funds for the Dickey-Lincoln public power project planned in Maine to bring low-cost electricity to a New England area which now pays the highest rates in the nation.

- The House Education & Labor Committee unanimously approved legislation providing an additional $100 million a year for three years to provide free school lunches for more than 4 million needy children. The money would come from funds the Agriculture Dept. returns to the Treasury each year because of restrictions on transfers of funds.

- The Senate Judiciary Committee approved a House-passed bill creating three-day weekends by shifting the observances of Washington's Birthday, Memorial Day and Veterans Day to Mondays and making Columbus Day a national holiday on the fourth Monday in October.

the keyholes of the homes and offices in America, spying on our neighbors."

Johnson also criticized "vague and ambiguous" portions of the bill dealing with rules of evidence and rights of suspects.

He pledged that federal law enforcement agencies will not abuse their powers and "will continue to conform to the Constitution."

Likewise, Johnson said, the federal government will continue to confine wiretapping and eavesdropping to cases involving the national security—and then only with the approval of the attorney general.

On gun control, the President reiterated his position that the curb on mail order sales of small arms "is only a half-way step." He stressed that there is a "compelling" need for quick passage of the Administration's gun control bill.

Rail Pacts Bring Hikes To 400,000

By Duane Emme

The Railroad Trainmen and the Switchmen's Union announced tentative settlements in separate wage-rules disputes with the nation's railroads.

Their announcements brought to seven the number of railroad unions that have reached agreements for their members through 1968 negotiations with the carriers. The unions, all told, represent some 400,000 workers.

The other five — all seven are AFL-CIO affiliates—are the Railway Clerks, Train Dispatchers, Maintenance of Way Employes, Transportation - Communication Employes and Hotel & Restaurant Employes (for dining car workers).

Another AFL-CIO affiliate, the Locomotive Firemen & Enginemen, and an unaffiliated union, the Locomotive Engineers, were still negotiating with railroad managements as the AFL-CIO News went to press.

The Trainmen, largest of the operating unions, received a settlement proposal from the carriers in lengthy negotiations that were concluded only 24 hours before the union would have been free to strike under the Railway Labor Act.

Although the union withheld details of the proposed settlement pending the convening of its general chairmen's association for ratification, it indicated the terms were in line with the "pattern" set in earlier agreements.

BRT Pres. Charles Luna indicated he would recommend acceptance of the settlement to the association.

Soon after the BRT announced receiving its proposal, the Switchmen also announced reception of an offer, which in its case must be ratified by a referendum of the union's members.

The "pattern" as set in the earlier agreements calls for:

- General pay increases of 2.5 percent effective Jan. 1, 1968; 3.5 percent on July 1, 1968; another 2 percent on Jan. 1, 1969, and a further 3 percent on July 1, 1969.
- Improvements in vacations and holiday rules, and new procedures for handling inequities in wages.
- A moratorium on strikes effective through Jan. 1, 1970. No new notices may be served in areas covered by the agreements prior to Sept. 1, 1969. Notices on other matters may be advanced prior to

Death List Seen Rising Needlessly

American workers will die needlessly if Congress fails to act speedily on the Administration's Occupational Health & Safety bill, the AFL-CIO warned.

Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller told a Senate Labor subcommittee that the legislation is needed, "not next year but this year."

He noted that AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany had testified for the bill at House hearings in mid-March.

In little more than three months since then, Biemiller said, some 4,180 workers have been killed on the job and 646,000 have been injured.

It is impossible to count the number who may be dying of diseases caused by their work, he noted. Many may be completely unaware that working conditions or the materials or chemicals they handle and breathe are the cause of their ailments.

Biemiller vigorously rejected the "leave it to the states" attitude of major business organizations which are fighting federal safety legislation.

"Unfortunately," he said, "the states have been unable or unwilling to move adequately" in the safety and occupational health areas.

The Administration's bill, he stressed, does not abolish or replace state programs. To the contrary, it provides help and encouragement for states to develop and improve safety programs.

For states meeting federal standards, Biemiller noted, the bill "provides 90 percent of the program costs for planning, for experimental

Appropriations Battle:

School Aid Slashed By House Coalition

A conservative budget-cutting coalition dominated House voting on federal aid to education appropriations.

It upheld committee-imposed slashes in the basic program of help to schools with large numbers of needy students. The amount voted was $126 million below last year's appropriations, $135 million below the President's budget request—and only 39 percent of the amount which would have been needed to fully finance the program at the level originally authorized by Congress.

The House also voted to keep in the bill language inserted by a Mississippi congressman in an effort to keep the Office of Education from enforcing school desegregation guidelines.

Through intricate parliamentary maneuvering, the cut in school funds was accomplished without pinning House members on the record in a direct rollcall vote.

AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller had wired all House members urging support for restoration of the money cuts and deletion of the anti-civil rights provision. There were indications that these could have been accomplished if rollcalls could be obtained on the key votes.

On another section of the omnibus appropriations bill, a rollcall brought defeat of a Republican amendment to hack $100 million from anti-poverty funds of the Office of Economic Opportunity.

The money slash—going beyond the cuts already made by the Appropriations Committee — was initially approved on a non-record vote.

Rollcall Effective

But when a rollcall forced Republican congressmen to go on public record, the cutback was rejected, 220-181.

In a few areas in the education bill, additional sums were voted. The biggest addition was an extra $138 million in grants to schools attended by children of government civilian employes and servicemen. This is politically popular since virtually every congressional district gets some share.

The House also approved money to finance aid to teacher education. But it rejected efforts to add $5 million for special pro-

Grape Strike Expanded by Farm Workers

Coachella, Calif.—The United Farm Workers Organizing Committee encountered strong worker support and employer opposition as it extended its organizing drive and grape pickers' strike from Delano to Southern California's fertile Coachella Valley.

UFWOC Dir. Cesar Chavez had been here earlier on an organizing mission. His efforts were intensified when the AFL-CIO Executive Council extended the Giumarra grape boycott to all struck grapes, and called on every union member to support UFWOC, the "newest and neediest member" of the family of organized workers.

AFL-CIO Dir. of Organization William L. Kircher spent 10 days in the Coachella Valley, between the Mojave Desert and the Mexi-

Meany, Wirtz Mark Wage-Hour Milestone

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany and Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz marked a milestone in the history of the wage-hour law by pointing to a need for a further increase in its minimum wage.

They were interviewed on NBC-TV's Today Show by a network correspondent, Herb Kaplow, on the 30th anniversary of Pres. Roosevelt's signing of the Fair Labor Standards Act.

Meany reiterated labor's call for a $2-an-hour minimum as an essential weapon in the nation's attack on poverty. The highest minimum under the law is now $1.60 an hour.

Wirtz said that he expects the minimum will soon be increased by Congress, adding that such action "will depend upon what kind of Congress and what kind of President is elected" in November.

Enactment of FLSA in 1938, Wirtz said, was a determination "that we have a national interest" in setting minimum standards for wages and working conditions. "It marked a very sharp turning point," he added.

Meany agreed, pointing out that the law has made "consumers out of millions of people in a substantial way," people who otherwise would not be able to buy products and stimulate the economy.

He emphasized that unions sought the law and subsequent improvements in it even though their members consistently have been "over" its minimum standards.

They have supported the law, he said, because of the realization that

Fortas Is Nominated To Succeed Warren

Pres. Johnson accepted "with the deepest regret" the resignation of Chief Justice Earl Warren and sent to the Senate the nomination of Warren's successor and a justice to fill the vacancy.

The President nominated Associate Justice Abe Fortas to become the 14th Chief Justice of the United States. Fortas, 58, was a noted liberal lawyer and confidant of Johnson before being named to the high court in 1965.

To fill the vacancy on the nine-member court, Johnson nominated Homer Thornberry, a former Democratic congressman from Texas who is currently on the U.S. 5th Circuit Court of Appeals. Thornberry, 59, served in the House from 1949 to 1963.

Warren has since 1953 presided over a court which has handed down momentous—and controversial — decisions involving school segregation, apportionment of legislatures, civil rights and civil liberties.

He told Johnson, in a warm personal letter accompanying his resignation, that he is in good health and is retiring "solely because of age." Warren is 77.

Eleven Republican senators have said they will fight the "lame duck" appointment.

However, Senate Republican Leader Everett McKinley Dirksen disavowed the criticism, praised both Fortas and Thornberry, and predicted that both would be confirmed by the Senate.

TRUMPET PLAYER Carl "Doc" Severinsen salutes delegates to the 71st convention of the Musicians at a concert in the Shreveport, La., Municipal Auditorium. Severinsen, who conducts NBC's Tonight show orchestra, told the audience he was 16 when AFM Pres. Herman Kenin inducted him into the union in Portland, Ore.

Musicians Tune Up for Long Year Of National-Level Contract Talks

Shreveport, La.—The strength and unity of the Musicians face another major challenge in the year ahead, AFM Pres. Herman D. Kenin said in adjourning the union's 71st convention.

Reporting a year of membership growth and the successful completion of eight years of legal struggle against anti-trust law charges, Kenin rallied 1,100 delegates from 641 local unions in Canada and the United States to prepare now for negotiations with employers representing many of the AFM's 290,000 members.

Every one of the union's national-level contracts will expire within a year, Kenin reminded the convention. Wage, pension and fringe improvements must be sought from motion picture producers, television and radio networks, and from agencies producing advertising commercials and broadcast jingles, he said.

Kenin and Sec.-Treas. Stanley Ballard were voted another one-year term without a contest, as was Vice Pres. J. Alan Wood of Toronto, Ont. Vice Pres. Hal C. Davis, Pittsburgh, Pa., won re-election by defeating William A. Seeman, Perth Amboy, N.J.

Five incumbent executive board members won election contests from challengers. The winners were J. Martin Emerson, Washington, D.C.; Victor Fuentealba, Baltimore, Md.; A. A. Tomei, Philadelphia, Pa.; John V. Tranchitella, Los Angeles, and David Winstein, New Orleans.

Delegates and their wives were saluted by Shreveport Local 116 at a special concert given by local music groups, and a band conducted by Carl "Doc" Severinsen, conductor of the National Broadcasting Co.'s Tonight Show orchestra. Severinsen was 16 when Kenin, then president of the Portland, Ore., AFM local, inducted him into membership, Severinsen recalled.

The convention heard reports on union business, made technical changes in the constitution and picked Las Vegas, Nev., for the 1969 convention city.

The union is in healthy financial condition with 13,000 new members added in the past year, Ballard said in his secretary-treasurer's report. He noted a steady increase in the number of locals covered by the AFM's Employes' Pension and Welfare Fund.

Kenin reported a continuing decrease in the number of segregated local unions—12—and said the AFM will continue its efforts to end the practice of racial separation by locals.

Another major AFM activity has shown steady growth, Kenin said—the Congress of Strings, which yearly offers summer scholarships to talented string players, chosen in local competitions for intensive training by outstanding symphony musicians and orchestra conductors.

Last year the congress was divided into separate schools—at Saratoga Springs, N.Y., and the University of Southern California at Los Angeles. Former scholarship winners are performing with every major symphony orchestra and many other professional groups, the convention was told.

Special Tributes

A dramatic moment in convention proceedings followed the traditional memorial service for members who died during the year. The delegates joined in a special memorial to Sen. Robert F. Kennedy (D-N.Y.) and the Rev. Martin Luther King, Jr., both shot to death by assassins.

Kenin noted they were not members of the AFM and added "in the ultimate sense of the word, they were related to us and spiritually kin to us through qualities rare in humankind."

Executive Dir. Carol Morse of Young Audiences told the convention her organization has presented over 12,000 concerts to school audiences in the past 19 years and employed 1,000 AFM members.

Young Audience is a non-profit group with affiliated chapters in 34 states. It brings live chamber music concerts into schools.

The convention cheered delegate P. S. Cook of Atlanta, Ga., aged 90 or more, who recalled the days when a musician had to be versatile enough to play five or six instruments and rugged enough to perform while marching on cobblestone and wood pavement.

Virginia Labor Scores State Merchants' Lobby

Roanoke, Va.—Virginia labor has adopted a program aimed at pursuading the state Retail Merchants Association to forsake its "anti-union, anti-poor" lobbying tactics.

The program is embodied in a resolution approved overwhelmingly by some 450 delegates to the 13th annual Virginia AFL-CIO convention here.

State federation affiliates will "survey" merchants through the state to see if they are aware of, and agree with, RMA's "constant opposition" to anti-poverty, employment and social welfare measures.

The union representatives will try to "convert" merchants who are found to be antagonistic to these programs by pointing out to them that they prosper only to the extent that workers prosper.

The unconvinceables, the resolution pointed out, will be considered for "lawful treatment" that "might serve to prove to them the importance and the value of the patronage they receive from union members."

Virginia AFL-CIO Pres. Julian F. Carper, who dealt with the program at length in his keynote address, said:

"It is rather difficult for me to understand why, of all people, the merchants are hell-bent on keeping one-fifth of Virginia workers below $1.15 an hour, a starvation wage, which ultimately means less purchasing power for these people and less business and profits for the merchants."

In other key actions, the convention called for strengthened anti-poverty programs; supported enlarged manpower training and apprentice programs and vowed to continue efforts to repeal the state's right-to-work law.

Delegates also pledged labor's backing for a referendum, on the November ballot, to permit issuance of $81 million in bonds to finance state improvements in educational and mental institutions.

Sen. Jennings Randolph (D-W. Va.), a main convention speaker, stressed that "labor is right" in maintaining that the nation's economy can sustain and extend social welfare programs and still meet requirements of the Viet Nam war.

Another principal speaker, state Sen. Henry E. Howell of Norfolk, was given a long, standing ovation when he appeared and also won the convention's endorsement for the Democratic gubernatorial nomination.

Howell charged that Virginia's "mis-baptized" right-to-work law is responsible for the state lagging far behind other states in per capita income. "Free and open" collective bargaining, he said, could add $2.3 billion a year to purchasing power in the state.

Abuse of Workers Scored:

Faupl Urges ILO To Renew Spirit

Geneva—U.S. Worker Delegate Rudolph Faupl called on the Intl. Labor Organization to rededicate itself to the "cause of freedom and justice throughout the world."

In his principal address to the ILO's 52nd conference here, the leader of the AFL-CIO delegation warned that the ILO would betray its mission if it shrunk from "efforts to eliminate flagrant abuses of the basic freedoms of workers wherever and whenever they occur."

RUDOLPH FAUPL

Faupl had just scored the ILO staff for failing to mention in its reports on human rights to the session of nearly 1,200 trade unionists, employers and government representatives the existence of slave labor camps in the Soviet Union.

"This organization clearly flouts its most fundamental purposes when it hesitates even to investigate grievous charges of violations of its basic principles," he said.

Faupl was all the more outspoken in his criticism because he praised at the outset of his speech the way in which the Freedom of Association Committee of the ILO's executive council had contributed "so magnificently" to the protection of human rights.

"In countries all over the world," he recalled, "countless trade unionists have been freed from oppression, imprisonment and even imminent death because of the untiring efforts" of this committee.

Faupl also blasted the hard-line Communist delegations for their political attacks in defiance of conference rules against the United States because of what he described as American efforts to "safeguard the freedom and independence of the Republic of Viet Nam."

In the United States, he pointed out, "unlike the countries whose representatives made these political charges, there are free trade unions which, under the most difficult circumstances, are working tirelessly to safeguard the interests of workers."

Assistant Sec. of Labor George L-P Weaver, leader of the U.S. government delegation, and Edwin P. Neilan, the U.S. employer delegate, joined in rebutting Communist slams against American intentions in Viet Nam.

The first major item of business before the three-week session was completed when the conference adopted a budget of $27,500,689 for 1969. This represents an increase of $2,664,598 over the 1968 budget.

At the same time, the conference approved a proposal that future budgets and programs cover a two-year period to permit better planning of the 118-nation organization's activities.

The worker delegates endorsed the proposal on the express condition that biennial budgeting was not an opening wedge in favor of holding the conference every other year instead of on the present annual basis. This is the goal of some economy-minded employer delegates.

Another item of business was completed with the approval of a series of measures to improve the living and working conditions of millions of tenant farmers and sharecroppers the world over.

The measures were incorporated in a formal ILO recommendation that member governments must submit within one year to their legislative bodies as a guide for future actions in this area.

AFL-CIO Intl. Affairs Rep. Henry Kirsch served on a committee that drew up the recommendation, and Laborers Vice Pres. W. Vernie Reed worked with a group that shaped guidelines for labor inspection systems in agriculture. They will go before the 1969 ILO conference for final action.

AFL-CIO Social Security Dir. Bertrand Seidman was a member of a committee that helped shape resolutions adopted by the conference on a wide range of labor and social problems.

Edward J. Hickey, Jr., an attorney for a number of U.S. unions, participated on a committee that examined reports on how well member states are complying with minimum conditions set by the ILO.

Wirtz Tells CWA:

Labor-Liberal Unity Key to Nation's Goals

America can achieve "the complete human ideal" if labor and liberal forces stand and work together, Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz told the 30th annual convention of the Communication Workers in Washington.

This "ideal," Wirtz explained, consists of providing a child with as much education as he can absorb, jobs and decent wages for all who want to work and "security and social opportunity" for retired citizens.

The convention, attended by more than 1,800 delegates and alternates, adopted resolutions covering a wide range of economic, political and international issues, in addition to union and industry matters.

Speaking at the convention banquet Wirtz said "that more has been done to eliminate poverty in the last five years than in all the previous history of government in this country."

He stressed, however, that more must be accomplished in that area, as well as in advancing civil rights, educational opportunity and jobs at decent wages. (Excerpts, Page 5.)

Wirtz warned that the danger now is that liberals may become "divided" in their beliefs and that riots and turmoil in cities may give opponents of social progress the "upper hand" in blocking it.

Vice Pres. Hubert H. Humphrey, whom the delegates had earlier "wholeheartedly and enthusiastically" endorsed for the presidency, shared speaking honors with Wirtz at the banquet.

He told delegates that "there isn't a grievance in America that can't be settled through appropriate political action" and "not an injustice that can ever be settled by violence."

He appealed to labor to help him carry a message through the nation—"to let the poor people know that there is a better day . . . that the nation has not lost its way, but is striving to find a better way." (Excerpts, Page 4.)

Another convention speaker, Transportation Sec. Alan S. Boyd, stressed the need for solving the nation's urban transportation problems. He urged CWA and other unions to continue the fight for resolving these problems.

The convention rejected a constitutional change that would have allowed a trial board to fine or expel members for "wilfully, maliciously, and falsely" defaming the union, its officers, or its members.

It also refused a change that would extend national officers' terms from two to four years and those of local officers from two to three years.

The delegates approved a finance committee recommendation raising the national officers' salaries $2,000 to $3,500 a year to the following levels: president, $37,500; secretary-treasurer, $31,500; executive vice presidents, $29,500; vice presidents $24,500, and national directors, $21,000.

Delegates voted to conduct a study during the coming year of the union's strike defense fund, with the view toward increasing it.

An economic policy statement adopted by the convention listed these "priorities" among the nation's needs—jobs, welfare improvements, educational advancements, closing of tax loopholes to the wealthy and preservation of free collective bargaining.

It took note of CWA's recent Bell System strike—"a bargaining dialogue that we continued for 18 days with our feet"—by pointing out that it won "the most significant advance in economic terms ever negotiated by CWA."

A resolution condemning violence proposed that it be "smothered" by "a society of love and constructive legislation, at the state and federal levels." It warned: "To ignore the rising tide of violence is to become its victim."

Other resolutions dealt with the need for more federal aid for schools, passage of an Administration housing bill, a proposal by Rep. James G. O'Hara (D-Mich.) to create a million new jobs in public employment, support for COPE, register-and-vote drives by union members, backing for United Givers Fund drives and bans on wiretapping and eavesdropping.

OLD ACQUAINTANCE was renewed as Vice President and Mrs. Hubert Humphrey exchanged remembrances on the light side with CWA President Joseph A. Beirne (center) to the delight of 1,800 delegates who attended a banquet at the 30th anniversary convention of the union.

Press On for Rights, Meany Urges NAACP

Atlantic City—It is no time to be a defeatist in the battle to end discrimination—"it is a time to fight harder," AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany told the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People.

In a letter to NAACP's 59th annual convention, Meany noted that the meeting was being held at a time "which in many respects is the most crucial since the Supreme Court decision of 1954."

This is so, he pointed out, because extremists on both sides are taking advantage of the "gap between purpose and performance"—laws have been passed to further civil rights but their application has been laggard. (Text, Page 4.)

The result, he continued, is that some have flouted the law by resorting to riots while others have used these disturbances as an excuse to oppose further reform.

"To those of us who have worked together for so many years toward the goal of a truly free society, rid at last of poverty, with full and equal opportunity for all, this is a disheartening time," Meany declared.

"But to be disheartened is not to be a defeatist," he added. "This is no time to give up; it is a time to fight harder."

Specifically, he cited the need for more progress in the "disgracefully slow" rate of school integration, elimination of the "evil of slum housing" and achievement of equal employment opportunity.

Meany told the delegates that the AFL-CIO has never sought to minimize its own problems with regard to discrimination and is making progress in resolving them.

Discrimination in local unions has not been entirely exterminated yet, "but with the aid of the federal law we fought so hard to enact, the few remaining abuses will soon be eliminated," Meany said.

On another front, he described progress being made in a program to remove a form of de facto discrimination—the inability of many disadvantaged youths to get into the apprenticed trades.

35 Training Programs

Through an Apprenticeship Outreach program now operative in 35 of the 50 cities where the bulk of registered apprenticeship programs are located, young members of minority groups are being trained to qualify for apprentices, Meany reported.

Cooperating in the program are the Labor Dept., AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. and other groups, including the Workers Defense League and the Urban League.

Describing Outreach as a "highly important undertaking with tremendous possibilities," Meany said the AFL-CIO expects to extend its participation and he urged NAACP regional affiliates "to assist the program in every way possible."

Better Schools In Labor Urged For Caribbean

Bridgetown, Barbados—Unions in the Caribbean area must put more stress on leadership training as a vital step toward improving the economic life of all workers in the region, labor education directors of the Caribbean Labor Congress agreed here.

Delegates to the second regional conference on trade union education worked to formulate a master plan for trade union training.

Congress Pres. Frank Walcott and Sec. B. Brentnol Blackman said agreement was reached to go forward with programs aimed at reaching unionists with plant-level responsibilities.

Delegates reported on the need to develop instructors who can expand education programs for rank-and-file members and urged more sophisticated leadership training at the intermediate level. They also voted to ask labor education institutes in Trinidad, Guyana and Jamaica to extend their programs to islands which do not yet have their own schools.

Other recommendations were for the establishment of a Caribbean committee for higher labor education and development of research facilities.

Delegates expressed thanks for "meaningful assistance" given them by the American Institute for Free Labor Development, the Intl. Labor Organization and others. Conference consultants included AFL-CIO Dir. of Education Walter G. Davis; AIFLD Education Dir. Charles Wood, and ILO Rep. Max Swerdlow, on leave from his post as education director for the Canadian Labor Congress.

LBJ Pushes Drive to Open Summer Jobs

Pres. Johnson has urged a redoubling of efforts by employers to find summer job opportunities for disadvantaged youths through the "Summer Jobs for Youth" program.

The appeal was made in a telegram the President sent to Henry Ford II, chairman of the National Alliance for Businessmen, following a progress report by the group.

NAB reported that it has received signed pledges from businessmen to employ 133,000 of the hard-core jobless who have been out of work because they lack skills. The goal was 100,000 by 1969.

Short of Goal

But in another area, the alliance said it has found jobs for only 110,000 youths so far this summer, against a goal of 200,000 by July 1.

The overall goal of the summer youth employment program is 800,000 jobs, with the others being provided through the Neighborhood Youth Corps, regular federal agencies and state and local governments.

The program has been termed crucial in the government's efforts to reduce unemployment in urban slums, which have been the scene of riots in past summers.

Meanwhile, the Labor Dept. announced that scores of companies are now training hard-core unemployed workers under contracts established by NAB in its JOBS program—Job Opportunities for the Business Sector.

Types of firms entering into contracts to date include airlines, grocery chains, punch machine operating companies, sheet metal firms and a wide variety of manufacturing plants.

Los Angeles Pilot Organizing Plan Extended to Other Areas of State

Los Angeles—AFL-CIO staff changes to extend the successful coordinated organizing program from Los Angeles and Orange counties into other California areas were announced by Organization Dir. William L. Kircher.

Kircher told a Los Angeles meeting of the two-county organizing committee that the area organizing program will continue with AFL-CIO help but under local direction.

Effective July 1, Assistant Dir. Irwin DeShetler of Region 22—California, Arizona, Nevada—will become national AFL-CIO coordinator for farm worker organizing. William Gilbert, current director of the Los Angeles-Orange Counties Organizing Committee, was named to take DeShetler's former post as assistant director.

Kircher said the coordinated approach used effectively in the two-county area for several years will be applied in other parts of the region where interested unions are prepared to launch a cooperative effort with AFL-CIO help. Staff members freed by the change in assignments will assist, he said.

Kircher told a Los Angeles press conference that the change represents the third stage in the two-county coordinated program, and a further step forward.

The first step was taken in 1963 when the AFL-CIO Executive Council authorized a joint organizing effort on a pilot basis in a two-county area which long had been notorious for its anti-union employers.

The program over the years has added more than 100,000 new members to AFL-CIO union ranks after more than 1,000 National Labor Relations Board elections and voluntary recognitions.

Unity Cited

Committee leaders reported a "high degree of inter-union cooperation and unity" among affiliated unions in winning organizing objectives despite combined employer opposition.

Until Kircher made his announcement, AFL-CIO staff members engaged in the coordinated organizing program were given assignments only in the two-county area. From now on they will be part of the regional staff in order to make their expertise available for application throughout the region, Kircher said.

Delegates to the 1965 and 1967 conventions of the AFL-CIO urged unions to take advantage of the coordinated organizing approach in making organizing their No. 1 objective.

The 1967 convention recommended a "careful and critical analysis" of current union procedures to determine what additional resources, including financing and skilled organizers, are needed to reach the objective.

The convention asked all federation affiliates to set up procedures for specialized training of staff members and volunteer organizers.

A resolution called on all unions to give top priority to AFL-CIO cooperative organizing programs, recognizing the important role such programs can play in implementing each union's own organizing goals and help it meet its "general organizing responsibilities as a member of the American labor movement."

2 Maritime Unions Agree on Pensions

New York—An agreement under which members of two maritime unions can combine their service to achieve pension portability was announced by the Marine Engineers and the National Maritime Union.

Pres. Joseph Curran of the 55,000-member NMU and Pres. Jesse M. Calhoon of the 12,000-member MEBA agreed that service under either union's contract can be combined to achieve pension eligibility after 20 years. Benefits would be pro-rated to length of coverage by the NMU pension, with benefits of $250 a month, and the MEBA plan, paying $325 to licensed officers.

Humphrey on Labor

Vice Pres. Humphrey holds an honorary membership in the Communications Workers, so he spoke as one union member to another at the CWA's 30th anniversary convention banquet. Here are some of the things he said:

MY FELLOW UNION MEMBERS, we need to get our message to the people. We need to have people understand we're not interested only in a good wage, even though that is vital. We're interested in living conditions, not only for ourselves but for every American. That's the glory of the union movement.

The glory of the union movement is that it is not selfish. It understands there is strength in solidarity, that it must grow and it must include ever and ever more people.

If there is any weakness in today's union, it is that too many of us, too many of those who are active members and even officers have failed to carry the message of what the union movement of this country, the free trade movement, means to every American and means to every free man and woman throughout this world.

Look what you've done in Latin America. I know of it; I've been there; I've seen your work. You've been saving lives. You've been helping to build a free society. It doesn't come easily. You've been willing to share of some of the things that you have. You've been willing to help build free trade unions. And let me tell you right now it is impossible to have a democracy or a free government in any country without a free labor movement. Impossible.

There is no freedom that is meaningful unless men and women have something to say about their own destiny, about their lives. And the labor movement of America has been the greatest contributor to the expansion of democratic opportunity of any single force in this country.

I noticed your resolution here about COPE. Political action is tremendously important, my friends. There isn't a grievance in America that can't be settled through appropriate political action. I noticed your resolution about violence and crime. Let me tell you that there's not an injustice in America that can ever be settled by violence. Violence is the enemy of justice.

THE WAY that we should settle our problems is the way that we've learned in the processes of collective bargaining, the processes of democracy.

We've got so much in this country. You know, they tell me, "You ought not to be so positive about America; you ought to talk more about its problems." We've got immense problems, unbelievable problems, staggering problems, problems that no one ever dreamed of; problems of violence, of racial tension; problems that come from urbanization and automation; problems of bitterness and hatred.

But we have all kinds of strength too, all kinds of it. What is terribly important is that people know they have hope, that the impoverished know that there is a better day, and that you know there's a better day.

You represent the working people of this country. Let every American know that there is a better day, that the time has come to speak out in behalf of America—not a nation that has lost its way, but a restless people, a great nation striving to find a better way.

'You're a Five-Time Loser'

In NAACP Greetings:

Meany Pledges Labor Drive To Attain Civil Rights Goals

Following is the text of a letter of greetings from AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany to the convention of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People in Atlantic City.

THE NAACP meets at a time which in many respects is the most crucial since the Supreme Court decision of 1954.

The legislative gains achieved in the intervening years have been without parallel, even though they have come a century late. But practical application of these gains has been laggard everywhere.

Extremists on both sides have taken full advantage of this gap between purpose and performance, seeking to thwart the first and belittle the second.

The result has been widespread violation of law on two fronts.

The laws that protect society have been flouted by arson, looting and murder. The laws to reform society have met stiffening resistance from those who welcomed the riots as a pretext.

We in the labor movement are committed to the observance of law—all the laws. We wish that those who say so much today about "law and order" in the streets would call as loudly for "law and order" in the enforcement of civil rights. But they do not; they gladly use one to obscure the other.

To those of us who have worked together for so many years toward the goal of a truly free society, rid at last of poverty, with full and equal opportunity for all, this is a disheartening time. There are some who reject our basic assumptions about America, and they include many who have every reason to know that our assumptions are right.

But to be disheartened is not to be a defeatist. This is not a time to give up; it is a time to fight harder.

OF COURSE the progress of school integration has been disgracefully slow. Of course the evils of slum housing remain, and the twin escape hatches that have been opened this year—open housing in principle and more housing in fact—are narrowed by the weight of prejudice. Of course the goal of equal employment opportunity has been tarnished by those who seek to frustrate it.

Shall we for these reasons despair of America? We say no. We say that the answer is not to burn but to build—to build an America in which everyone, black and white, has a full and equal opportunity to go as far as his talents may lead.

We in the AFL-CIO have never sought to minimize our own problems in this respect. Discrimination persisted in many local unions despite its vigorous repudiation by every national union; it has not been entirely exterminated yet. But with the aid of the federal law we fought so hard to enact, the few remaining abuses will soon be eliminated.

However, in the process of wiping out discrimination as such, we became aware of another problem—the inability of many disadvantaged youths to meet entrance requirements for the apprenticed trades. Thus de facto discrimination persisted in the face of the best intentions.

There were—and still are—some who would lower the standards of apprentice training to accommodate these youths. In our view, this would be a disservice to them and to all who rely upon craftmen's skills. Instead, our Building & Construction Trades Dept. in cooperation with the Dept. of Labor and through such groups as the Joint Apprenticeship Committee (Workers Defense League—A. Philip Randolph Education Foundation), the Urban League's Labor Education Advancement Program (LEAP), the Trade Union Leadership Council, the Opportunities Industrialization Center (OIC), has developed an outreach program—a program to recruit and prepare young members of minority groups for apprenticeship.

This program is now operative in 35 of the 50 cities where the bulk of the registered apprenticeship programs are located. We expect to extend it further. We think it is a highly important undertaking with tremendous possibilities, and we hope you will urge your regional affiliates to assist it in every possible way.

This, of course, is only one facet of the great tasks that must be fulfilled before the goal we share with you is finally reached. But I think it illustrates what we believe should be the approach to these critical times—an approach that seeks constructive solutions, that rejects disillusionment and destruction, that holds fast to the faith that this nation we cherish has the will and the power to achieve liberty and justice, in the fullest sense, for all.

In that spirit I wish you and your delegates a most successful convention.

'Dream' Closer Than We Think:

Wirtz Stresses Hope for Nation In Progress of Past Five Years

Following are excerpts from an address by Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz at the Communications Workers' convention banquet.

I SPENT three and one-half hours this afternoon in front of the Lincoln Memorial [during the Solidarity Day observance] and I'd like to talk just a little about that because I think it's a very important subject. I have two reactions to reports about this afternoon, and I mean them both very, very sincerely.

I heard this said: "We will not bow down to a racist Congress." And I heard this said: "We will not bow down to an Administration that refuses to administer the blessings of this nation to the poor." I heard this said: "The promise of a Great Society was burned to ashes by the napalm in Viet Nam, and we watch the Johnson Administration perform as the unwilling midwife at the birth of a sick society." And then I heard it said: "Let my people go."

My text tonight is that it is the truth that will make us free.

Racist Congress? If the question is whether you and I, and our friends in the Congress, are in favor of the repeal of Rule 22, we are, and that problem is still before us. But it isn't a series of racist Congresses that have passed the four civil rights bills in the last five years, and that you and I have helped very much in the passage.

An Administration that refuses to administer the blessings of this nation to the poor? If the question is whether there is a very great deal still to be done to eliminate poverty in the country, and if the question is whether everybody in the Administration and everybody in this room tonight is still intent upon doing it, the answer is: Yes, we are. But the rest of the truth is that more has been done to eliminate poverty in the last five years than in the previous century, in the history of government in this country.

Please don't say that it's the use of napalm in Viet Nam that's kept us from doing what we want to do in this country and has made it a sick society. That isn't right, and the truth is too important to tinker with when it comes to matters of as much importance as it is today.

I take from the records of the last five years, or seven years, only one satisfaction, and that's all. But that satisfaction is the satisfaction of confidence that we now have learned how to do the things that we want so much to do, and without that confidence we're going to have a great problem getting on with the job.

I came away this afternoon with more hope than I've had in a very long time. I saw a lot of people at the Lincoln Memorial and along the reflecting pool and the mall and reaching up to the Washington Monument this afternoon. I saw a lot of people. I saw very few who were black, and I saw very few who were white in their attitudes toward each other. And I couldn't help realizing the gains that have come in the last few years.

I listened this afternoon to the first Negro senator since Reconstruction days, about a century, and I sat beside what I guess is the first Negro Cabinet member ever in history, and I didn't think about it until it came to the point of trying to think of what I'd say tonight. Then I realized a little of the gains that we're making and how they should be set, beside all of the statistics of the jobs that remain to be done.

I find myself tonight almost daring to hope things that I wouldn't have dared to hope before. The signs at the Lincoln Memorial this afternoon aside from a few, were very simple. They were "Our Dream—One America." That's all they said.

I found myself daring to believe this afternoon that there aren't going to be riots in the cities of America, this country, this summer. And I found myself believing that if that could be true, then perhaps we have come a very, very long way. I heard above the clamor of the oratory, the silent voice of an audience which was not responding very much to the extremes of forensics, but which was talking each with the person beside him and in a way it seemed to me to justify what I'm saying here tonight.

I realize that I say it within ten weeks of the murder, the assassination of Martin Luther King and Robert Kennedy. And the names of John Kennedy and Medgar Evers are there too close beside them, and yet I find myself wondering whether in some cruel, bitter way, we may not have learned our lesson, so that now there is reason to hope where there wasn't before.

If that is true, then I can only pray that there will not be, at this stage, that outbreak of hatred and of violence which will not characterize the country as a whole, but which will be the resort of a very few who could set the rest of us back so far.

For not very many people in this country—white people—are racists, and not very many people in this country—black people—are rioting. Almost all the rest of us want exactly the same thing for our children. And if we've gone that far, what a tragedy it would be if a little extremism were to upset us in all that we try to do.

It's terribly important that at this point we not be kept from reaching the pinnacle of our ideals by a resort to violence or by a sufficient claim of that danger that it will seem to somebody an excuse not to do it. That argument is going to come from people who were opposed to social welfare, in one form or another, before Viet Nam, who are opposed to it now, and who are going to be opposed to it afterward in one way or another, and I just hope we won't give them this excuse this time.

In Credit Buying:

Truth-in-Lending Law Seen As Value-Saver for Shoppers

FOR THE FIRST TIME, American consumers will be able to shop for dollar values in credit just as they do for other items, thanks to the new federal truth-in-lending law, a top consumer lobbyist for organized labor reported in a network radio interview.

Evelyn Dubrow, legislative representative for the Ladies' Garment Workers, predicted that although the new law won't be fully effective until next year, "many banks, and loan companies, and department stores" will begin to put their practices in line with the law now, instead of waiting until they are forced to do so.

She pointed out that the law's effective date was deferred to give the Federal Reserve Board and the secretary of labor time to formulate various standards, regulations and guidelines for the statute.

Appearing on the AFL-CIO produced public service program Labor News Conference, Miss Dubrow listed major requirements of the law as:

- Exact statement of interest charges—in annual rates—on loans, installment contracts and revolving credit accounts.
- Exact statement in credit advertising of fees for life insurance or other items connected with the transaction.
- Clear statement of the full purchase price and interest rate, to end "vague language in the credit business, such as 'one dollar down and one dollar a week.' "
- Regulation of wage attachments and garnishments that follow payment-defaults on installment purchases or revolving credit accounts. States that have better garnishment laws are exempted from this provision.

Miss Dubrow, who is also chairman of the AFL-CIO legislative subcommittee on consumer legislation, said that the new truth-in-lending law may not itself substantially reduce the costs of credit, but it will give consumers a chance to compare and find the best values.

"The honest banker—the honest businessman—has nothing to worry about," she asserted.

She was questioned by Neil Gilbride of the Associated Press and Robert Walters of the Washington Evening Star. Labor News Conference is aired Tuesdays at 7:35 p.m., EDT, on the Mutual Radio Network.

FEW DEBATES on Capitol Hill have been more emotional and with deeper concern than the current one on strict gun controls.

Three national leaders and many other citizens have fallen victims of guns in the last five years and, judging by the mail being received by members of Congress, the people are demanding action.

In 1967, alone, there were 6,500 gun homicides. If you add this to the accidental shootings and suicides, the total death toll reaches about 18,000.

The concern of hunters and sportsmen, represented by the National Rifle Association, seems to be that they will be deprived of their guns if strict firearm laws are enacted and enforced. Another fear is that rigid restrictions on guns would deny citizens the opportunity to defend themselves.

The Los Angeles Times recently ran reports from correspondents in Britain, France and Japan to ascertain how these countries deal with this entire problem. Their reports are most illuminating:

GREAT BRITAIN: Britain and Wales, with a total population of 50 million—one-quarter of the U.S. population—recorded only 45 murders in 1967 with guns, compared with 6,700 in the United States.

Law enforcement officers do not carry weapons unless dealing with dangerous criminals and it has worked well. Rapid-fire guns, such as submachine guns, cannot be obtained without approval of the Ministry of Defense.

It is an offense to possess all other weapons, except shotguns, without a certificate issued by the constable in the locality. An applicant must show "good reason" and the Home Office says "self defense is most unlikely to be considered a good reason."

Shotguns were not controlled until 1967, following an upsurge in indictable offenses involving firearms. Prior to the shotgun law coming into force, a three-month amnesty was held for returning guns that had no certificates. A total of 25,088 were turned in.

Penalty for unauthorized possession of weapons is a maximum of three years in jail or 200 pounds ($480) or both. In 1965 a total of 220,000 legal certificates were issued.

FRANCE: Death by gun fire is rare—even during the recent general strike involving up to 10 million workers and rioting by thousands of students.

Personal arms, such as pistols or revolvers can be purchased only on police permit. Permits are given for weapons for defense of home or office only when police determine it necessary.

Hunting weapons are easier to obtain. However, they are purchasable only with a hunting license and can be transported only if such a license is in the possession of the person carrying the gun.

JAPAN: Possession of pistols, carbines and other small guns is absolutely prohibited except for police or military personnel. Violation of this carries a maximum penalty of five years in jail or $550 fine.

Rifles or shotguns for hunting or target practice must be licensed. However, there are restrictions, such as a minimum age of 20, mental health certified by a doctor.

Rifles and shotguns are licensed only for hunting and target shooting. Violators can get up to two years in jail and a fine.

No country in the world has as many firearms in the hands of people as does the United States. It is estimated to be about 50 million. Last year, alone, two million firearms were sold.

One startling fact is that since 1900 nearly 800,000 Americans, not in military service, have been killed by firearms. Less than 600,000 have been killed in all our wars from the Revolution to date.

What citizens desire is reasonable security to protect home and family. The hunter wants to obtain guns.

Judging by the experience abroad, all this can be achieved—even with strict gun control laws.

COMPARISON SHOPPING for credit, the same as other consumer items, will be possible, thanks to the new federal truth-in-lending law, Legislative Rep. Evelyn Dubrow of the Ladies' Garment Workers reported on Labor News Conference. She was questioned by Robert Walters (left) of the Washington Evening Star and Neil Gilbride of the Associated Press. The program is aired Tuesdays at 7:35 p.m., EDT, on Mutual Radio.

Fitzmaurice to Fill IUE Post, Collins Resigns

The Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers accepted the resignation of Sec.-Treas. George Collins effective July 30 to take a new IUE post and named David J. Fitzmaurice of Cleveland, O., to succeed Collins.

Collins announced he will take charge of IUE's pension, welfare and insurance services and administer its international affairs program. Fittzmaurice will assume Collins' duties on the same date.

The union executive board meeting in Washington, D.C., approved the changes and gave Collins a standing ovation in tribute to his long career with the union. IUE Pres. Paul Jennings said Collins' new post is an extension of his career on a different level. He has been secretary-treasurer since 1962.

Fitzmaurice is president of IUE District 7, and an IUE vice president and board member. He will remain on the board but will not seek re-election to the District 7 post. The district has headquarters in Dayton, O., for a seven-state area—Ohio, West Virginia, Kentucky, Tennessee, Mississippi, Alabama and Florida.

Fitzmaurice moved to Cleveland from the Pittsburgh area at 23, and went to work for the General Electric Co. in 1946. He helped lead a fight to clean out extremist leadership of what is now IUE Local 707, and was the local's president from 1949 to 1960 when he became district president.

Meany, Wirtz Cite Milestone For Wage Law

"anything that does a lot of good for the economy and the American people as a whole does a lot of good for the American working man."

In addition to questioning Wirtz and Meany about their views on the law and how it has worked, Kaplow also asked them about trends toward the shorter work week and the idea of a minimum annual income.

Meany said that the guaranteed minimum income "might be desirable," but that it is a subject that "still requires a great deal of study" and some further development as to just how it would work.

Wirtz said that for the present another type of "guarantee" is needed—a guarantee of the opportunity to work at a decent wage with the training that's necessary to do the job.

Wage-Hour Signing Nearly Blacked Out

The official enactment 30 years ago of the Fair Labor Standards Act on June 25, 1938 didn't rate very high as a news item.

The historic act that put a floor under wages, a ceiling over hours and curbed child labor practices won barely passing notice in the New York Times of June 28, 1935—a brief story on page four noting that it was one of 131 bills signed by Pres. Franklin Delano Roosevelt on the previous Friday and Saturday.

There was no public ceremony to mark the signing of the bitterly fought legislation. No known photographic record exists.

House Coalition Imposes Slashes in School Funds

grams for Spanish-speaking students and it refused to increase funds for the Teacher Corps. It also turned down an effort to earmark health services funds for rat control.

The budget picture for social programs was considerably brighter in the Senate. A supplemental appropriations bill gave senators a chance to add funds refused earlier by the House.

The Senate additions, which still must be reconciled with the House bill in a conference committee, include:

- $75 million for summer job programs in ghetto areas.
- $25 million for the Head Start program.
- $32 million to start a new school lunch program with day care for underprivileged children.
- $13 million for rat control programs in the Public Health Service.

Fighting the adjournment clock, Sen. Joseph S. Clark (D-Pa.) won subcommittee approval of the basic framework of his labor-backed bill to provide jobs for the hard-core unemployed in both public service and private employment.

The subcommittee left it to the full Labor & Public Welfare Committee to write a dollar cost into the program. A majority of the full committee is listed as co-sponsors of the Clark bill.

The House Agriculture Committee voted to raise the spending ceiling on the federal food stamp program to $245 million for the fiscal year starting July 1. This is $20 million above the present ceiling.

A strong effort is expected to amend the bill when it reaches the House floor to lift the dollar restrictions on the program.

The Agriculture Committee also added to the legislation a ban on sale of food stamps to strikers or college students.

Next on the House agenda is the Natural Gas Pipeline Safety bill—and a battle between consumer and labor demands for strong safety standards against the industry's desire to escape federal regulation.

The Senate had passed an Administration bill authorizing federal standards for gas pipelines, including distribution lines running through city streets.

Scores of disasters, many traced to ancient, patched pipe, brought demand for congressional action.

The House Commerce Committee, under strong pressure from industry lobbyists, dropped key provisions of the Senate bill.

In a letter to all congressmen urging support for strengthening amendments which will be offered on the House floor, the AFL-CIO said:

"The committee bill has been tailored for the gas industry . . . with little if any protection left for workers and public health and safety. . . .

"This bill as it now stands presents the appearance of a regulatory program over the nation's gas pipelines without the substance."

The federation said evidence of the need for strong congressional action is found in "the ghastly toll of deaths and injuries from recent gas pipeline explosions."

Navy Registers Apprenticeships

The Navy Dept. formally registered its civilian apprentice program with the Labor Dept. in a Pentagon ceremony participated in by two union representatives—Pres. B. A. Gritta of the AFL-CIO Metal Trades Dept. and William H. Ryan, coordinator of the Federal Employes Dept. for the Machinists.

The agreement will add more than 7,000 apprentices to the 215,000 on the registered rolls in 70 apprenticeable occupations and trades. In the past, the two departments cooperated informally, they said.

Despite Difficulties:

Office Union Cites Membership Gain

Philadelphia—Substantial organizing gains were reported by Pres. Howard Coughlin to the 11th convention of the Office & Professional Employes here attended by some 300 delegates.

The gain over the past three years—12,509 new members, 4,000 of them in Canada—was seen by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany as noteworthy "in a field that is not easy to organize."

Citing an increase use of computers in office and clerical work, Coughlin said, "If we translate a tremendous jump in sales into jobs eliminated, it isn't difficult to see that our organized ranks would have been a great deal larger if it were not for the computer and its supporting services."

Easing of present international tensions and the return of three million veterans to the labor force would lead inevitably to the four day week, Coughlin predicted.

In the belief that the record volume of stock trading has created a working climate in Wall Street brokerage houses favorable to union organization, the OPEIU is launching a campaign next month with the distribution of leaflets to some 20,000 clerks in the brokers' back offices where high trading volume has led to generally deteriorating working conditions.

After congratulating the OPEIU officers and members on their organizing achievements, Meany pointed out that the AFL-CIO and its affiliates are moving forward on many fronts.

He noted that the federation's membership is growing, unions are securing higher wages and improved benefits and the AFL-CIO is playing a "tremendous role in the community life of this nation."

But labor is not satisfied with the "status quo" and never will be, Meany added, so the questions are: "How do we go about making more progress? Do we riot? Do we build by destroying?"

"No," he answered, "We are going to use the machinery available to us under this system under which we live."

The machinery, he continued, is the same machinery that has been used in the past—political action to elect liberal lawmakers at all levels of government and picket lines, if necessary, to advance the cause of workers.

Meany cautioned against the nation losing faith in its youth because of "campus behavior that annoys us." He reminded that students "misbehaving" on campuses four and five years ago are now married, raising families and in the service of the nation.

The nation's system of government, Meany said, "is not perfect but it is the best that the human mind has been able to devise up to this point in history and I think we should have faith in it."

At midway point in the convention, delegates approved an executive board recommendation for a 20-cent increase in the per capita tax, with 10 cents to take effect October 1968 and the other 10 cents one year later. With this action went approval of a minimum $4 monthly dues structure; the old minimum was $3.

Sen. Joseph S. Clark (D-Pa.) told the delegates that he wished to "scare" them by the tide of anti-labor legislation that could engulf them should reactionary forces take over Congress.

"Many of us are up for grabs this year—all the way from Wayne Morse in Oregon to Joe Clark in Pennsylvania," the senator observed. "You and your friends must get registered and then go out and vote for the candidate who would serve you best."

AFL-CIO Dir. of Organization William L. Kircher, fresh from organizing work on the West Coast, noted that collective bargaining continues to serve workers at the top and bottom of the pay scale, "from the senior airline pilots earning from $45,000 to $50,000 a year" to oppressed farm workers. Of the farm effort, Kircher said that the fervor and determination of the organizers in the field was an inspiration to all who are associated with the campaign.

can border, helping Chavez and his farm workers in their struggle to build a union.

"This is a rich and fertile valley," Kircher reported with thousands of workers hired to harvest acres of corn, citrus fruits, dates and grapes. Almost all the dates produced in the United States and 10,000 acres of table grapes are grown here by 83 employers, he noted.

For three or four weeks, Kircher reported, UFWOC organizers drove all over the valley, asking the field workers to join the drive for a living wage and better working conditions under the UFWOC banner.

The signing up of workers had been moving with great success, he wrote, and more than 90 percent of the workers had signed up by June 10, when the union asked the employers for recognition.

"Every effort was made to get the growers to talk," Kircher said. "They resisted every offer whether the talks were to be exploratory or otherwise. As a result, a strike was called."

The union began calling the workers out of the vinyards after a final effort to get negotiations started had failed, and after a mass meeting of the strikers at Indio June 17.

At the meeting, nearly 1,000 workers joined in a vote for the union as their bargaining agent, and less than 20 voted no. Representatives of the Indio community, of the Catholic archdiocese, and an aide to Rep. John V. Tunney (D-Calif.) attended as observers. Final poll results, the union later announced, were 1,484 for UFWOC, 32 against.

The growers scoffed at the vote, and the chairman of the Grape Growers League said the strike was a "total failure."

UFWOC said the statement was inaccurate and the strike is continuing successfully. The growers, it said, packed and shipped only about 10 percent of the normal shipment.

In New York, a grape industry spokesman admitted the labor boycott has reduced the sale of table grapes sharply in an area that normally consumes 20 percent of the crop.

The "Don't Buy" campaign is aimed at aiding striking farm workers in the Delano area, and now in the Coachella Valley. The only fields under contract with UFWOC are those of the DiGiorgio Co., marketed under the Hi-Color label.

In Indio, the Daily News reported a John Birch Society press conference at which a public relations man for the society's Western division "belittled" the vote and charged Chavez "adheres to Marxist philosophies." The next day Chavez threatened to sue the Bircher for slander, and Kircher was quoted as saying the AFL-CIO and its unions fully support Chavez and his union.

Every UFWOC attempt to avoid a strike was rebuffed by the employers, Kircher said in his report to the AFL-CIO.

"Within 48 hours of the commencement of the strike," he said, "a federal court in Los Angeles issued an order restraining the U.S. Immigration Service from enforcing regulations which prevent commuters from across the border to act as strikebreakers."

The court's action, Kircher said, has the effect of opening the entire Mexican-U.S. Border to any "green card" holder as a strikebreaker without restrictions.

Tentative Pacts Reached:

Detroit News Strike Seen Near Solution

Detroit—Four unions reached tentative agreement with publishers of the Detroit Free Press and News to move the 7.5-month newspaper strike and lockout within sight of final settlement.

The publishers offered wage increases totaling $33 a week over a 34.5-month term, subject to acceptance by members of Typographical Local 18, Printing Pressmen's Local 13, Lithographers & Photoengravers Local 12, and Local 10 of the Paper & Plate Handlers (affiliated with the Pressmen).

The dailies announced a target date of July 10 for resuming publication but three other unions still have to settle — the Mailers, affiliated with the ITU; Stereotypers Local 9, and Local 22 of the Newspaper Guild, the only one of seven primary newspaper unions which did not strike but was locked out.

The three indicated tentative approval of the economic package but all unions agreed no one would return to work until final contracts are signed. That could take two weeks or more, they said.

Mediators Helped

First news of the break in the bargaining stalemate came June 25 from Dr. Nathan Feinsinger, University of Wisconsin law professor and special mediator. He was aided at the finish by Irving Bluestone of the Auto Workers.

The agreement calls for an average $11-a-week raise on resumption of publication; another $10 in the 11th month of the contract; $9 more in the 21st month, and a final $3 in the 34th month.

New contract language provides three days of bereavement pay for a union member who suffers a death in his immediate family.

Feinsinger said the compromise agreement was a modification of a proposal he presented to both sides June 15. It called for a $33 wage increase over the 36-month life of a new contract. The unions turned it down as defective.

The Teamsters, who began the blackout Nov. 15, 1967, when they struck the News, reached agreement with the publishers in March when they accepted a $30 wage offer over a 36-month period. They signed June 18 with the understanding they would receive the same amount of money eventually given to the other unions.

Feinsinger temporarily bowed out of the negotiations after his proposal was rejected by the unions.

Scab Papers Planned

On June 19 the News said it could not be expected to stay shut down forever, and called for nonstriking News supervisory personnel to volunteer to learn how to put out a strikebreaking newspaper. Similar instruction previously had been given to key Free Press nonstrikers.

With the threatened total collapse of negotiations, Gov. George Romney (R) called Feinsinger back to Detroit June 21, where he conferred with both Romney and Detroit Mayor Jerome P. Cavanagh. Feinsinger then called the parties back into negotiations.

If finally accepted, the compromise wage offer will provide union members with a total three-year raise of about $3,484—$260 more than provided in the Teamsters' original contract.

STRONG SUPPORT of striking Illinois Bell telephone workers was voted by members of the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers at this Chicago rally and one like it in Springfield, Ill. Chairman Robert Nickey of negotiating committee addresses 5,000 strikers in second month of their effort to get better contract terms for 11,000 plant workers. Another 12,000 IBEW members have voted to strike a Western Electric plant at Kearny, N.J., if mediation talks fail in Washington, D.C., June 28.

Guild Rearms Its Hearst Strikers With Pledges, Defense Fund Boost

Cleveland—The Newspaper Guild backed 1,200 union strikers at Hearst's Los Angeles Herald-Examiner with a pledge to keep fighting for decent contract terms, and raised its assessment schedule to help them support their families while the fight continues.

Delegates to ANG's 35th anniversary convention voted to strengthen the defense fund by authorizing increases up to 65 percent of the current assessment schedule and by revising the schedule to make for more equitable spacing of assessment steps.

The present assessment range of $1 to $6 will go to the $2.50-$8.50 range keyed to salaries as of Aug. 1, rising to $12.50 in three annual steps starting Oct. 1, 1968. The convention adopted the Guild's Model Dues schedule, with higher ceilings, as its guide.

The delegates adopted a special report asserting that Publisher George Hearst "has clearly embarked on a ruthless course to destroy the Guild and 11 other unions in his plant." It declared: "If Hearst wants a battle of endurance, the Guild will demonstrate as much staying power as it takes to win."

As the first step in an expanded organizing campaign, the delegates authorized ANG officers to set up a pilot project in a compact geographic area in which new members can be organized into a single local union, absorbed by an existing local or linked by a servicing arrangement provided by an ANG international representative. Six or seven locals already have applied for consideration, ANG Executive Vice Pres. William J. Farson reported.

The convention warned that a "Hearst war on the Guild is a Hearst war on trade unionism." It appealed to the "entire international labor movement" to come to the aid of embattled members of the Guild and other printing-trades unions on strike or locked out since last Dec. 15.

It urged trade unionists everywhere not to purchase goods advertised in the Herald-Examiner and not to patronize local branches of national chains that use the strikebreaker-produced paper.

Lists of advertisers are being made available by the Los Angeles unions. The convention called on Guild locals to begin handbilling and product picketing at these establishments.

Breaking new ground in several collective-bargaining areas, the convention established double pay for vacations and double pay for overtime as bargaining goals. It called on locals to seek two additional paid holidays, the employe's birthday and a day of his choice.

The convention revised Guild wage goals to $340.50 for key experienced employes and $170.25 for all adult employes on the basis of increases in prices and productivity.

It called on locals to encourage training programs on newspapers for minority and other hard-core unemployed workers. And in response to increasing attacks on newsmen in riots and other disorders, it called for new contract clauses stipulating an employe's right to refuse hazardous assignments, providing premium pay for work on such assignments, and requiring employers to furnish protective gear, extra insurance coverage and reimbursement for damage.

The convention protested vigorously against police attacks on newsmen in at least six U.S. cities during the past year, warning that the apparently deliberate attacks endanger not only newsmen "but every principle of freedom of the press." And it condemned recent cases of police and FBI impersonation of newsmen for promoting public distrust of newsmen.

The convention amended the union's constitution to extend Guild jurisdiction to government information and publication employes, subject to International Executive Board approval in each case. The action was taken to open the door to some 400 information-service officers of the Canadian government.

Argentine Unions Get Record Housing Loan

Members of four Argentine trade unions are the recipients of the largest housing loan ever made to Latin American workers under the Alliance for Progress and the sponsorship of the American Institute for Free Labor Development.

Loan agreements were recently signed and construction started on a $13 million project to house more than 1,660 families in 52 apartment buildings on eight sites. The housing developments will range from three-story buildings to 15-story high rise apartment structures situated in Buenos Aires and the communities of Bahia Blanca and Pergamino.

The prospective homeowners are members of unions representing more than 330,000 Argentine workers—the Postal & Communications Workers, the Light & Power Workers, the Municipal Workers and the Railway Workers.

Each family purchasing one of the two or three-bedroom units will make a 10 percent down payment and make monthly payments at 6.5 percent interest on the balance over 25 years.

Funds for the construction and long-term financing were made available by two U.S. firms—Connecticut General Insurance Co. and Connecticut Mutual Insurance Co. The loan is guaranteed by the U.S. Agency for Intl. Development.

Besides sponsoring the project, AIFLD is helping the four Argentine unions set up housing cooperatives for the future home owners.

The largest development previously sponsored by the AIFLD was the $10-million John F. Kennedy project in Mexico City which was financed by funds from AFL-CIO unions.

Since 1963, more than 13,000 housing units costing over $50 million have been completed or are under construction with AIFLD sponsorship in 10 Latin American countries.

then but not to the stage of being free to strike under the RLA.

Each of the five agreements vary in some respects. Skilled workers represented by the MWE received additional pay boosts. Dining car employes received an improved basis for determining vacations.

Also, the Switchmen announced that their proposal calls for an added 5 cents an hour pay increase to settle an earlier "inequity" claim and insurance, medical and disability benefits for employes required to travel in public conveyances while on duty.

Indications were that the Trainmen's pact also contains similar "inequity" adjustments and the new travel protection.

James W. Mast Gets NLRB Regional Post

Appointment of James W. Mast as Alburquerque, N.M., regional attorney for the National Labor Relations Board was announced by NLRB Gen. Counsel Arnold Ordman. Mast, 40, joined the NLRB legal staff in 1958.

AFL-CIO Sets Up Hearst Strike Fund

The AFL-CIO Executive Council established a special strike fund with a $25,000 contribution for the relief of Hearst newspaper strikers in Los Angeles and called on all unions to contribute "as generously as you can."

Federation Pres. George Meany said in a letter to affiliates that Hearst, using strikebreakers protected by police and court injunctions, has continued to publish the Herald-Examiner while rejecting all requests that he bargain in good faith.

Unions representing 2,000 employes "urgently need financial assistance and the AFL-CIO intends to help them in every way that it can," Meany said. Checks should be made payable to the Herald-Examiner Strike Fund, in care of AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler.

Appeal to Congress:

Quick Action Urged On Gun Control Bill

A labor-backed drive for a strong gun control law picked up new momentum as Pres. Johnson asked Congress to require registration of all firearms and licensing of gun owners.

These are "common sense safeguards which any civilized nation must apply for the safety of its people," the President said.

Johnson asked once again that Congress pass "without delay" his earlier proposal for a ban on interstate sales of rifles and ammunition—as well as handguns.

But further steps are needed, the President stressed, to keep deadly weapons out of the hands of criminals, dope addicts, alcoholics and the mentally ill.

He called for:

- "A national registration of all firearms, both those already in private hands and those acquired in the future." Through a computer system, he said, the owner of a gun anywhere in the United States could be identified in a matter of seconds.
- Federal licensing of all gun owners in those states which do not enact licensing laws meeting federal minimum standards.

The President anticipated the outcry against his registration and licensing proposal which came immediately from the National Rifle Association, the right-wing Liberty Lobby and other foes of gun laws.

He noted that automobiles, boats—even dogs and bicycles in many communities—are commonly registered. Licenses are needed to drive, fish and hunt.

"Certainly no less should be required for the possession of lethal weapons that have caused so much horror and heartbreak in this country," Johnson urged.

He said "the only heritage that is harmed is the record of violent death and destruction that shames our history."

A Senate Judiciary subcommittee, which had already approved a ban on mail order sale of firearms, heard testimony supporting the registration and licensing proposal at a quickly-called hearing.

Witnesses supporting the proposal included Atty. Gen. Ramsey Clark and John Glenn, the former astronaut and friend of the Kennedy family, who is heading the new Emergency Committee for Gun Control. The AFL-CIO is one of the founding organizations of the committee.

Subcommittee Chairman Thomas J. Dodd (D-Conn.) also read a letter from Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) strongly supporting the Administration's legislative proposals.

"I know of no piece of legislation which is more important to the security and well-being of every single American," Kennedy said.

Deaths, Injuries Cited In Plea for Safety Law and demonstration programs, reporting systems, personnel training, administration and enforcement."

Biemiller cited the survey made by the AFL-CIO News which found that most states had only a handful of safety inspectors—often less than a tenth the number of their fish and game wardens—and many states had no program at all to deal with occupational diseases.

He noted that Subcommittee Chairman Ralph W. Yarborough had been in the group of government officials that visited the site of a construction tragedy in nearby Virginia. Not only didn't Virginia have concrete construction standards that might have prevented such an accident, Biemiller observed, but only 10 of the 50 states had such standards.

"The record is clear," he asserted, "that to continue to leave to the states sole jurisdiction over the occupational health and safety of 75 million workers would perpetuate an intolerable injustice."

Earlier the subcommittee had heard industry spokesmen attack the legislation and criticize the Administration for pushing for its enactment.

Assistant Sec. of Labor Esther Peterson "got mad," she told newsmen when an official of the American Iron & Steel Institute accused the Labor Dept. of "yellow journalism" because some of the pictures in a pamphlet showing workers crushed and maimed by industrial accidents were from old files.

Mrs. Peterson said there usually isn't a photographer around at the moment a worker is crushed by a falling load or loses his hand in a saw.

But she sent to the subcommittee a thick stack of newspaper clippings of almost identical accidents in the last three months—some of which could have been captions for the challenged photos.

As for the management spokesman's charge that the Labor Dept. is trying to "arouse emotional reaction" through "an inflammatory, lurid booklet," Mrs. Peterson had this comment:

"Yes, the Dept. of Labor is aroused by these tragic accidents. It will be an unfortunate day for the American worker when the Dept. of Labor ceases to be aroused, and to attempt to arouse others, against the needless deaths, pain, suffering and financial costs of preventable on-the-job accidents."

Philadelphia Opens Doors Wide For 1968 Union-Industries Show

By John R. Oravec

Philadelphia—Union-made products—everything from soup to nuts and bolts to buses—were spread out in the exhibition hall of Philadelphia Civic Center for the AFL-CIO annual Union-Industries Show.

Vast throngs of people came to view the 350 exhibits and take home souvenirs from the show, sponsored by the Union Label & Service Trades Dept. since 1938.

Thousands were lined up and waiting at the doors of the Civic Center as Under Sec. of Labor James J. Reynolds prepared to snip the ribbon for the opening of the six-day show June 21.

The show is another evidence of union-industry cooperation, Reynolds told about 800 representatives of government, labor and business who gathered for an opening day luncheon.

"It is a clear indication that they can work together in the free-enterprise system" for the benefit of all, he said.

This was the second engagement of the show in Philadelphia.

AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler, who also participated in the opening of the city's first Union-Industries show in 1950, recalled that it had set attendance records.

And from the beginning in Cincinnati in 1938, the shows have stressed the common interest of labor and management — even in times of adversities, Schnitzler noted.

He said the success of the 1950 exhibition was a turning point of the show—a coming-of-age of the whole idea.

On that theme, Schnitzler paralleled the present situation of problems in America. He called for new ideas to meet these problems, especially in the field of racial prejudice.

"What now must be made clear is the fact that labor and management, alone or together, have an overriding commitment to the national interest in the broadest sense—to the solution of all the needs of American society," he said.

More than $10 million worth of union-made products were on display at the show.

Gifts and prizes valued at $100,000 were given away to the visitors. They included major appliances, television and radio sets, kitchen ranges, U.S. Savings Bonds, meat products, toys and dolls. A fiberglass motor boat was given away on the final day of the show.

Tons of Meat

For housewives, the Meat Cutters & Butcher Workmen gave away several tons of meat after conducting classes on the cutting, preparation and cooking of various meats.

Latest styles in womens' apparel—bathing suits, miniskirts and evening gowns—were presented in daily fashion shows by the Ladies' Garment Workers.

One of the booths that drew much attention was the one operated by the Barbers & Hairdressers. Free haircuts and demonstrations in hair styling were given during the entire running of the show.

The Bakery & Confectionery Workers' booth also pleased the viewers as veteran craftsmen demonstrated their handiwork in baking and cake decorating.

Although closed on the opening day because of the death of union Pres. Harry O. Damino, the Doll Workers booth exhibited about 5,000 toys and dolls. All were given away.

As in other years, the Glass Bottle Blowers put on a big attraction. With a massive 5,000-pound glass furnace operating at 2700 degrees, they showed how bottle-making was done by hand-operated molds prior to automation.

Joseph Lewis, secretary-treasurer of the Union Label & Service Trades Dept. was the show director and Edward Murphy of the department was manager.

Monday Holiday Bill Goes to White House

Starting in 1971, most national holidays will be observed on Mondays—providing three-day weekends—and Columbus Day will be added to the list of major observances.

Pres. Johnson is expected to sign the Monday holiday bill which received final approval from Congress on June 24.

It provides for the observance of Washington's Birthday on the third Monday in February, sets Memorial Day for the last Monday in May, and establishes the fourth Monday in October as Veterans Day.

Columbus Day, to be observed on the second Monday in October, is made a national holiday.

Labor Day remains the first Monday in September and no change is made in the traditional observance of Independence Day, Christmas, Thanksgiving and New Year's Day.

The legislation passed by Congress applies only to the District of Columbia and to federal offices and establishments elsewhere. However, the states normally follow the federal lead in setting dates for holiday observances. The effective date of the federal law was set for 1971 to allow states time to act.

While most public employes will get an extra day off because of the addition of Columbus Day, there is no legal requirement that establishments in private industry close on a holiday. Thus unions which do not presently have Columbus Day as a paid holiday would have to negotiate its inclusion in order to add it to the contract list.

OEO Service Award Cites Cesar Chavez

Cesar Chavez, director of the AFL-CIO United Farm Workers Organizing Committee, has been chosen for a Rural Service Award of the Office of Economic Opportunity, the agency announced. The award is for "making a significant contribution to alleviating poverty in rural America."

Also named for an OEO award was Fay Bennett, executive director of the National Sharecroppers Fund.

Steel Accord Reached on Grievances

Pittsburgh—Allegheny Ludlum Steel Co. and the Steelworkers have agreed to settle all local issues automatically when the industry-wide contract expires Aug. 1.

The agreement will alleviate much unrest that arises over grievances—which in the past have taken years to settle, said USW District Dir. William J. Hart.

The key to the agreement is a provision for "quick arbitration" of grievances pending on Aug. 1, he noted.

No posthearing briefs will be allowed, oral arguments will be limited to 30 minutes on each side and a decision must be handed down within 30 days, Hart said.

"This means that 120 days after the contract expires, we will have a clean sheet, where in the past we've had cases hanging over for years."

Dissatisfaction with grievance handling has been a major issue in past negotiations, Hart noted.

Meany Asks Quick Action On High Court Nominees

Aid Voted For School Lunch Plan

The House voted to use $100 million a year of the money the Agriculture Dept. turns back to the treasury to pay for school lunches or breakfasts for more than 4 million poor children who are left out of the existing school lunch program.

Authority to use the money was voted over the opposition of most members of two powerful, conservative-dominated House committees—Appropriations and Agriculture.

The bill was brought to the House floor by Chairman Carl D. Perkins (D-Ky.) of the Labor Committee under a procedure which required a two-thirds vote, but which also assured a rollcall in which congressmen would be on record for or against feeding hungry school kids.

Existence of the unused money—derived from customs receipts under a 1935 law and earmarked for purchase of surplus commodities—was dramatized during the Poor People's Campaign. Almost on the eve of the vote, the Agriculture Dept. was forced to return some $200 million to the Treasury because, Sec. Orville L. Freeman said, existing law sharply restricted the manner in which it could be spent.

Senior members of the Agriculture and Appropriations Committees protested what they called "backdoor spending" without going through the appropriations process each year and objected to the procedure of suspending the rules and voting the bill up or down after a 40-minute debate.

For Facilities and Food

"This is an emergency," Perkins retorted.

He said many of the schools where the need is greatest don't have facilities to serve lunches and the $100 million fund could be used for facilities as well as purchase of the food.

The House followed up its passage of the bill by unanimously approving separate legislation prohibiting schools from singling out through any means of public identification the poor children entitled to free or cut-rate lunches.

This second bill also requires states to pay their share of the school lunch program out of state funds and not, as is often the case now, by raising the price of school lunches.

Both bills must still be acted on by the Senate.

Congress prepared to take a long Fourth of July weekend with no further action on gun control legislation—and indications that opponents of the Administration bills were resuming the offensive.

STEWARDESSES picket an American Airlines installation in New York City as a part of a two-day demonstration against the airline in eight cities across the nation. The stewardesses, members of Transport Workers Local 550, are protesting sub-standard wages, working conditions and the company's policy of firing them at age 32. American Airlines has failed to come to an agreement with the local since negotiations began last November. The demonstrations also were held in Boston, Washington, D. C., Chicago, Dallas, Los Angeles, San Francisco and Nashville.

In School Aid Battle:

Coalition Maneuvers Avoid Record Votes

By David L. Perlman

A coalition of Republicans and Southern Democrats maneuvered last week to slash $135 million from the most important part of the federal aid to education budget—the program that helps schools meet the special education needs of poor children.

Main purpose of the maneuvering was to beat down efforts to restore the badly needed funds without forcing House members to record their individual votes.

Hardly anyone has publicly advocated cutting back on aid to education. There have been no scandals, practically no complaints of waste, and few charges of federal control. Republicans couldn't afford a record vote showing their party supported the cut.

Futhermore, congressmen who had been most insistent on tieing a $6 billion budget cut to the tax increase had said repeatedly that the cuts could be made without sacrificing the needs of the nation's children or the poor.

Chairman Wilbur D. Mills (D-Ark.) of the House Ways & Means Committee was asked during the tax bill debate whether that big a budget cut could be imposed "without substantially reducing expenditures for health, education and welfare and the poverty program."

"Oh, absolutely," Mills replied. But he supported last week's cuts and even attempted to deepen the slashes in the poverty program.

A group of Republicans came up with a "laundry list" of proposed cutbacks that would reduce spending by more than $6 billion—and not a single education or poverty program was on the list. The overwhelming majority of these same

Politics, Bigotry Seen In Confirmation Fight

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany denounced political and bigoted attacks on Pres. Johnson's Supreme Court nominations and urged the Senate to "speedily confirm" both appointments.

Meany termed Associate Justice Abe Fortas "eminently qualified" to succeed Earl Warren as Chief Justice of the United States.

"Equally praiseworthy," he said, is the nomination of Homer Thornberry, now a Court of Appeals judge, to move up to the Supreme Court.

The AFL-CIO "strongly supports" both nominations, Meany said.

As a lawyer and a member of the Supreme Court, Fortas "has demonstrated beyond question his qualifications for the highest position in the American judicial system," Meany stressed.

He termed it "worthy of note" that Fortas would be the first Jewish Chief Justice.

This, Meany said, is in keeping with Pres. Johnson's consistent practice of appointing persons "of merit, ability and character, regardless of any false barrier of race, creed or color."

Thornberry also "has established a fine record on the bench," Meany said, and before that as a congressman and a member of the House Rules Committee.

"We certainly cannot understand objections in the Senate now," Meany declared, since both men were confirmed by the Senate for their present posts without opposition.

About half the Senate's Republicans have threatened a filibuster to block confirmation of the appointments by Johnson, whom they call a "lame duck" President—a misuse of the political term meaning an office holder who has been defeated for re-election and is serving out the balance of his term.

Richard M. Nixon, the leading candidate for the Republican presidential nomination, also attacked

$100 Base Won in N.Y. Hospitals

New York—Intensive all-night negotiations averted a strike by 17,000 unionized hospital employes and brought them an "unprecedented" $100 weekly minimum wage, plus a number of other new benefits.

The accord between Drug & Hospital Local 1199, affiliated with the Retail, Wholesale & Dept. Store Union, and 17 private non-profit hospitals was reached with help of mediators and Mayor John V. Lindsay.

The union, with membership that is 70 percent Negro and Puerto Rican, had quietly prepared for a strike, if needed, and work stoppages had begun at six hospitals about an hour before the agreement was reached.

Under the two-year pact, minimums that now range from $70 to $76 go to an $88 level, effective July 1, 1968, and to $100 on July 1, 1969.

Workers earning above the minimum scale will get wage increases of $24 a week over two years, and boosts of 16 percent over that period if they are now earning more than $150 a week.

In noting the wide variations in wage improvements, the union

New York Puts Squeeze On California Grapes

New York—The nation's largest city has joined labor's boycott of California grapes.

New York's Deputy Mayor Timothy W. Costello announced that the city's purchasing department won't buy California grapes for the duration of the strike by the AFL-CIO United Farm Workers Organizing Committee.

The city buys about 15 tons of grapes a year for hospitals and prisons and Costello said he hoped the decision to support the boycott will encourage all New Yorkers to do likewise. He said about one-fifth of all California grapes are sold in the New York area.

Commissioner of Purchase Marvin Gersten said New York will continue to buy grapes grown elsewhere and he suggested that shoppers urge their grocers to drop California grapes and substitute grapes from other states.

Wages Up, Rents Down In First Farm Pay Suit

Clarksdale, Miss.—A federal judge ordered a wealthy Mississippi plantation owner to pay 200 Negro laborers a total of $50,000 in back wages and stop overcharging them for the shacks in which they once lived rent-free.

The Labor Dept. suit to recover back wages was the first brought on behalf of farm workers since they came under the Fair Labor Standards Act a year and a half ago.

It was filed against Joseph Roy Flowers, owner of 16,000 acres of Mississippi delta land. About 12,000 acres are planted in cotton and soybeans. For the acres he does not plant, Flowers receives more than $210,000 a year in federal payments.

The Labor Dept. suit—which was not contested—charged that Flowers sought to nullify the raises he had to give his field workers when the $1-an-hour minimum wage went into effect in 1967 by imposing exorbitant rent charges and other fees.

The farm worker minimum, which applies only to farms using large numbers of workers, moved up to $1.15 an hour last February and will reach a final step of $1.30 in February 1969.

Flowers imposed charges of up to $70 a month for wooden shacks

54 Complete Road-Builder Union School

Chicago—Fifty-four young men, all previously unemployed, looked to careers as road-builders, after completing a 10-week pre-apprentice training program sponsored by Operating Engineers Local 150.

The men, some veterans of Viet Nam, received their "diplomas" at graduation ceremonies held in a tent on a training field where they learned to operate and maintain, roadgraders, bull-dozers and other heavy equipment.

To be eligible for training the men had to be jobless, between 18 and 27, and have the ability to work safely. Their "school" ran eight hours a day, five days a week.

The program was financed by a $241,000 grant under the Manpower Training & Development Act and was directed by William Martin, president of the local. He was assisted by seven union instructors.

Mayor Richard J. Daley, who addressed the graduation ceremony, lauded the program as one that "reached out to people who want help, and after help is given, they go out and do something with it."

Richard Ogilvie, Cook county board president, told the class: "You men can be proud of your accomplishment."

Daley and Ogilvie then assisted in presenting certificates and tool boxes to the graduates. Representatives of the union, contractors, and local, state and federal officials took part in the ceremony.

FIFTY-FOUR unemployed youths have completed a 10-week, pre-apprentice training course in the operation of power equipment sponsored by Operating Engineers' Local 150, Chicago. Left to right, Thomas Williams, a trainee and veteran of the Viet Nam war, Mayor Richard J. Daley who awarded diplomas; William F. Martin, Local 150 business manager; and Gary Suthers, a trainee.

Housewright Elected Head Of Retail Union

The Retail Clerks announced that James T. Housewright has been elected president of RCIA in balloting conducted among the union's locals to choose a successor to Pres. James A. Suffridge who is retiring.

Unofficial results based upon initial tabulations show that Housewright defeated John T. Haletsky, 121,000 to 70,000, the union said. Housewright, who had the endorsement of Suffridge, and Haletsky are both currently RCIA vice presidents.

Other results, announced by the union, indicate that the entire Housewright slate of candidates for vice presidencies also was elected.

Vice presidents elected were Samuel J. Meyers, Earl D. McDavid, Peter L. Hall, David A. Wade, Ivan H. Morriss, Donald E. Carter, William A. McGrath, Thomas G. Whaley, Ronald L. Meeker and Thomas M. Russow. All but Whaley, Meeker and Russow are incumbents.

RCIA Sec.-Treas, William W. Maguire was re-elected without opposition.

Tabulations of the locals' voting go to the union's international canvassing board which meets in Washington, D.C. on July 10 to make an official report on the election. New officers are scheduled to be inaugurated Sept. 1.

Textile Union, Viscose In Tentative Accord

Tentative agreement on contract terms covering 9,000 employes in six plants of the American Viscose division, Food Machinery Corp., was reached in Washington by management and the Textile Workers Union of America.

Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service Dir. William E. Simkin, who announced the settlement, said terms were withheld pending membership ratification votes in Meadville, Marcus Hook and Lewiston, Pa.; Front Royal, Va.; Parkersburg and Nitro, W. Va.

Critical Problem Posed By Jobless Negro Youth

The problem of Negro youth unemployment "is, at one and the same time, large and small," according to an article in the June issue of the American Federationist, the AFL-CIO magazine.

The problem can and must be solved, it emphasizes, because "the consequences—in terms of social disorder—are already upon us."

Prepared by the AFL-CIO Dept. of Research, the article defines the scope of youth unemployment—particularly among Negroes—and explores ways of reducing the joblessness.

The article cites figures from the Bureau of Labor Statistics showing that in 1967 an average of 203,000 Negro youths, 16-to-21, were unemployed.

It does not suggest that this is any insignificant number but indicates that the figure—for the entire nation—represents a "relatively limited number of young people."

The total of Negro youth unemployment is the only "small" part of the problem, the article stresses.

"What makes the problem a big one," it declares, "is, first, that these youth become adults and parents. The kind of life they provide for their children—and whether the cycle is broken—will depend heavily upon how well they do."

Second, the article points out that Negro youth unemployment "is a big problem" because it is "concentrated in tightly crowded neighborhoods within the nation's urban centers."

It singles out a special Labor Dept. study which found that 40 percent of all non-white unemployment in the nation in 1967 "was located in just 15 metropolitan areas."

Higher Unemployment Rate

Third, the article describes joblessness among Negro youths as a "major problem" in that their rate of unemployment was above 20 percent in 1967 compared to a rate of just over 9 percent for white youths, and an overall rate of 4.2 percent.

"In some Negro neighborhoods," the Dept. of Research notes, "it has been estimated that perhaps as many as 50 percent of the youth who want to work are without jobs."

The "most logical response" to the Negro youth joblessness problem, the article says, is enactment of legislation proposed by Rep. James G. O'Hara (D-Mich.) to create 1 million jobs in public employment.

This bill, it states, "proposes to meet two needs—the growing need in cities as well as in rural areas for a wide range of public services and the urgent need to find jobs for unemployed workers, including Negro youth."

At the same time, the article calls for actions that will "deal vigorously with other underlying causes of job problems of Negro youth."

It proposes, among other things, that the government deal with the job and income problems of Negro adults—the parents—and the problems of housing, health and education.

With respect to manpower training programs, the article advocates that they be "expanded to aid more Negro youth" and "improved in design in order to provide opportunities for training for more of the better jobs."

In other words, it concludes, resolution of joblessness among Negro youth depends upon creating more jobs in our economy and "improving the ability" of young Negroes to advance to higher paying positions.

At Philadelphia Convention:

Growth Potential Sighted for OPEIU

Philadelphia—Under Sec. of Labor James J. Reynolds told the 11th convention of the Office & Professional Employes here, "If you don't become one of the largest unions in the country, you just ain't trying."

Before the convention adjourned, the 300 delegates acted on nearly 100 resolutions covering a broad field—and many of them were attuned to meeting Reynolds' challenge.

The convention re-elected Pres. Howard Coughlin to his eighth term and Sec.-Treas. J. Howard Hicks to his 12th term. Neither had opposition.

The OPEIU delegates also re-elected all of the union's vice presidents: J. O. Bloodworth, Ronald F. Bone, John P. Cahill, Ben J. Cohan, George P. Firth, Sarah E. Keenan, John B. Kinnick, Arthur P. Lewandowski, William A. Lowe, Frank E. Morton, William J. Mullin, Gwen Newton and Edward P. Springman.

To illustrate the OPEIU's potential, Reynolds pointed out that professional occupations are growing twice as fast as other jobs, with a further 45 percent gain projected by 1975.

He said that some 650,000 new jobs are opening up every year and further noted that clerical and professional employes are securing sizeable wage increases, even though they are, in many cases, still "catching up."

Longshoremen's Pres. Thomas W. Gleason, whose union has supported OPEIU's organizing in New York waterfront shipping offices, pledged continued assistance to the union's organizing efforts.

At one point, Gleason recalled that ILA itself had once tried to organize office and professional employes in organizations where it had contracts "but we found we didn't have the answers for the girls that you fellows have. "

Noting that the American labor movement has changed "in many ways" over the years, Gleason cited labor's increasing participation in international programs to help workers in underdeveloped nations.

William Dodge, secretary-treasurer of the Canadian Labor Congress, commended OPEIU for its organizing drive in Canada, which brought 4,000 new union members there in the last three years.

Dodge told the convention that Canadian unions will never accept a government wage and price policy that penalizes labor while permitting industry to operate without restrictions on profits.

Philadelphia Mayor James H. J. Tate, describing himself as a typist who once "worked for 35 cents an hour," said that government at every level "must recognize that people have the right to be organized, to bargain collectively and bring their just grievances to management."

80 Percent Affiliated

Stanton Smith, AFL-CIO coordinator for local and state central bodies, presented Coughlin with a plaque recognizing the union's record of having above 80 percent of its local unions affiliated with city and state groups.

Delegates adopted a resolution emphasizing the union's determined opposition to any legislation that would "thrust a dagger in the heart of collective bargaining" by denying the right to strike.

Another resolution called upon all delegates to "express their deep dissatisfaction with Congress over its lack of action on an effective gun-control law."

Other resolutions urged proper tax deductions for working mothers, supervisors' rights to organize, a "free public college system," support of the Kingsport Press boycott, and vesting rights and portability of privately administered pension plans.

Salary increases in annual steps for the next three years were voted to Coughlin and Hicks, bringing the president's salary to $28,860 and the secretary-treasurer to $26,000.

Labor Takes 'Wait and See' View Of Canadian Liberal Party Victory

Ottawa—Canadian labor has been forced into a wait-and-see attitude by the Liberal Party's victory in the June 25 general election. The return of the Liberal Party with a clear majority—the first government to be in that position in ten years—came at a time when labor matters were in the national spotlight.

Prime Minister Pierre Elliott Trudeau had won leadership of the Liberals at a convention just prior to the election. His decision to call an election was a move to seek a quick mandate and to take advantage of the publicity gained through the Liberal convention.

Trudeau is a man of many parts and still somewhat of a mystery to most Canadians. A 48-year-old native of Quebec, he is independently wealthy and has a broad educational background, including a period at the London School of Economics. His election platform was based heavily on an appeal to youth but lacked any clear-cut program. He spoke repeatedly but vaguely of "a just society."

To a large degree the election was a personality contest. Opposing Trudeau was a new, but older, leader of the Conservative Party, Robert Stanfield, and the veteran leader of the New Democratic Party, Tommy Douglas.

Since the previous election in 1965 there had been a redistribution of seats, giving greater representation to urban areas and reducing membership in the House of Commons from 265 to 264.

Hopes had been high that the increased representation for urban areas would improve the chances of the NDP, which has the official support of the Canadian Labor Congress and the active support of a number of unions. This was obviously offset by the sweep of "Trudeaumania."

Liberals Gain 22 Seats

The Liberal popular vote went up 5 percent and the Liberals took 153 seats compared to 131 in the previous House. Conservative representation dropped from 97 to 72 seats. The NDP total vote slipped 1 percent but the party took 23 seats, an increase of one.

A possible major NDP casualty was Douglas who, in the initial count, was some 90 votes behind a Liberal. A recount was considered likely.

The election took place in the midst of a troubled labor scene. Canadian employes on the St. Lawrence Seaway were on strike with inland water movement practically at a standstill. Other strikes had cut off the supply of beer in Ontario and liquor in Quebec.

Across the country still other groups of employes were on the picket line in various operations. The country's postal workers were threatening strike action. Air traffic controllers in Canada's major airports and pilots of Air Canada, the nationally owned airline, were in tight bargaining situations.

Faced with these circumstances it appeared that Trudeau would have to move quickly to show his attitude toward labor-management relations. This decision will also have to be made against the background of new collective bargaining rights for the federal public service.

Prior to Trudeau's assuming the leadership, the Liberal Government had appointed a special task force to study the entire field of labor-management relations. This report is expected later this year and Trudeau has already indicated that it will be followed by conferences called by the Government with both labor and management.

3-Day Strike Ended:

Pay, Vacation Gains Won for NMU Crews

New York—Some 45,000 members of the National Maritime Union on deep-sea vessels have won a 5 percent wage boost and longer vacations following a three-day strike.

Theodore W. Kheel, who is the arbitrator under the contract between NMU and two employer groups—Maritime Service Committee and Tanker Service Committee—announced the settlement after three hours of talks.

It provides two of the three improvements sought by the union under a wage reopening clause in a four-year contract that runs until June 15, 1969:

- A 5 percent increase in base pay, which currently is $423 a month. The increase is retroactive to June 16, 1968.
- An additional 15 days of vacation, bringing the paid vacation period to 75 days annually. This improvement also is retroactive to June 16.

Other issues will be put to arbitration before Kheel. The union also seeks a 10 percent boost in overtime pay, which currently runs at $2.62 an hour after 40 hours of sea duty a week.

The unlicensed seamen struck at midnight, June 28, tieing up 130 ships in Atlantic and Gulf ports, after several months of negotiations on the wage reopener had proved fruitless.

In striking, NMU immediately announced that ships carrying cargoes for Viet Nam, would be cleared at government request. The walkout quickly won support of other maritime unions.

The employer groups called upon Kheel to rule that the union was violating a no-strike clause, but Kheel put off the ruling and instead arranged the talks that brought the agreement.

NMU Pres. Joseph Curran described the settlement as one that "provides fair adjustments for our members with provision for other necessary adjustments through arbitration."

"It gives full consideration to the need for stability in our industry," he pointed out, adding:

"We have demonstrated that American seamen cannot carry the U.S. merchant marine on their back. We are now prepared to redouble our efforts with other unions, management and government to get a positive merchant marine policy."

Farm Workers Win Wage Suit In Mississippi

after the minimum wage took effect, and required payments of more than $150 a year for wood for heating and $3 for sacks used in picking cotton.

With the help of Federal Housing Authority appraisers, the Labor Dept. and Flowers agreed on a $5-a-month rental, including fuel wood, as a reasonable charge for the shacks.

U.S. District Judge William C. Keady also permanently enjoined Flowers from violating the law's minimum wage, overtime pay, recordkeeping or child-labor provisions.

About 15 of Flowers' non-agricultural workers were found to be covered by the general wage-hour law and must be paid at least $1.60 an hour with overtime rates after 40 hours.

Under the consent judgment, Flowers has paid the $50,000 to the Labor Dept. which will supervise distribution of the money to eligible workers.

State Wage-Hour Law Sought In South Dakota

Sioux Falls, S.D.—Plans for accentuated political and legislative activities were drawn up here by delegates to the eighth biennial convention of the South Dakota AFL-CIO.

The convention overwhelmingly adopted a resolution calling for a labor drive in the state legislature for a $1.25 an hour minimum wage law with overtime protection.

The measure would replace a present law which provides for only a $17 to $20 a week minimum, depending upon the size of the city or town where workers are situated, and no overtime.

Delegates also urged improvements in workmen's compensation and unemployment compensation at the state level, and standards for jobless benefits, an occupational safety law and improved medicare at the federal level.

Another resolution emphasized that advancement of these and other objectives will require the election of "more friends" for workers in the state legislature and Congress this year.

State unions were asked to "cooperate fully" with national, state and local COPE committees in an "all-out effort to assist every union member and eligible members of their families to register and vote."

Other resolutions called for bargaining recognition for public employe unions, strict control of air and water pollution, a ban on employers' use of professional strikebreakers, and meetings to promote farm-labor unity.

South Dakota AFL-CIO Pres. Clifford W. Shrader; Francis K. McDonald, secretary-treasurer; and Rolf Anderson, vice president-at-large, were re-elected to new terms.

Elected as district vice presidents were: David Murphy, Aberdeen; Sam Nettinga, Jr., Huron; Hans C. Hargens, Mitchell, and James M. Brink, Rapid City.

Convention speakers included Sen. George S. McGovern (D-S.D.); Stanton Smith, AFL-CIO state and city central body coordinator; Jack E. McCoy, COPE Area IX director; Harold Seavey, AFL-CIO assistant director, Region XIII; and Margaret Thornburgh, Western director for AFL-CIO Women's Activities.

Chicago Union Officer Gets Community Post

Chicago—Thomas J. Nayder, secretary-treasurer of the Chicago and Cook County Building & Construction Trades Council, has been appointed vice chairman of the Metropolitan Crusade of Mercy for 1968.

The Crusade raises funds for about 900 human care services affiliated with the community fund in a five-county Chicago area.

Right-To-Work Bill Killed in Louisiana

Baton Rouge, La.—A new "right-to-work" proposal was soundly beaten in a committee of the Louisiana legislature.

Its sponsor asked for consideration by the House Labor & Industry Committee of a proposed constitutional amendment to outlaw the union shop.

The committee considered it—and then voted 13-3 to kill the bill.

Louisiana once had a "work" law—and repealed it 12 years ago.

Workers Win $100 Base at N.Y. Hospitals pointed out that it represents not only hospital service and maintenance workers, but also clerical, professional and technical employes.

The hospitals also have agreed to place money into two funds—one to correct wage inequities and the other to "subsidize" workers' wages while they train for better jobs, the union said.

Other provisions of the contract call for improved medical care, additional pay for night work, a pension fund, holiday and vacation benefits and severance pay for the first time.

Local 1199 Pres. Leon J. Davis emerged from the talks elated with the settlement, particularly the $100 minimum which he said is a "first-time achievement for hospitals anywhere."

He estimated total value of the contract's wage improvements at more than 80 cents an hour, "which exceeds the total $32 weekly wage many of these employes were getting when we first began organizing them in 1959."

The union said it expected another 17 private, non-profit hospitals, whose contracts have expired and are negotiating separately with Local 1199, to follow the pattern reached in the agreement.

Air Line Employes Add 2 Staff Members

Chicago—The Air Line Employes have announced the appointment of Edwin H. Roper to a union public relations post and Gary B. Colboth as director of the union's grievance department.

Roper will handle ALEA's monthly magazine, The Air Line Employe, as well as internal communications and releases. Colboth will assume responsibilities formerly administered by William A. Schneider, the union's treasurer.

ACWA Clothing Drive Helps Grape Strikers

New York—A truck loaded with clothes fresh from the cleaners pulled up to a union office in Brooklyn.

Soon, staff people and volunteers of the United Farm Workers Organizing Committee were cheerfully sorting the massive pile of garments for packing and shipment to striking grape pickers in California.

"This will cause some real excitement in Delano," smiled Candy Clark, chief UFWOC organizer in the New York office.

The clothes were part of the 12,000 high-quality used garments that have been shipped to the farm workers by the Cleaners & Dyers Joint Board of the Clothing Workers.

More clothes are on the way. A campaign is on to collect nearly 40,000 garments for the grape pickers, said Jack Cohen, manager of the joint board.

The clothing, which includes all types of apparel for men, women and children, is coming from dry cleaning plants and small shops in New York and New Jersey who are under contract with the union.

By law, the firms can dispose of clothing that goes unclaimed after six months. Members of ACWA Locals 239 and 279 are handling the collections under supervision of Cohen.

The UFWOC staff, which has been in the New York area since early this year to enlist consumer and retailer support for the nationwide boycott against the struck California-grown grapes, is handling the sorting and packing of the clothes.

The clothing drive was kicked off after an appeal by Dolores Huerta of the UFWOC at the ACWA convention in Miami Beach.

ACWA convention delegates voted to contribute about $11,000 to the grape workers' strike fund. The union also has participated in extending the grape boycott and in other clothing and food campaigns for the strikers.

The New York UFWOC members—who are paid 5 a week like the rest of the union's staff people—were particularly pleased by the ACWA clothes campaign.

They explained that the strikers in Delano and other California vineyards earned as little as 50 cents an hour before union organization. The strikers are in desperate need after three year of attempting to gain decent wages and working conditions under a union contract.

"This clothing will be a real boost for them," beamed one of the UFWOC workers.

W. H. Montague Of Georgia Dies

Atlanta, Ga.—W. H. Montague, Sr., president of the Georgia AFL-CIO since 1958, died here at 62 of a heart attack, and was buried after services in Decatur, Ga.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany said in a message of sympathy to Mrs. Montague and their two sons that his years of service to labor will "stand as a monument to his memory."

Montague was a long-time member of Auto Workers Local 34 at the Chevrolet plant here and worked several years as an organizer for the State, County & Municipal Employes before heading the former Georgia Industrial Council, CIO, and its successor soon after merger. His duties as president have been taken over by M. J. Counihan, business manager of the Savanna, Ga., Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, former executive vice president of the state body.

Insurance Pact Blocked By Reprisal Issue

Mediated negotiations between the Insurance Workers and Metropolitan Life Insurance Co. broke off June 29 after the company insisted it would fire "any striker whose strike behavior is questioned."

Union Vice Pres. Robert L. Ponsi, chairman of the negotiating committee, described the company's ultimatum as "totally unacceptable."

Agents have been on strike against Metropolitan since May 20. Negotiations were halted shortly after the strike started, but federal mediator Harold Mills brought the parties together again June 25.

"Our differences on an economic package have been reduced to $1 a week," said Insurance Workers Pres. William A. Gillen. "This point had been reached by a drastic reduction in the union's proposal and a miniscule increase in the company offer."

The break-off came over the company's position on the return to work of the striking agents. The union reaffirmed it's stand of "no reprisals," Gillen said.

But Metropolitan declared it "could terminate the services of any striker whose strike behavior it questioned so long as it submitted the names of the individuals to the union within two days after the return to work," Gillen said.

Help Wanted

YOUNG AMERICANS are entering the labor force this summer in sharply increased numbers. Yet while the demand for summer jobs among 16-to-21-year old youths is rising, the supply is falling off, and this poses a critical problem for the nation.

It is not merely that "idle hands breed mischief," but that they breed frustration, disillusion and bitterness which can warp the attitude of youngsters toward work and society for years to come.

The futures of many young men and women are literally at stake in these summer months. A job can mean the difference between continuing their education in the fall—either in high school or college—or dropping out to seek fulltime work without adequate preparation.

The National Alliance of Businessmen, with the wholehearted cooperation of the labor movement, reports encouraging progress in finding jobs for the hard-core adult unemployed. But its summer job program in cooperation with the government's Youth Opportunity Campaign lags alarmingly behind its goals.

Pres. Johnson has urged a redoubled effort to take youngsters off the streets and put them into the workplaces this summer. By redoubling its own efforts, organized labor can play a vital role in bringing the campaign to success by locating job opportunities and working closely with concerned employers.

As the slogan of the Youth Opportunity Campaign puts it: "Help them help themselves."

A Vote for 18-Year-Olds

PRES. JOHNSON has expressed his confidence in the young people of America by asking Congress to set in motion a constitutional amendment lowering the voting age to 18.

We believe this confidence is justified, and for the same reasons the President has cited.

At the age of 18, our young men are called upon to fight for their country.

At the age of 18, in many courts, they are treated as adults and held fully responsible for their actions.

Above all, perhaps, the large majority of 18, 19 and 20-year-olds are, as the President noted, "prepared by education, by experience by exposure to public affairs of their own land and all the world, to assume and exercise the privilege of voting."

Certainly there are young people who do not meet these criteria. But years alone do not add wisdom, and we doubt that the proportion of fools is significantly greater at 18 than 28.

When given the opportunity to participate in America's political decisions, our young people overwhelmingly respond with enthusiasm, intelligence, idealism and responsibility.

The sooner they have this responsibility, the greater the likelihood that they will see the American political system as a viable, practical means of correcting injustice and bringing about peaceful change.

The later their entrance into full citizenship, the greater the danger of apathy and alienation.

"A nation without faith in its sons and daughters," Pres. Johnson noted, "is a nation without faith in itself." The AFL-CIO agrees.

Injunction Aids Growers:

Chavez Recounts Frustrations, Heartbreak Met in Grape Strike

Following is the text of a statement from Cesar Chavez, director of the United Farm Workers Organizing Committee, issued to the AFL-CIO News at the time of the announcement that the UFWOC strike in the Coachella Valley was being ended.

By Cesar Chavez

ANOTHER CHAPTER of frustration has been written into the heartbreak history of the farm worker's fight to build a union.

Because there is no law to help or protect him in his struggle to become a part of this country's collective bargaining pattern, he is left with the strike and boycott as his only means of influencing the gigantic growers and factory farmers of this nation to recognize his union.

Sapping his strength to effectively strike has been the use of "green carders" from Mexico, who, under U.S. immigration policy, can enter and leave this country at will and who are easy prey for struck growers to exploit as strikebreakers.

A year ago, the United Farm Workers Organizing Committee brought this situation to AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany's attention. Characteristically, he moved on the problem forcefully and without delay, vigorously urging the Justice Dept. and the Labor Dept. to institute regulations to control the use of green card holders as strikebreakers.

The regulations were written.

Joint meetings between AFL-CIO, Justice, and the Labor Dept. were then held to assure adequate enforcement of these regulations by the Border Patrol. Nothing in the program was designed to dissuade Mexican labor, properly qualified, to enter this country and leave at will and to work wherever they could find employment except for purposes of taking employment where a bona fide strike has been certified by the U.S. Dept. of Labor.

Assured of at least this measure of fair play, the United Farm Workers, in early June, struck in California's Coachella Valley, less than a hundred miles from the Mexican border.

Nearly every worker joined our AFL-CIO union. For one week, with the help of AFL-CIO Organization Dir. William Kircher, we sought recognition on the basis of that overwhelming authorization by the workers. The growers refused.

On Monday, June 17, UFWOC struck. The following day a federal judge in Los Angeles issued a sweeping injunction against the U.S. Immigration Service, denying it the right to police the regulations controlling the strikebreakers.

Immediately, the border area was cleared of the Border Patrol. The inspection processes at the crossing points were lifted. The growers' trucks and busses started to roll, hauling the strikebreakers into the fields from the border area.

THE GROWERS were not content to resist our strike with just the tremendous power the injunction made available to them. Nor were other anti-union elements in the area. Our legitimate organizational activities were impeded by local "licensing" laws; requests for meeting permits at public facilities were subjected to delays. Members of our organization, volunteer workers of the UFWOC staff, were assaulted and badly beaten.

Elements of the John Birch Society have been in open opposition to this just strike. "Local Chapters" of the John Birch Society paid for a full page ad in a local Coachella Valley newspaper attempting to link UFWOC, its leadership, and the strike against grape growers with the Communist apparatus. The publicity director of the western division of the John Birch Society pursued the smear effort in a headline-gathering news conference, quoted later in the ad, in which he stated that I adhere "to the Marxist philosophies."

Long ago, the American labor movement met the Communists head-on. The record is clear. AFL-CIO, and its entire family of unions, is dedicated to and rooted in a free, democratic society.

As Kircher said, responding to the Bircher smear, "The attack . . . is in fact an attack on George Meany, president of the AFL-CIO, and all of the labor movement in the United States . . . All unions and particularly Meany have endorsed and publicly support actions of the farm workers . . . The same Meany attacked by the fanatic Birchers of this area is the Meany who has received every major national Catholic award for responsible citizenship, including the Laetare Medal from the University of Notre Dame."

And now the strike in the Coachella Valley is over. We have terminated it because of our unwillingness to permit the increase of violence committed against our members, against workers seek-their basic right to organize.

There will be another day. We don't know how long it will take. We don't know how many heartbreaks there will be. But we are building our union and we will not stop.

15 Years of Progress:

Rights of Labor, Individuals Advanced by Warren Court

By Alexander Uhl

WHEN CHIEF JUSTICE Earl Warren told Pres. Johnson that he wanted to retire, his announcement brought to a close one of the most dramatic and socially progressive 15 years of American history.

Largely overlooked, however, has been the extraordinary record of those 15 years with respect to labor-management relations. It is a record that has produced some rulings not entirely agreeable to the labor movement, but also a far greater body of opinions that powerfully strengthened the rights of unions and their members.

It was the kind of over-all record that brought a statement of regret at the news of the Warren resignation from AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany.

"We cannot allow this opportunity to pass without stating our deep regret at the resignation of Chief Justice Warren and our acknowledgment of the real debt that we and all Americans owe to him—a truly outstanding jurist and great American," Meany said.

The court, under Warren, has operated in two distinct periods. In its early years it reversed many of the anti-union decisions of the National Labor Relations Board in the days when it was dominated by Eisenhower appointees. In later years it has upheld many of the more liberal decisions of Kennedy and Johnson appointees. The result has been the undying hatred of conservative business interests that would like to destroy the NLRB itself.

Key labor decisions of the Warren Court greatly strengthened the doctrine of federal "pre-emption" of labor-management policies over the narrow anti-labor state policies that have long marked the history of unionism in the United States. Other decisions broadened the ability of unions to defend the rights of their workers; widened picketing rights on the basis of free speech; strengthened the hand of the NLRB in numerous cases; reversed anti-labor state court actions.

In 1961, the Legal Dept. of the AFL-CIO was able to report to the 4th Constitutional Convention that the previous two years of litigation in the Supreme Court had "produced the greatest string of victories for the labor movement in recent history."

The department noted that the Eisenhower NLRB of that period had given vent to anti-union views and had ridden "roughshod over elementary principles of evidence and statutory interpretations."

"It was inevitable," the report continued, "that such a Board would eventually receive its comeuppance at the hands of a fair-minded court."

One of the most important of these decisions was one holding that hiring halls were legitimate and need not be fenced in by harsh requirements as had been laid down by the then NLRB. Another was a reversal of a decision that had greatly hampered unions in their representation work.

Step by step, the court, beginning with the Garmon case in 1959, asserted the superior legal status of federal labor policy and the right of workers to organize and bargain collectively without coercion, over more conservative, if not hostile, state legislation.

"A state generally may not enjoin conduct which is either prohibited or protected under the National Labor Relations Act," the Court held.

By the time of the sixth AFL-CIO Convention in 1965, its Legal Dept. again reported that unions had posted "an exceptional won-lost record in the unusually large batch of labor cases which were considered by the Supreme Court during the past two years." Of some 28 significant decisions, 20 were scored as labor victories.

In general, the court has upheld the current NLRB in far more cases than it has ruled against it.

IN THE WIDER AREA of social progress in which the labor movement is deeply involved, the Warren Court has compiled an equally alert and liberal record.

The Warren court made its first powerful civil rights contribution in its Brown vs. Board of Education 1954 decision ending segregation in American public schools. The doctrine of "separate but equal" accommodations was ruled out.

After that has come a stream of civil rights decisions, each one nailing down such rights as equality for all in the use of public facilities such as restaurants and transportation, rejection of "dual school" systems and similar devices to turn back the educational clock and extension of educational aid. Its most recent civil rights ruling established the right of open housing as based on federal legislation of 1866.

Part of the court's civil rights activities have been designed to protect defendants in criminal cases in their constitutional rights.

Of equal, if not even greater importance, was the court's "one man-one vote" ruling which over the years is having more and more effect in assuring equal representation in Congress and on state and local governmental levels for all citizens. No longer may sparsely settled rural districts control legislative bodies as they did previously.

All these gains have not been won without bitter recrimination on the part of conservatives. The civil rights decisions have been opposed and thwarted as much as possible. The court has been accused of coddling criminals while disregarding the rights of their victims. The "one man-one vote" ruling has brought a flood of complaints from the rural regions which long had dominated state legislatures.

The man who has borne the brunt of these attacks is Warren. To what extent he—the Eisenhower appointee—is responsible personally for all that has been accomplished during the past 15 years cannot be fully known. But the Birchite cries of "Impeach Warren" show how much he is being held responsible for the court's liberal position. It is a responsibility that Warren has accepted cheerfully and even willingly. It has earned him much hatred, but it has also earned him the profound respect and gratitude of American labor and liberals throughout the country. (PAI)

Backs Out on Testimony:

National Safety Council Scored For Retreat on Job Safety Bill

THE CHAIRMAN of the Labor Conference of the National Safety Council hit the council's soft stand on job-safety proposals now pending in Congress.

Questioned by reporters in a network radio interview, Paul Connelley charged that under pressure from some industry members, the council backed off from a strong stand in support of the proposed Occupational Health & Safety Act, which had been worked out by both industry and labor representatives on the council.

Connelley said the council was ready to give the legislation its strong endorsement in a statement to the House committee conducting hearings on the measure, but after "a couple of hundred telephone calls raising cain about the council's position . . . it suddenly called off its testimony." He made the statements on Labor News Conference, broadcast Tuesdays at 7:35 p.m., EDT, on the Mutual Radio Network.

Connelley said he protested the council's action but his protest was rejected by the council's board of directors. However, he pointed out, it was a "small vote" and "many uncommitted members of the board of directors might feel a little bit differently about the issue."

The union spokesman refused to concede that the National Safety Council had "tarnished its reputation" by failing to give a solid boost to comprehensive federal protection for the health and safety of workers.

"All in all . . . the council wants to take a constructive position on all safety matters," he said. But, he noted, "sometimes they are not allowed to, because the governing body decides otherwise, as the board of directors did decide in this instance."

Connelley, who is director of pensions for the Carpenters, was questioned by Judith Randal, medical editor of the Washington Evening Star, and J. V. Reistrup, assistant editor of the Washington Post.

IT HAS LONG BEEN a truism to say that the American farm worker—tenant, sharecropper or migrant worker—is truly at the foot of the American economic ladder. He is the victim of discrimination, worse than poverty wages, lack of education and almost hopeless in any effort to join the main stream of America's affluent life.

In recognition of that fact, the AFL-CIO and other groups in organized labor are seeking to organize such workers, notably the workers in the lush fields of California and Texas. Progress has been made. Some contracts have been signed, vastly improving wages and working conditions. But for most American farm workers, the road ahead is still bitter and filled with all but insurmountable handicaps.

This is particularly true of the Negro farm worker in the deep South where changing technologies have all but destroyed the old economic base—low as it was—of countless families, many of whom have fled to the North only to find themselves trapped in the poverty that lack of education and skills holds for them.

Sometimes there are brief flashes of light that reveal what has been happening in the South. They help explain the despair of a Resurrection City or deep emotions of a March on Washington.

One of these flashes came in recent publication of the subsidies that are paid yearly to farm corporations. In Mississippi alone, payments running between $50,000 and $500,000 were made to 370 big farms to keep crops—notably cotton—out of production.

THE STORY GAVE the Rev. Ralph Abernathy, leader of Resurrection City, the legitimate opportunity to complain bitterly that while Mississippi could quibble over $9 a month for the support of a destitute child, the U.S. Government was paying no less than $157,930 a year to the Eastland Plantation, owned by the family of Sen. James O. Eastland.

Each year there have been efforts to place a lid—$10,000 or even $25,000—on such payments to rich corporations. They were made again this year at the very moment when Congress is looking around to see what can be cut to make that $6 billion slash in the budget that it has been demanding. It has been estimated that $600 million could be saved by cutting the farm subsidies.

Even more important, perhaps, than the gross inequities of such subsidies is the fact that keeping cotton fields out of production also means depriving employment to thousands of workers with limited skills. Like the Spanish landowner who gets annoyed with the government and keeps his fields out of production for spite, the government willy-nilly condemns the jobs of thousands of workers when it also keeps land out of production.

Other reports from Mississippi reveal another facet of the gross inequity between land-owner and worker there even under the Fair Labor Standards Act. This has placed farm workers on large corporate farms under minimum wage protection and the corporations don't like it. A federal Judge in Greenville, Miss. has sanctioned $50,000 in payment of back wages by one such owner who has about 200 tenant employes. (Story, Page 1.)

The plight of the farm laborers in America is not unique. The Intl. Labor Organization has just recommended measures to improve the living and working conditions of millions of tenants and sharecroppers in the world's agricultural force, especially in Asia, Latin America, North Africa and the Middle East. Conditions in many of these areas are described as equivalent to serfdom.

While conditions may not be quite that bad in the United States, it is clear that we still have little to brag about in our treatment of our own farm workers. At a time when Negro unemployment is still running at an average of twice that of white workers, subsidy payments at the expense of jobs is out of order.

Congress would do well to determine how many jobs are being destroyed by subsidy payments for the non-production of crops. A good place to start its inquiry might be Eastland Plantations, Inc. in Doddsville, Sunflower County, Miss.

HITTING the National Safety Council's soft stand on job-safety proposals now before Congress was Paul Connelley, center, chairman of the NSC Labor Conference, on the AFL-CIO produced interview, Labor News Conference. Reporters Judith Randal of the Washington Evening Star and J. V. Reistrup of the Washington Post questioned Connelley, who is also director of pensions for the Carpenters. The program is broadcast Tuesdays on Mutual Radio.

House Votes on School Aid, Poverty

Appropriations to finance federal aid to education and the anti-poverty program were the issues in these two House rollcalls on June 26.

Column 1 is the 220-181 vote against cutting $100 million from anti-poverty funds. On labor's scoreboard, 156 Democrats and 64 Republicans cast Right votes (R) against the cut; 110 Republicans and 71 Democrats voted Wrong (W).

Column 2 is the 275-126 vote against a parliamentary move which was intended to get a rollcall vote on a labor-supported effort to restore cuts in school aid made by the House Appropriations Committee. (Story on Page 1 has a fuller explanation.) The scoreboard shows 123 Democrats and 3 Republicans voting Right, 104 Democrats and 171 Republicans voting Wrong.

Other symbols: PR—paired right; PW—paired wrong; A—absent and not paired; numerals show districts; AL—at large.

In School Aid Battle:

Coalition Maneuvers Avoid Record Votes

Republicans backed the very cuts they had termed unnecessary.

House Republican Leader Gerald R. Ford also got into the act. He assured the House that "by no stretch of the imagination can the allegation validly be made that a $6 billion reduction in expenditures will hurt or harm going programs."

The opinion of many school aid supporters is that if there had been a record vote on restoring the basic education funds, House members would have voted the money.

In exchange for their help in blocking record votes, the Southern Democrats received overwhelming GOP support for an anti-civil rights amendment. Once again, Republican leaders spoke out against the anti-civil rights rider, but watched most GOP members join the Dixiecrats in another non-recorded vote.

Only once, during a long day of maneuvering, did the coalition fumble. A Republican motion to cut an additional $100 million from appropriations for anti-poverty programs—on top of the $300 million cut made by the Appropriations Committee—carried on a teller vote. That's when congressmen walk down the aisle to be counted for or against an amendment, but are not recorded by name.

Under these circumstances, it was possible later to get a record vote. This time, on the record, the cut was beaten, 228-172. Sixty-four Republicans joined with 156 Democrats in voting against it, although—on the unrecorded teller vote—a number of these same Republicans had been seen walking down the aisle in support of the slash.

The record vote on deepening the the cut in poverty funds is carried on Page 6 of this issue of the AFL-CIO News.

The other rollcall—congressmen who are listed as Wrong will hasten to explain—was on a "procedural issue." Technically, that is correct. The motion put to a vote was to "move the previous question on the motion to recommit."

But congressmen voting for the previous question knew that this was a vote to guarantee that there would be no rollcall on restoring aid to education funds.

Rep. Sidney Yates (D-Ill.) had first offered his amendment to restore $135 million for school aid funds when the House was considering the appropriations bill in the Committee of the Whole—the normal manner in which the House amends bills that are on the floor.

The Yates amendment never came to a vote—even an unrecorded vote. Instead, the GOP-Dixie coalition carried a substitute amendment which merely added $9 million for Indian schools. The critical substitute motion passed on an unrecorded teller vote, with observers in the House gallery counting less than two dozen Republicans walking down the aisle against the substitute.

Denied an opportunity to have any vote on the full restoration of school funds, Yates later sought to amend the recommital motion on the entire bill—just before final passage—to permit a record vote on the school funds. Such an amendment would have been in order only if the effort to "move the previous question" had been defeated. Only three Republicans joined with 123 Democrats in attempting to get a clear vote on the issue.

Other efforts to restore funds for needed programs met similar unrecorded defeats. These included providing more money for school textbooks, Teacher Corps, bilingual education, school dropout projects, and rat control.

Funds were added only for two programs—impacted area aid and the Education Professions Development Act.

It was all very legal, very political, and very parliamentary. There was precedent for all the maneuvering. That's the name of the game in the House legislative process.

But the net result, nevertheless, is that schools where educational needs are greatest will have less federal funds next year than they had this year unless the Senate acts to increase the appropriations and the House finally agrees.

And, many of the congressmen responsible for the cuts in school funds will tell their constituents: "Oh, no, not me!"

COMMEMORATING 25 YEARS of AFL-CIO relations with united funds and community chests, Leo Perlis, director of the AFL-CIO Community Services Dept., pins a union counselor button on William J. Ryan, associate executive director of the Buffalo and Erie County United Fund. Ryan, a former president of Steelworkers Local 2248, was the first fulltime labor representative assigned to the staff of a community chest. He was appointed in Buffalo in 1943. James L. Kane, president of the Buffalo AFL-CIO Council and vice president of the United Fund of Buffalo, watches the pinning ceremony.

Purchasing Power Up Despite Rise in Prices

The purchasing power of the nation's workers increased in May even though prices rose, but real spendable earnings still trailed levels of recent years, the Labor Dept. reported.

Its Consumer Price Index increased three-tenths of one percent to 120.3 of the 1957-59 base period, marking the 16th consecutive month in which the index has climbed.

The index figure, 4.1 percent above May 1967, means that goods and services that cost $10 a decade ago now cost $12.30.

Gross average weekly earnings of production workers rose to a record $106.63 in May, up $1.59 from April because of a 2-cent rise in hourly earnings and a three-tenths of an hour increase in weekly hours.

For the worker with three dependents, weekly take-home pay averaged $94.20 in May, up $1.27 over the month. A worker with no dependents had a net pay of $86.56, a gain of $1.20 over April.

After adjustment for the monthly price increase, real spendable earnings for the family head averaged $78.30 and for the single worker $71.95 in 1957-59 dollars, up 79 and 76 cents from April.

Although the figures represented the highest level of purchasing power for this year, they were below levels of the second half of 1967 and those of 1966 and 1965, the Labor Dept. reported.

Higher prices for clothing, up nine-tenths of one percent, and food, four-tenths of one percent higher, led the climb of major individual items on the CPI.

Housing, transportation, recreation and consumer services also rose. In the latter category, medical care rose five-tenths of one percent, led by a nearly one percent rise in hospital service charges.

The Wholesale Price Index rose two-tenths of one percent in May and preliminary data point to another increase in June, the department said. A rise in wholesale prices usually precedes a rise in consumer prices.

Assistant Commissioner Arnold Chase of the Bureau of Labor Statistics said he didn't forsee any break in the upward trend of prices, at least not in the next "several months."

The recently enacted 10 percent income tax surcharge eventually will have some effect on slowing the price rise by reducing demand for goods, but not immediately, Chase said.

Because of May's CPI increase, more than 210,000 workers will receive cost of living increases. About 110,000 aerospace workers will receive boosts of 3 cents an hour and 75,000 employes in meatpacking will get an extra 6 cents an hour. Other increases will range from 1 to 6 cents an hour.

School Lunch Program Wins In House Vote

tee pulled a coup at a June 26 meeting. When several supporters of a strong gun control law were late, opponents pushed through by a 7-5 vote a motion to postpone further consideration of the legislation until July 9.

On the House side, after public demand had brought approval of a gun control bill by a big margin in the Judiciary Committee, opponents seized on the President's further proposals for gun registration and licensing as an excuse to block or oppose the earlier bill.

The House Rules Committee put off consideration of the measure until after the holiday recess and the chairman of the House Republican Policy Committee, Rep. John J. Rhodes (R-Ariz.), said he has changed his mind and now opposes any legislation.

Rhodes said he was afraid that if the bill barring mail order sales of rifles and over-the-counter sales of guns to people from other states reached the House floor, it would be enlarged there or in the Senate to include registration and licensing.

An unexpected setback also came when House Democratic Leader Carl Albert of Oklahoma broke with the Administration to declare his personal opposition to gun control legislation.

House Speaker John W. McCormack, however, reiterated his support for "strong gun controls" and citizen groups supporting the legislation called for a new wave of letters and telegrams to Congress.

Group Leads Campaign

The public drive is spearheaded by the Emergency Coalition for Gun Control, which includes the AFL-CIO and is headed by John Glenn, America's first astronaut and a close friend of the Kennedy family.

On deck in the House after the holiday recess is a major, labor-backed Administration housing bill similar to the measure that passed the Senate.

In the continuing battle over appropriations, a House-Senate conference committee salvaged a small part of extra money voted by the Senate for summer anti-poverty programs and Head Start. Some $28 million in additional funds were approved in a supplemental appropriations bill as compared with $100 million initially voted by the Senate.

Weaver, U.S. Government Delegate, Picked to Head ILO Governing Body

Geneva—U. S. Assistant Sec. of Labor George L-P Weaver, was elected chairman of the Intl. Labor Organization's Governing Body for a one-year term.

Weaver, one-time special assistant to the president of the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers, won the unanimous vote of the executive council's 48 government, worker and employer delegates.

His election was hailed by Jean Moeri, veteran Swiss spokesman of the council's worker members, as proof that a trade unionist could become a "government official, a statesman and a chairman of the ILO Governing Body."

Pierre Waline, French leader of the employer delegates, said that Weaver, a 56-year-old Negro, symbolized the "ability of the great American nation to assure equal opportunity for its citizens irrespective of their racial origin."

Before handing over the gavel, Robert Ago of Italy, the outgoing chairman, praised Weaver for the confidence he had inspired in America's ability to solve successfully its racial and other problems when addressing the just-concluded annual conference of the 118-nation ILO.

By electing Weaver chairman, Ago said, "we want to show that we share your faith and ideals."

At its one-day session here the council responded promptly to a call from the conference by deciding to address an appeal to governments to free "all trade unionists under arrest or sentence because of trade union activities."

The call was in a resolution on human rights that had been submitted to the conference by members of Intl. Confederation of Free Trade Unions affiliates. The resolution requested all ILO member states to "cooperate fully" in strengthening the organization on activities in regard to "human-rights and to freedom of association."

Concluding the conference's general debate, ILO Dir. Gen. David A. Morse promised that he would soon propose a comprehensive program designed to "inject into every field of the ILO's activity an ever greater awareness of the need to promote human rights."

When urging further action by governments, the ILO official denounced what he called the "glaring gap" to be found throughout the world between promises to protect these rights and actual practices.

In the final days of the three-week session the conference approved preliminary drafts of new international standards on sickness insurance and labor inspection in agriculture. Final action will be taken at next year's session.

The purpose of the inspection standards is to assure that working conditions are regularly checked by competent and independent authorities to improve the lot of farm workers.

During the brief session that traditionally follows the major annual meeting the Governing Body elected U.S. Worker Delegate Rudolph Faupl as the worker member of its delegation at the ILO European Regional Conference to be held in Geneva next December.

Training Projects Readied For 230

Agreements have been signed for Apprenticeship Outreach programs with local building and construction trades councils in Oakland, Calif., and Salt Lake City, Sec. of Labor W. Willard Wirtz announced.

The California program will prepare 200 minority-group youths for apprentice openings in San Mateo, Santa Clara, Contra Costa and Marin counties. A total of $226,024 has been provided by the Labor Dept. for the program.

The Utah program, with a federal grant of $41,856, will prepare 30 minority-group youths for apprentice openings throughout the state.

Goldberg Gets Post to Umpire Cloak Disputes

New York—Arthur J. Goldberg has returned to private practice as a lawyer after seven years in three of his nation's highest public offices. But he won't be far from the labor field in which he first made his reputation.

Goldberg has accepted the post of impartial chairman for the New York coat and suit industry, adjudicating any disputes that arise under the cloak industry's contract with the Ladies' Garment Workers.

The first impartial chairman—in the pioneering agreement 58 years ago—was Louis D. Brandeis, who later served with distinction on the Supreme Court.

Goldberg was a noted labor lawyer and special counsel for the AFL-CIO before becoming secretary of labor, then a U.S. Supreme Court justice, and for the past three years the U.S. ambassador to the United Nations.

He has joined a prominent New York law firm as a senior partner. The firm is now known as Paul, Weiss, Goldberg, Rifkind, Wharton & Garrison.

Campaign Steps Up:

Humphrey Pushes Urban Marshall Plan

By John M. Barry

Vice Pres. Hubert H. Humphrey renewed his call for a "Marshall Plan for the cities" to help meet the critical and growing needs of the nation's decaying urban areas.

In a speech to the City Club of Cleveland, Humphrey urged that the task of rebuilding the cities be undertaken with the same approach that helped the devastated nations of Europe rebuild themselves with Marshall Plan aid following World War II.

Acknowledging that he was talking "about billions of dollars," the Vice President proposed the creation of a "National Urban Development Bank" to be launched with federal funds but financed largely through private subscription. Unusual "risk" elements would be underwritten by the federal government.

Under the plan, a system of regional banks would finance development in specific urban areas, making and guaranteeing loans for inner-city and metropolitan-wide development.

Such a system, providing an assured source of funds, Humphrey suggested, "would facilitate and encourage long-range planning for metropolitan area development—planning now inhibited by the uncertainties of the annual appropriation process."

He declared that the cost of the program could be met from rising revenues produced by an ever-expanding economy and from a "fair share of the 'peace dividend' which can be ours" in negotiating an honorable settlement of the Viet Nam war.

The Vice President's Cleveland speech was the latest in a series of campaign addresses outlining his approach to domestic issues as he pressed his drive to win the Democratic nomination for President.

Earlier, in Denver, he set forth his views on educational needs, urging guaranteed schooling through college to the extent of each student's abilities.

In Bismark, N.D., he pledged "a new and complete look" into the costs and quality of hospital service and medical treatment." The most advanced nation in the world in science and medicine, he said, should also be "the most advanced in caring for the health and lives of its own citizens."

While Humphrey was on the campaign trail, he picked up significant new support for his candidacy from one of the key aides to the late Sen. Robert F. Kennedy.

Former Postmaster Gen. Lawrence F. O'Brien, who had left his Cabinet post to work with the Kennedy campaign organization, announced his endorsement of the Vice President as the candidate best serving the Kennedy "aspirations and ideals."

O'Brien recalled his long association with Humphrey in both the Johnson Administration and that of the late Pres. John F. Kennedy. The Vice President, he said, "has been a fighter in the causes of peace and justice and a leader in the halls of government throughout his public career." O'Brien said he would be available to Humphrey "for whatever advice, counsel and assistance I can render to his campaign efforts."

In another development, United Democrats for Humphrey announced the formation of task forces composed of more than 60 scholars and experts to advise the Vice President on key domestic and international issues.

Experts from the labor field include AFL-CIO Research Dir. Nat Goldfinger; AFL-CIO Associate Gen. Counsel Thomas E. Harris; Marvin Friedman, assistant AFL-CIO research director; Woodrow Ginsburg, research director for the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept.; Nelson Cruikshank, former AFL-CIO social security director; and Hyman H. Bookbinder, formerly an AFL-CIO legislative representative.

FOR EFFORTS unprecedented in U.S. history, "to win a better life for the nation's elderly," Pres. Johnson receives a plaque from leaders of the 2.5-million-member National Council of Senior Citizens. Nelson Cruikshank, left, retired director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Social Security and now an adviser to the council, and William R. Hutton, executive director, make the presentation.

Senior Aides Program Opens 400 New Jobs

Men and women 55 and older went to work July 1 in many community service jobs under a pilot program launched by the National Council of Senior Citizens.

The program, Senior Aides, is financed by a $1,093,840 grant from the Labor Dept.

William R. Hutton, executive director of the senior citizens council, said the work ranges from such jobs as personal services for elderly shut-ins to training of the unskilled in the use of power tools.

The Senior Aides are working in schools, libraries, day care centers, home health care and in other areas where older men and women can help if given the opportunity, he said.

The program is being developed in cooperation with public and nonprofit community agencies in ten areas of the country: Allegheny County, Pa.; Buffalo, N.Y.; Chicago; Dade County, Fla.; Detroit; Milwaukee; Minneapolis; New Bedford, Mass.; Providence, R.I., and Washington, D.C.

About 400 Senior Aides will be employed for one year. They will work a 20-hour week and be paid from $1.60 to $2.50 an hour.

Under an agreement with the Labor Dept., the senior citizens council will use four-fifths of the grant for wages. The remaining one-fifth will be for administration and related expenses.

Recruiting and screening of job applicants for the program is being done through public employment offices and offices of the Labor Dept.'s Concentrated Employment Program.

The council will be responsible for the full wages and fringe benefits of the Senior Aides and the employing agencies will cover the cost of local supervision on the job, Hutton noted.

Through the program, "the elderly poor can supplement their meager incomes by working at socially useful tasks in their communities," Hutton said.

Agencies Benefit

He pointed out that the employing agencies stand to benefit from the use of the Senior Aides' knowledge and skills.

It is hoped the program will be extended to cover the 5 million people 65 and older who are living in poverty and millions of others who live at or near the poverty line, Hutton urged.

He said the Council has long pleaded with Congress to establish a nationwide community service corps for older people who are unemployed or retired and want to augment inadequate incomes through jobs which now are not available in government or industry.

Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz, at a congressional hearing last year, had offered to use anti-poverty funds administered by his department for a demonstration senior citizens community service program.

Wirtz accepted the proposal of the senior citizens council and announced Feb. 15 that the department would fund the program.

House Passes Weak Bill On Gas Pipeline Safety

The House passed a drastically weakened version of the Senate's gas pipeline safety bill, rejecting a series of labor-supported amendments to strengthen the legislation.

The Senate bill, passed last November, gave the secretary of transportation power to set and enforce safety standards for all pipelines carrying natural gas — from the wells to the big transmission lines, from the transmission lines to the distribution points and the distribution lines running under city streets.

It would, in the Senate version, be the secretary's decision whether a state's program — including enforcement as well as standards—was good enough to justify an agreement ceding jurisdiction to a state regulatory agency.

The House committee bill widened exemptions in the legislation, reduced penalties for violation, cut the federal government's enforcement power and permitted a state to exempt itself by certifying that it met federal standards.

Urging the House to strengthen the committee bill, AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller had written every congressman:

"Surely the ghastly toll of deaths and injuries from recent gas pipeline explosions is evidence enough that the Congress should take every step to enact meaningful legislation to protect workers and the public health and safety."

The Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers had circulated a dramatic scrapbook of newspaper stories and pictures of pipeline explosions killing and maiming hundreds of people and destroying schools and homes.

On the key rollcall vote, the House insisted by a 247-125 margin on substituting its weaker committee bill for the Senate-passed version.

The one victory for supporters of a stronger bill was agreement in the debate that language in the committee bill left the secretary of transportation with power to order correction of potentially hazardous conditions in existing pipelines as well as in new installations.

No Time to Stop

Meany Backs Appointments To High Court

the appointments, claiming Johnson acted "hastily."

Strong support for Senate confirmation, however, has come from both Senate Republican Leader Everett McKinley Dirksen, who said he will vote to shut off a filibuster, and New York Gov. Nelson A. Rockefeller, who described Fortas as "brilliant" and his appointment as "outstanding."

Meany said the AFL-CIO is "dismayed and disappointed by the political maneuvering among a few senators and a leading presidential candidate" seeking to block the appointments.

"The threat of a filibuster, and the overtones of prejudice that accompany it, cannot be justified by any political or moral standard. An attack on these appointees, or an attack on the right of the President to fulfill his constitutional duties, can only reflect discredit upon those engaging in it," Meany warned.

Quick Consent Urged

He expressed hope that "cooler heads and more mature legislators will recognize these dangers and that the Senate will speedily consent to these appointments."

Meany expressed labor's "deep regret" at the resignation of Warren —"a truly outstanding jurist and great American."

In addition to the "lame duck" argument—a contention which would have blocked the confirmation of the most famous of chief justices, John Marshall, in 1801 —Republican opponents found another issue to nit-pick.

Warren's resignation was to take effect at the pleasure of the President and Johnson said it would become effective on confirmation of his successor.

Therefore, the argument went, there was no vacancy to fill. But a quick check showed a number of federal appointments to the judiciary, all confirmed by the Senate, under the same conditions.

Mondale Named to Senate Labor Unit

Sen. Walter F. Mondale (D-Minn.) has been named to the Senate's Labor & Public Welfare Committee to fill the vacancy left by the death of Robert F. Kennedy.

Mondale's selection by the Democratic leadership maintains a firm liberal majority on the committee which handles legislation dealing with education and job programs as well as direct labor laws.

Both Mondale and Kennedy had perfect voting records on the AFL-CIO tabulation for the first session of the 90th Congress.

House OKs $5.3 Billion Housing Bill

By Duane Emme

Pres. Johnson's landmark housing bill—with new programs to aid the poor in obtaining adequate dwellings — passed the House, 295 to 114, after a number of restrictive amendments were rejected.

The bill now goes to a House-Senate conference committee for ironing out of differences with a similar Senate-passed version.

The legislation authorizes a $5.3 billion start over the next three years on Johnson's goal of attaining 6 million new homes or apartments for low and moderate income families over the next 10 years.

Two major new programs remain intact in both the House and Senate bills:

One would enable low and moderate income families to buy homes with the government subsidizing all but 1 percent of conventional mortgage interest costs, now running at about 7 percent.

Low income buyers would pay 20 percent of their monthly income toward mortgage and interest payments. The goal is 480,000 new units under the program over the next three years.

A second program provides for like subsidies for low and moderate-income families in renting homes and apartments. Here families would pay 25 percent of their incomes and the government the balance. The goal is 700,000 low-rent units over three years.

Both bills also provide for 375,-

After Automatic Suspension:

UAW 'Formally' Quits Federation

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany has acknowledged the "formal" disaffiliation of the Auto Workers from the AFL-CIO, declaring that the union's "predetermined objective of withdrawal" stems from its "apparent unwillingness to live in constructive harmony" with the federation and its affiliates.

Meany's comments came in a letter dated July 10, 1968, replying to a July 1, 1968, letter from the top officers of the UAW which said that "to avoid any confusion or misunderstanding as to the status of the UAW with the AFL-CIO, you are hereby advised that the UAW formally disaffiliates from the AFL-CIO." (Text of both letters on Pages 4 and 5.)

The federation president said he had no "sense of confusion or misunderstanding" as to the status of the UAW, in light of the "automatic, mandatory provision of the AFL-CIO Constitution" requiring the suspension of the UAW for nonpayment of per capita tax.

The officers of the UAW, Meany wrote, "can not have been in any real doubt as to the in-

Unemployment Climbs, Youths Flood Job Pool

By Robert B. Cooney

The national unemployment rate jumped from 3.5 percent in May to 3.8 percent in June as many of the youngsters who flooded into the labor market failed to find jobs, the Labor Dept. reported.

With the close of school, the teenage quest for jobs swelled the labor force by 2.6 million, pushing the total past 80 million for the first time.

But the lack of work for young people caused unemployment to rise by 1.3 million from May to a total of 3.6 million jobless.

"Unemployment normally moves up sharply in June," the Labor Dept. report noted. "This year's rise, however, was 200,000 more than seasonally expected.

"With many young people entering the job market at the close of school, teenagers accounted for 1.0 million of the over-the-month rise in unemployment, while job-

Joint Convention Completes Link

By David L. Perlman

San Diego, Calif.—A 500,000-strong union covering the nation's food industry from slaughterhouse to the meat counters of supermarkets emerged from conventions here and in Los Angeles.

Joining the 400,000-member Meat Cutters & Butcher Workmen are nearly 100,000 members of the Packinghouse Workers.

The UPWA convention in Los Angeles voted to back the unanimous recommendation of the union's executive board to merge their strength with the older and bigger Meat Cutters in the hope that combined resources and an end to organizational rivalries would bring greater strength at the bargaining table and a massive organizing campaign in low-wage segments of the food industry.

As the AFL-CIO News went to press, a caravan of buses was being readied for the 120-mile trip from Los Angeles to bring the nearly 600 UPWA delegates to a historic joint session.

They were assured of a rousing reception from their new union brothers and sisters. Here in San Diego, the 1,250 delegates to the 22nd convention of the Meat Cutters unanimously ratified the merger agreement. The vote was followed by a cheering, standing ovation—punctuated by firecrackers.

Once before, in 1956, the two unions had stood poised on the verge of merger. But the bus engines starting in Los Angeles told the story that this time the months of work that went into the merger agreement was not in vain. Unity, which the leaders of both unions had long sought, was a fact.

The merger agreement enlarges the executive board of the Meat Cutters to add five vice presidents from the UPWA, in addition to the president, secretary-treasurer and 21 vice presidents elected at the Meat Cutters convention.

Staffs of the two unions will be integrated over a transitional period running until October. Both unions have been headquartered in Chicago and have worked closely together in negotiating—and sometimes striking—in companies where both hold bargaining rights.

At the next convention of the Meat Cutters, delegates from local unions which came out of the UPWA will nominate and elect five vice presidents who will be confirmed by the convention. But from 1976 on, the merger agreement provides, all officers will be elected by regular convention procedures and the last vestige of separate unions will disappear.

Meat Cutters & Butcher Workmen

San Diego, Calif.—More money and staff, as well as a bigger membership, will put muscle into an expanded organizing and bargaining program outlined at the Meat Cutters convention here.

Delegates voted overwhelmingly to boost monthly dues $1 to strengthen both locals and the international union. Of that amount 40 cents will be earmarked for a per capita increase from $1.85 to $2.25 a month.

Then the convention went on to double the union's strike fund, authorizing special assessments whenever it falls below the new floor of $10 million.

"The financial soundness and strength of that fund may make many a strike unnecessary," Pres.

Packinghouse Workers

Los Angeles—Delegates to the 16th and last convention of the Packinghouse Workers looked back on their union's past with pride—and to the future with hope.

In hotel corridors, in district caucuses and on the convention floor, the delegates discussed the pros and cons of the merger unanimously recommended by the UPWA's leaders.

A number of the nearly 600 delegates remembered when the UPWA had been chartered by the CIO 25 years ago as a full-fledged international union. Some memories went back to the sitdown strike era of the 1930s, when the banner was that of the Packinghouse Workers Organizing Committee.

It's not easy to vote out of exist-

A CORTEGE of almost 1,000 taxi cabs slowly crosses the Brooklyn Bridge for the funeral of slain cab driver Leroy Wright, a member of the New York City Taxi Drivers. Wright was murdered May 25. Leading the funeral procession was the black-draped cab in which Wright was killed. His family and union officers followed, including Pres. Harry Van Arsdale, Jr. It was more than a funeral procession. "This is a never-forgettable protest of 33,000 cab drivers" demanding more police protection, said Local Sec. Thomas M. Iandoli. Six cab drivers have been murdered in the city in the last two years. The pallbearers are New York City Auxiliary Police, part of the 133 fellow members of the Taxi Drivers Union who are now on the auxiliary police force.

Transport-Communication Union Rejects Plan for Link to Clerks

St. Louis—Delegates to the 37th convention of the Transportation-Communication Employes rejected by a 170-178 vote a resolution favoring merger with the Railway & Airline Clerks.

But they left the merger door open by passing—by more than a two-thirds margin—another resolution authorizing grand lodge and general officers to contact various unions, including BRAC on merger possibilities.

If any subsequent merger plan is approved by the officers, it will then be submitted to a referendum of TCU members. A majority vote would make such a plan effective.

The plan for merger with the Clerks was submitted to the convention with a favorable recommendation by most TCU officers, but with sharp opposition by some. BRAC Pres. C. L. Dennis explained the plan as viewed by his union.

Besides the merger issue, the convention also faced a sharp contest for top offices in the TCU. This contest followed the announced retirement of Pres. G. E. Leighty, who piloted the organization (formerly known as the Order of Railroad Telegraphers) for 22 years, and the retirement of two veteran vice presidents—Otis C. Jones and R. J. Woodman.

Delegates also adopted a series of resolutions setting forth some of the economic goals of the union. These included paid sick leave; double time rates for work outside regular hours, on rest days or during vacation periods; triple time for work on established holidays; pay for time lost while engaged in jury duty; compensation at time and a half, plus expenses for time spent in physical and other examinations required by management, and interest penalties for delays by management in paying claims granted by the National Railroad Adjustment Board.

Other resolutions covering economic goals were still to be acted on. The convention also had before it a series of economic recommendations made by Leighty in his convention report.

Wage Boosts Urged

In addition, Leighty called for sufficient wage increases not only to keep abreast of rising living costs, but "to provide an actual improvement in our standard of living"; wage adjustments to correct inequities and to re-establish proper differentials, and improved job stabilization programs, both in the United States and Canada.

On the legislative front, Leighty urged continued efforts to improve railroad retirement and unemployment insurance benefits. He called also for intensified efforts to secure enactment of additional rail safety legislation and to win repeal of Section 13(a) of the 1958 Transportation Act, which gave railroads almost a free hand to discontinue passenger trains.

Leighty also urged all-out opposition to anti-labor bills, both national and state; active support of the war on poverty and other programs to improve the lot of the underprivileged, and cooperation with other labor groups and with government officials in programs designed to protect the security of the United States and Canada "and eventually bring about peace and freedom throughout the world."

Among speakers at the early sessions were Ruben Levin, editor-manager of Labor newspaper; Lester P. Schoene, counsel for the union; Howard Habermeyer, chairman of the Railroad Retirement Board, and Clyde F. Lane, president of the Railway Conductors & Brakemen.

Lane, in his address, told of the considerable progress that has been made towards unification by his organization and three other "operating" unions—the Trainmen, Switchmen, and the Locomotive Firemen & Enginemen.

Lane cited the widespread mergers that have occurred among the railroads, and the steady decimation of rail jobs and of union membership, due both to mergers and "the rush of technological change."

"As our industry changes, we must change, if we are to continue to represent the men who have chosen us," he said.

Mediators Call Strike Talks In Aluminum

St. Louis—The Aluminum Workers approved a request by the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service to resume negotiations with employers in the six-week-old strike of 18,000 workers against Reynolds Metals Co. and Aluminum Co. of America.

Labor and management representatives agreed to meet with the mediators July 12. The walkout started June 1 at eight Alcoa plants and six Reynolds Metals locations.

While negotiations go on, picket lines will be maintained, the union said, until a satisfactory offer is made by the two big firms. Previous management offers have contained too little money and too few improvements in working conditions to meet the needs of union members, the AWIU said.

"We will stay out until our members get what they feel entitled to," a spokesman said.

4-Way Merger Planned:

Unity Theme Marks Rail Firemen Parley

Houston, Tex.—Unity is the keynote of the 39th convention of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen & Enginemen which opened here July 8.

The concept of unity was raised at the opening session by BLF&E Pres. H. E. Gilbert who urged the nearly 1,000 delegates to support a movement now underway to unite the brotherhood with three other railroad operating unions, the Railroad Trainmen (BRT) the Switchmen's Union (SUNA) and the Railway Conductors & Brakemen (ORC&B).

In his opening address, Gilbert noted that in the light of shrinking employment opportunities in the railroad industry and the continuing trend by rail managements to merge, railroad workers can no longer afford the luxury of belonging to smaller unions which lack the strength to cope with today's problems.

Gilbert pointed out that many other AFL-CIO affiliated unions already had merged and that others were now in various stages of uniting.

"With ever increasing frequency you read of other labor organizations uniting—the Meat Cutters and Packinghouse Workers, the Laborers and the Mail Handlers," Gilbert said.

"These people are coming to the realization that organizations disunited can no longer stand alone."

The theme of unity was taken up again on the second day of the convention when Assistant Labor Sec. Thomas R. Donahue visited the convention. He told the delegates that the situation in America today dictates that railroad men unite their organizations.

"Today, in spite of the dedicated efforts of the Locomotive Firemen & Enginemen, even in joint concert with other operating brotherhoods, new methods of operation and introduction of labor saving devices have eaten away at the railroad trades with devastating results," Donahue said.

"Other changes of the times," he continued, "which underline the question of unification and merger are the skyrocketing complexity and cost of negotiations and disputes processing, of court proceedings, hearings before special boards and testimony before Congress."

Donahue told the delegates that without the American labor movement several major accomplishments might not have been attained in the past seven years. These he said, include the increase in every workers purchasing power by 18 percent, the 60 percent jump in the Gross National Product, a 13 percent increase in social security benefits and a boost in employment by 10 million jobs.

Donahue cautioned against the danger of slowing down the effort to attain better conditions for the nation's working men and women and for the poor.

Sen. Ralph W. Yarborough (D-Tex.) told the delegates that the concept of compulsory arbitration is a two-way sword which could hack at the rights of management as menacingly as it could at those of labor.

Yarborough warned that government compulsion could make a company keep prices at a subsistence level, make management pay higher taxes and deny to management the profit needed to make free enterprise a thriving entity.

Buffalo Building Trades To Train Journeymen

Fifty non-union construction workers in Buffalo, N. Y., will take 28 weeks of training to become eligible for full membership in 19 building trades unions under a new program announced by the Labor Dept.

The program, called JUSTICE — Journeymen Under Specific Training in Construction Employment—is the first of the kind in the United States, Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz said.

The department will provide $114,225 to help meet the cost of the training program under an agreement with a non-profit group called the Opportunities Development Corp. of Buffalo in cooperation with the Workers' Defense League and the A. Philip Randolph Education Fund.

The league has an "outreach" program for apprentices in cooperation with the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Council in Buffalo. The program prepares minority-group young people for entrance tests. It was conceived by the Workers' Defense League in New York City and currently is supported in 34 cities by the Labor Dept.'s Manpower Administration.

The Buffalo construction workers, mostly Negroes, will concentrate for three weeks on classroom instruction in mathematics and blueprint reading after general orientation courses. Five weeks will be devoted to vocational training in the classroom by union journeymen.

Applicants then will train for 20 weeks on the job, working when possible with the same union members who gave them classroom instruction.

The program will concentrate on upgrading the skills of non-union carpenters, asbestos workers, glaziers, lathers and ironworkers. Those who complete training will receive union membership applications and will start paying union dues when hired by employers.

Most students are beyond the usual apprenticeship age, some as old as 50. Many have worked all their lives in the construction field without seeking union membership and wages, the Labor Dept. reported.

Lithograph Reproduces AFL-CIO Mosaic Mural

Color reproductions, suitable for framing, of the massive mosaic mural in the lobby of the AFL-CIO headquarters building in Washington, D.C., are being offered by the federation.

The full-color lithograph measuring 15 by 34 inches, is available at $1.50 each from the AFL-CIO Pamphlet Division, 815 Sixteenth St., N.W., Washington, D.C. 20006.

The mural stands two stories high and 51 feet long. It was made from 300,000 pieces of mosaic in five colors of glass gold from Italy and six colors of marble.

Designed by the noted American artist Lumen Martin Winter, the mural's theme is man's mastery over the machine in behalf of progress.

The mural has become one of Washington's major tourist sights, especially for visiting union members who stop at the AFL-CIO headquarters across Lafayette Park from the White House.

Strengthen Finances, Staff:

Meat Cutters Beef Up Plans For Organizing, Bargaining

Thomas J. Lloyd told the delegates.

Lloyd and the union's veteran secretary-treasurer, Patrick E. Gorman, were re-elected unanimously to new four-year terms. Gorman has been secretary-treasurer since 1942—and before that had served since 1923 as president. Lloyd was first elected president in 1957.

Delegates were told the union had a net gain of 40,000 members over the past four years—but had to sign up 325,000 new members to achieve that increase because of plant shutdowns and "terrific turnover" of employment, particularly in seasonal branches of the industry.

The expectation of further growth and greater effectiveness stemming from the momentum of the merger was a theme that ran through the convention.

AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler termed the uniting of the two unions "a truly historic event."

He traced the rise out of poverty and exploitation of workers in the meat industry "thanks to union organization and union action." Now, Schnitzler said, "union statesmanship" has put an end to the era of "rivalry between unions."

But Schnitzler stressed that the goals of the trade union movement have not yet been achieved.

"Despite all the progress the nation has made," he said, "poverty still persists in America. And make no mistake about it, the grievances of the poor are real."

Labor is moving to meet the challenge of poverty, Schnitzler told the delegates, "not through marches but through our own programs to recruit, prepare and enroll the deprived, and through our leadership in the Urban Coalition and every other private endeavor aimed at the elimination of poverty."

In convention resolutions and speeches, delegates reaffirmed the union's dedication to "total and complete equality for all Americans in all phases of life" and to programs to bring this about.

Roy Wilkins, executive director of the NAACP, was the first convention speaker, and Gorman announced to applause from the delegates, that the union's executive board is making a "very substantial" contribution to the NAACP.

The need for an effective federal job safety and occupational health law was another recurring theme at the convention, and a resolution denounced the attacks on the bill spearheaded by the U.S. Chamber of Commerce.

The union, which was a leader in the successful legislative effort to strengthen the federal meat inspection law and to enact the first poultry act 11 years ago, declared in a resolution that "the consumer crusade must continue." It urged the Senate to complete action on the bill to strengthen poultry inspection and called for passage of legislation to provide federal inspection of fish and fish processing.

In convention banners and "Huelga" strike buttons worn by most of the delegates, as well as in resolutions, the Meat Cutters affirmed their strong support for the AFL-CIO United Farm Workers Organizing Committee.

On internal matters, the convention voted to "freeze" the death benefit program as of the end of July, limiting it to those presently enrolled. The reason, delegates noted in discussion, is that the availability of low-cost insurance has made the traditional union death benefit an outmoded organizing tool.

Salaries of the union's officers were raised—with the president and secretary-treasurer to receive $50,000 instead of $39,500 a year, and vice presidents on full-time assignment moving from $22,500 to $30,000.

Twenty-one vice presidents, 16 of them incumbents, were elected without opposition. In a new move authorized by the convention, Harry R. Poole was designated executive vice president—a title corresponding to the role he has filled in the union. The new vice presidents, who will be joined by the five named by the Packinghouse Workers, are Irving Kaplan of Newark, N.J.; Glen A. Snyder, Baltimore, Md.; Leo LaFauce, St. Louis, Mo.; Richard A. Twedell, Dallas, Tex.; and James R. Kenny, Wilkes-Barre, Pa.

Gorman, in his report to the convention, said the Meat Cutters hope to "sharply increase" the number of organizers in the field to bring in hundreds of thousands of food industry workers who are not members of any union. He estimated that more than half of all workers in the food processing industry are still unorganized.

In the political area, delegates vigorously applauded resolutions and speakers praising Vice Pres. Humphrey. And the union's executive board issued a report calling on members to avoid the "frustration and anger which has increased the extremism of both the left and right in the American body politic."

The officers of the Meat Cutters said the "alienation of the new left and the followers of George Wallace provide obvious examples" of this new extremism.

Ralph Helstein addresses the final convention of the Packinghouse Workers as a separate entity. The two unions were to complete the merger action at a joint meeting, July 12.

NLRB Reaffirms Validity of Cards Designating Union Bargaining Agent

The National Labor Relations Board will continue to apply the rule that a worker who signs a clearly-worded authorization card in a union organizing campaign has signified his intention to designate the union as his bargaining agent, NLRB members said in a 5-0 decision.

The board, in a case involving Levi Strauss & Co., Tyler, Tex., and the Clothing Workers, reviewed the rule it has followed for more than five years in cardcheck cases and spelled out the reasoning behind its orders to employers who destroy a union's majority by illegal means.

Noting that the validity of its cardcheck rulings "has been questioned by some courts and in some other quarters," the board affirmed a trial examiner's findings that the union had in 1966 secured authorization cards from a majority of workers at the pants manufacturer's Tyler plant; that management launched a campaign to destroy the union's majority by threats and promises and caused it to lose a 1967 election; and that the company should be ordered to recognize the ACWA and bargain with it.

The employer challenged the union's contention that it represented a majority of employes before the election. It argued that some of the cards should not be counted because they were obtained "under the alleged misrepresentation that they would be used only for the purpose of obtaining an NLRB election."

Trial Examiner John P. von Rohr ruled after hearing testimony that the union had 87 valid authorization cards in a bargaining unit with 163 employes, and the board agreed.

"The cards on their face," it said, "spell out in clear and unambiguous language an authorization for the union to represent the signer for collective bargaining."

The examiner held that in some instances the possibility of an election was mentioned but none of the employes was told that the cards would be used only for the purpose of getting an election.

The cards signed by the 87 employes were labeled "applications for membership" in ACWA and stated "I, the undersigned, hereby apply for membership in the Clothing Workers and do hereby appoint and authorize the officers thereof to represent and negotiate for me in all matters pertaining to wages, hours and other conditions of employment."

The board commented: "Without ascribing to such cards . . . all the solemnity and binding effect associated with deeds, or wills, or contracts, or bills and notes, there is . . . in the case of clearly expressed authorization cards . . . no valid basis . . . for denying face value to the signed cards" without proof of misrepresentation or coercion in getting signatures.

The board added: "Declarations to employes that authorization cards are desired to gain an election do not under ordinary circumstances constitute misrepresentations either of fact or of purpose."

Board Member Sam Zagoria signed the decision but said in a footnote that remarks made to two card signers could be interpreted as meaning that the cards would be used only for an election. Accordingly, Zagoria "would not rely on their cards in affirming the examiner's finding of majority status," the report said.

In a related case, the 1st U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, Boston, rejected a claim by the Sinclair Co., Holyoke, Mass., that signed authorization cards are "inherently unreliable." Enforcing an NLRB order that Sinclair must bargain with Teamsters Local 404 because company misconduct caused it to lose an election, the court said management demanded an election so it could "gain time in which to dissipate the union's majority."

Defense Dept. Affirms Equal Opportunity Stand

Defense Sec. Clark M. Clifford has reaffirmed the principle of equal employment opportunity in the ranks of the Dept. of Defense.

Clifford, who replaced Robert S. McNamara in the Defense post in January, noted that significant progress has been made toward achieving fairer and more effective use of the skills and talents of minority group civilian employes.

He said 1 million civilian employes work together to preserve America's freedom and that every effort must be made to strengthen individual freedom of opportunity.

Pride, New Hope Spur Packinghouse Workers

ence a union you sweated—and often literally bled—to build.

But the verdict was overwhelming. By a margin of better than 9-1, delegates stood to vote for and then applaud a merger ratification resolution affirming that "the unity of labor is in the best interest of all workers in the industry."

It will, the convention said, "provide the means for even more effective representation of the workers in collective bargaining and in meeting the broader social and political challenges we face in today's society."

Ralph Helstein, who has headed the Packinghouse Workers since 1946 and was the union's general counsel before then, set the tone for the convention's deliberations in his opening day speech.

"We all have fear of something new and different," he acknowledged, "and the merged union will be new and different."

But, he assured the delegates, "we will find that many of our own traditions exist in the Meat Cutters."

In the organizing field, by eliminating competition between the unions and by merging resources, a united effort can succeed "where in the past our divisions have resulted in failure," Helstein said.

"We have in the past dared to dream and then worked to make the dream become reality. Merger offers us the opportunity to dream again, on a larger scale, and with effort and energy we can once more make reality of our dreams."

Helstein spoke of the changing nature of the meat packing industry as one reason for merger.

For more than a decade, he said, "old plants with large employment closed down, new smaller plants employing fewer people but producing more replaced them."

And in recent years, Helstein noted, the conglomerate corporation has replaced the old names of the meat industry—Armour & Co. becoming a part of the American Smelting & Refining Co., Swift entering the insurance business on a large scale.

To meet corporate strength with union strength, Helstein said, the merged union will represent virtually all of the workers at the big meat packing chains and major independents.

He spoke of the current bargaining crisis at Campbell Soup Co. plants, "where strike action may be necessary."

Both unions are coordinating their bargaining efforts and together represent some 12,000 Campbell workers. "A union speaking with the power of that kind of unity could be more effective at the bargaining table," Helstein declared.

The convention passed an omnibus resolution, summing up the union's position on a broad range of social, labor and legislative issues representing, as one delegate put it, the principles and dedication UPWA members carry with them into the merged union.

In a final action, the convention officially named the five vice presidents from the UPWA who will take their seats on the executive board of the Meat Cutters. Helstein will be a special counsel to the Meat Cutters as well as a vice president.

Joining him on the board will be Fred W. Dowling, UPWA Canadian vice president, and UPWA District Directors Charles Hayes, Dave Hart and Donald H. Smith.

Other UPWA officers, directors and staff members have been assigned staff duties and titles in the merged union.

New York Fire Fighters Elect Michael Maye

Meany Letter on UAW Disaffiliation

This will serve to acknowledge your letter of July 1 advising of the "formal" disaffiliation of your organization from the AFL-CIO.

Your letter describes as "unprecedented" the action of the Executive Council of the AFL-CIO in carrying out an automatic, mandatory provision of the AFL-CIO Constitution, Article XV, Section 5, requiring the suspension of the UAW for the non-payment of per capita tax.

You further describe as "unprecedented" the obvious consequence of suspension—required by the Constitution and consistently followed in the past in the case of any suspended or expelled organization: the separation of UAW locals from the state and local central bodies of the AFL-CIO. This result, too, was compelled, not by the AFL-CIO but by the UAW's refusal to meet the Constitutional conditions of affiliation with the AFL-CIO.

Your letter, while purporting to describe the sequence of events beginning with your letter of March 2 and culminating in the response of the Executive Council to your Convention resolution, is sadly incomplete.

You neglect to mention the threat and ultimatum contained in your communication to the Executive Council dated March 2. You demanded that a special convention be called by the AFL-CIO, at the pleasure of the UAW alone—specifically that "a Special AFL-CIO Convention be convened during the first or second week of December 1968."

To refresh your memory, the last paragraph of your letter of March 2 reads as follows:

"It is the carefully considered view of the UAW International Executive Board that should the UAW be denied the opportunity to present its program to a Special Convention, which alone has the constitutional authority to act upon this program, then in the judgment of the International Executive Board the UAW will have no acceptable alternative but to disaffiliate from the AFL-CIO so that the full resources of the UAW can be used to advance its program to deal effectively with the problems of American wage earners and all the people in our society."

It might well be asked what the reaction of the UAW Executive Board would be if it received such a demand from a single affiliate of the UAW, based upon the threat of disaffiliation if that demand were not met?

You neglect also to mention that the UAW Convention resolution also contained a threat to withhold per capita tax unless your demands were granted.

You state that the action of the Executive Council on March 12, offering to call a Special Convention as soon as possible, imposed conditions which no "honorable" organization could possibly accept. A true characterization of the matter would be precisely the reverse. The AFL-CIO Executive Council, confronted with a demand and an ultimatum which no honorable organization could possibly accept, responded with a proposal which no honorable organization, believing in majority rule in a democratic order, could reasonably reject.

In view of the UAW's record of denouncing the AFL-CIO and advertising its so-called "proposals for reform and revitalization" in the public press for the past two years—while at the same time evading, on various pretexts, every one of the many opportunities presented to it to bring its complaints and proposals to the proper forums of the AFL-CIO, it was only reasonable and prudent to ask the UAW to commit itself to attend and be represented at such a Convention, and to give assurances that it would not, at the last minute, decide to perform another disappearing act.

And, since, the UAW was demanding a Special Convention under threat of withdrawal, it was the unanimous opinion of the Executive Council that—in fairness to the other 128 affiliates of the AFL-CIO, all equally worthy of respect and consideration—those affiliates should not be burdened with the considerable expense and inconvenience of bringing a delegation to such a Convention unless there was at least some prospect that the decisions they would make at such a convention would be respected by the organization responsible for putting them to that trouble and expense. Each of those affiliates, after all, would be expected to honor and accept the same decisions, whether they liked them or not.

Stripped of all superfluous aspects of the matter, all that the Executive Council was asking of the UAW, in return for giving the UAW a Special Convention (to which you were not entitled as a matter of right under the Constitution) was an agreement on your part to abide by the principle of majority rule in the supreme governing body of the Federation.

May I call a witness to support the unanimous view of the AFL-CIO Executive Council that such a condition and principle is reasonable and necessary in a democratic body? I would like to call your attention to page 163 of the 1953 UAW Convention Proceedings, where the following remarks appear:

"The real issue involves majority rule. I ask the fellows from Local 600 who exercise the right of democratic expression in this Constitution to exercise the right to express their point of view but when the Convention has spoken and the will of the majority has been made clear, I say if you want the rights and privileges you have got to accept the responsibility to go back home and carry out the will of the majority."

And further, on the same page:

"If the brothers who want a 30-hour week will accept the will of the majority until they can change it, they will have the support of the administration in that effort, but go back home and carry out the will of the majority whether you were for it or whether you were against it until you can come back and change it. That is the way a democratic union works."

I subscribe fully to those observations. They were made by Walter P. Reuther.

Let me return again to the question of precedents.

It is unclear why you feel that the Executive Council should, in its decisions, be bound by non-existent precedents rather than the explicit requirements of the 1955 merger Constitution as well as the moral obligation to defend the integrity of the whole Federation.

You state in your letter that the Executive Council chose to suspend the UAW under a provision of the Constitution never before invoked in the more than sixty years of the history of the American trade union movement.

May I point out to you, in case you hadn't noticed it, that I have now reached an advanced age and my personal memory goes back a good many years in the trade union movement. I even know that the history of the Federation goes back, not "more than 60 years", but more than eighty years, to 1881, to be exact.

And within my memory, no affiliated organization, no matter how large and boastful of its financial resources, has ever succeeded in coercing a decision of this Federation by a threat, an ultimatum, or by that favorite ploy of the banker's mentality: raw financial pressure. I am very proud of the fact that it has not happened during my administration as President, and I do not propose to preside over any departure from that precedent, so vital to the equal rights of all affiliates.

And if the absence of precedents is your criteria, consider this:

There is no precedent in the trade union movement for a situation where one affiliate of the national trade union center engages in a running, long-distance barrage of criticism and demands upon its national center while at the same time refuses to appear to press its complaints and justify its charges before its equals in the forums of the trade union center.

There is no precedent in the trade union movement where one affiliate, after having refused for two years to appear at Convention, General Board meetings and numerous Executive Council meetings, suddenly demands a Special Convention, at a date to suit its own peculiar convenience, and attaches to that demand a written threat to disaffiliate if its demand is not met.

There is no precedent in the history of the trade union movement for an organization refusing to pay its per capita tax in the absence of financial hardship, while allowing its members to believe that they would nevertheless be permitted to continue in affiliation to the national trade union center.

There is no precedent in the history of the trade union movement for local unions of a suspended affiliate being permitted to continue membership in local and state councils and other subordinate bodies of the national trade union center.

In connection with the UAW threat to withhold per capita tax payments, let me refer you to the position of Samuel Gompers when a similar question of principle arose at the 1902 Convention of the American Federation of Labor. But you don't have to go back to ancient history to find that parallel. Let me quote to you my own remarks, in reference to that episode, which I made in your presence at the 1961 AFL-CIO Convention in response to a disaffiliation threat by the ITU during the consideration of the adoption of Article XXI of the AFL-CIO Constitution:

"May I, without commenting on this resolution—I want to comment on it later perhaps—state for the benefit of the delegates something which is a matter of high principle with me and a matter of organization. I am going to quote from a report to the convention of the American Federation of Labor made in 1902 by Samuel Gompers:

'During the year there was received at the office notices from two national unions to the effect that unless certain decisions were rendered or action taken, they would not pay to the AFL any per capita tax.

'In other words, that unless the Executive Council or your President decided to act exactly as was demanded by the threatening organizations they would, by refusing to perform their financial obligations, withdraw from the AFL.'

'I therefore recommend that any organization which shall at any time declare or notify the office of the AFL that unless its desires, wishes or claims are complied with, it will refuse to pay its proper financial obligations to the AFL or that it will withdraw from the AFL, that in any such case the officers of the AFL shall be prohibited from proceeding further upon the matter involved in any manner whatsoever, and the organization shall be deprived of the right of representation in the convention of the AFL until not only its full financial obligations have been performed in accordance with the Constitution, but also until it has withdrawn such notice or declaration.'

"I subscribe to that policy".

I note the purpose of your letter to me is "to avoid any confusion or misunderstanding as to the status of the UAW with the AFL-CIO." Let me assure you of my appreciation of your purpose, but at the same time reassure you that I have not been suffering from any sense of confusion or misunderstanding as to the status of the UAW with the AFL-CIO.

Your inference that you have been refused an opportunity to air your views within the AFL-CIO is ironic, in the light of the facts. Since the UAW began its campaign of vilification in May of 1966, every conceivable opportunity has been extended to you to bring your complaints and proposals out of the area of propaganda and into the trade union movement. We scheduled and prepared for discussions, both at the level of the Executive Council and at the Convention, at your specific request. The February 1967 statement of the AFL-CIO Executive Council declared the "complete readiness of the AFL-CIO to receive, consider, debate and act upon any complaint, charge, proposal or program—novel or ancient—if and when properly offered through the appropriate channels of the AFL-CIO constitution." That invitation was repeated in the Executive Council statement of March 12, 1968.

In the face of the clear and open channels for discussion and action presented to you by the AFL-CIO, the officers of the UAW have, by various subterfuges and pretexts, consistently evaded the opportunity and the obligation to bring their case before the democratic forums of the trade union movement.

It is significant to note that your ultimatum of March 2, 1968, came less than three months after an AFL-CIO Convention which expected and was fully prepared to discuss, in depth and at length and at your specific request, all of the alleged issues raised by the UAW in its propaganda campaign of the preceding two years. At the last minute, you found one more excuse to refuse to confront your equals, many of whom know firsthand the actual facts about the matters which you have so flagrantly misrepresented to your own members and in the public press. If those issues were vital and urgent enough to warrant a subsequent demand for a Special Convention and the secession of the UAW from the main body of the trade union movement, surely they were vital and urgent enough to warrant a day's recess in your talks with General Motors, prior to a deadline which you yourselves contrived.

I give you the credit of believing that you can not have been in any real doubt as to the inevitable response of the AFL-CIO to the threats and ultimatums contained in your subsequent communications. Those tactics, which your letter so blandly ignores, represented a transparent attempt to set up the grounds and excuses to justify to your members your predetermined objective of withdrawal from this trade union movement.

That objective, I am convinced, stemmed in turn from a condition for which the AFL-CIO has no remedy—your apparent unwillingness to live in constructive harmony within an organization in which the rights, the interests and the views of other unions and other personalities are given equal consideration with those of the UAW and its president.

Fraternally,

George Meany
President

Text of Auto Workers' Letter

In March of this year, the International Executive Board of the International Union UAW, requested of you and the Executive Council of the AFL-CIO a special convention to permit the discussion and action on a number of proposals that the UAW made, which in our opinion, would revitalize and make more effective the American labor movement. We made this request because critical negotiations in the automobile industry did not permit the leadership of the UAW to attend the 1967 Convention of the AFL-CIO.

It is regrettable that on March 12, 1968, the AFL-CIO Executive Council refused our request for a special convention by attaching conditions to a special convention that no honorable organization could possibly accept.

The nearly 3,000 delegates to the 21st UAW Constitutional Convention, meeting in Atlantic City, May 4 through 10, 1968, adopted a resolution urging the AFL-CIO Executive Council to reconsider its decision of March 12, and schedule unconditionally a special AFL-CIO convention to be held no later than December 1968.

We deeply regret that you and the Executive Council of the AFL-CIO reacted negatively to the request of the delegates to the UAW's Constitutional Convention. Instead of convening a special convention as the delegates had requested so that the program and policy recommendations of the UAW to strengthen the labor movement could have been tested by free and open democratic discussion and debate, you chose to suspend the UAW under a provision of the Constitution never invoked previously in the more than 60 years history of the American labor movement.

Your action, as you know, has compelled severance of the relationship which the UAW local unions had with numerous state and local bodies and was unprecedented and has created very serious problems in many important local and state councils. UAW local unions were active and were prepared to continue to be active as a part of the state and local councils in the common effort to meet the critical challenge of the 1968 election but your unprecedented action now makes this impossible.

In the light of your action and in order to avoid any confusion or misunderstanding as to the status of the UAW with the AFL-CIO, you are hereby advised that the UAW formally disaffiliates from the AFL-CIO.

By order of the International Executive Board:

Walter P. Reuther, president
Emil Mazey, secretary-treasurer
Leonard Woodcock, vice president
Pat Greathouse, vice president

Suspended UAW 'Formally' Disaffiliates from AFL-CIO

evitable response of the AFL-CIO to the threats and ultimatums" that represented "a transparent attempt to set up the grounds and excuses to justify to your members" the objective of withdrawing from the federation.

"That objective," Meany added, "stemmed in turn from a condition for which the AFL-CIO has no remedy—your apparent unwillingness to live in constructive harmony within an organization in which the rights, the interests and the views of other unions and other personalities are given equal consideration with those of the UAW and its president."

UAW Leaders Sign Letter

The UAW letter, signed by Walter P. Reuther, president; Emil Mazey, secretary-treasurer; Leonard Woodcock and Pat Greathouse, vice presidents; said that instead of convening a special convention of the AFL-CIO, as requested by the May 1968 UAW convention, "you chose to suspend the UAW under a provision of the Constitution never invoked previously in the more than 60 years history of the American labor movement." The letter further termed the action of the AFL-CIO Executive Council "unprecedented."

Meany pointed out that the UAW letter failed to mention that the UAW convention resolution on a special convention "also contained a threat to withhold per capita tax unless your demands were granted," and that the convention request was tied to a "threat of withdrawal" from the federation.

As to the suspension for nonpayment of per capita, Meany declared:

"Within my memory, no affiliated organization, no matter how large and boastful of its financial resources, has ever succeeded in coercing a decision of this federation by a threat, an ultimatum, or by that favorite ploy of the banker's mentality: raw financial pressure."

The federation president emphasized, "I do not propose to preside over any departure from that precedent, so vital to the equal rights of all affiliates."

The letter noted that there are no precedents in the trade union movement for one affiliate engaging in a "running, long-distance barrage of criticism and demands upon its national center" while refusing to appear to press its complaints and justify its charges; for refusing for two years to appear at convention, General Board and Executive Council meetings and then suddenly demanding a special convention coupled with a threat to disaffiliate.

Meany's letter reviewed the various opportunities made available to the UAW to state its case, noting that the letter of "formal" disaffiliation was "sadly incomplete."

He cited Reuther's own recorded comments on abiding by majority rule in the trade union movement, and documented the long-held position of the trade union movement that threats to withhold per capita to secure a certain decision can only be met by suspension of the affiliate.

Meany declared that the UAW letter inferred that the union has been refused an opportunity to air its views. Noting that this was "ironic," the federation president said:

"In the face of the clear and open channels for discussion and action presented to you by the AFL-CIO, the officers of the UAW have, by various subterfuges and pretexts, consistently evaded the opportunity and the obli-ation to bring their case before the democratic forums of the trade union movement."

The AFL-CIO Executive Council on May 13, 1968, called for suspension of the UAW under the automatic provisions of the AFL-CIO Constitution in light of the union's decision to default on its per capita payments, termed by the council "an act tantamount to withdrawal."

When the deadline for the payments passed a few days later, Meany suspended the union in terms of the council's action, and notification was sent to all departments, state and local central bodies that the UAW was no longer permitted to continue membership in these bodies because of its suspension.

A DOCTOR OF LAWS degree is conferred on Pres. A. Philip Randolph, center, of the Sleeping Car Porters by Dr. Luna I. Mishoe, president of Delaware State College. Randolph was cited for more than 40 years of service in labor and in human relations during the presentation of the honorary degree. Dr. Nathaniel Tillman, academic dean of Delaware State, watches the ceremony in Randolph's New York City office.

Joseph Rakowicz Dies, AFL-CIO Organizer

Chicago — Field Rep. Joseph Rakowicz of AFL-CIO Region 14 died June 29 after a short illness. He was 47.

Long active with the Insurance Workers, Rakowicz had been president of the Jersey City, N.J., local in the late 1940s. He joined the CIO staff in 1950 and directed a number of organizing campaigns for the Insurance Workers in New Jersey, Pennsylvania, New England, Delaware and Michigan.

After the AFL-CIO merger he was transferred to the Region 14 staff and continued to work in organizing campaigns in the insurance, bakery and confectionery and graphic arts fields.

He is survived by his wife and two daughters. Burial was July 3 in Newark, N.J.

White Collar Staffs Join Textile Union

White collar workers in five plants of the American Viscose division of FMC Corp. have chosen the Textile Workers Union of America as their bargaining agent.

The 180 workers involved are employed as laboratory technicians, analysts and testers in FMC plants located in Lewistown and Meadville, Pa., Nitro and Parkersburg, W.Va., and Front Royal, Va.

TWUA also represents approximately 8,300 production workers in the five plants. The white collar vote was 87 to 79 for union representation.

The Coalition's Grip

AS THE SECOND SESSION of the 90th Congress heads into the final weeks before the national political conventions, the unyielding grip of the conservative coalition is continuing to frustrate the nation's needs and desires.

Combining subterfuge and evasion with the full range of meaningless, cliche attacks on basic programs, the coalition is proving out the "hopeless" tag applied by some critics at the beginning of the session.

When the 90th Congress completed its first session in 1967, the AFL-CIO said neither it nor the American people could "find much satisfaction in the record." But, it added, "we cannot yet afford to write it off as hopeless."

The final record of the second session is still incomplete, but the coalition has continued its all-out attempt to destroy the major new programs enacted by the historic 89th Congress.

It has hacked away at bills to finance these programs; it has moved deviously—in non-recorded votes and in non-publicized committee maneuvers—to undercut and emasculate programs of long standing.

It has used every weapon at its command to say "no" to the smallest effort to enact liberal and progressive legislation to begin to cope with the wide range of problems confronting the country.

THE COALITION is composed of conservative southern Democrats and their conservative brethren in the Republican Party. This alliance has been a major and a controlling factor for the past three decades. Where it could not effectively block legislation, it used its strength to water it down to, in some cases, meaningless and weak statutes.

In 1964 the back of the coalition was broken as 51 new liberal congressmen came into office in the Johnson landslide defeat of Barry Goldwater. The 1964 elections produced the memorable 89th Congress, probably the most outstanding Congress in modern history.

But in November 1966, with a loss of 41 liberal seats, the coalition regained control and the 90th Congress has been, by and large a victim of that control.

An indication of the coalition's grip, especially in the House, is the fact that in 1965 and 1966, the conservatives won only 25 and 32 percent of important rollcalls; in 1967 the coalition won 73 percent of the rollcalls.

THE 1968 ELECTIONS hold the key to the question of where the conservative coalition goes from here. While it has stalled and slashed at programs in the 90th Congress it has not been able to undo completely the work of the 89th Congress. But there would be no such restraints if the coalition were to increase its strength in the 91st Congress.

That's what the congressional election campaigns are all about —to prevent conservative gains that would further endanger progressive programs, and to elect a liberal majority that would begin again where the 89th Congress left off.

Nuts-and-Bolts Chores:

Ohio Shows How to Reverse Threat of Conservative Trend

The following appeared in the June 24, 1968, issue of Memo from COPE, publication of the AFL-CIO Committee on Political Education.

Item: Right-winger Max Rafferty rides sin, sex and street violence to victory over moderate Sen. Thomas Kuchel in the GOP primary in California. If he moves into the Senate, he'll complete the sweep of California's three principal offices by ultra-conservative Republicans, joining Gov. Ronald Reagan and Sen. George Murphy.

Item: Voters in Maryland overwhelmingly reject a proposed new state constitution which had strong bipartisan and almost unanimous civic-leader support. They heed the voices of conservatives and prefer to stick with a document unchanged for more than a century.

Item: George Wallace petitions go way over the top in the states, cinching a place for his name on the presidential ballot.

Item: Barry Goldwater hits the comeback trail and is favored to return to the U.S. Senate.

Item: A conservative romps to victory in the Texas gubernatorial primary over young, articulate liberal Don Yarborough.

Item: Sen. Everett Dirksen is tabbed to head the GOP Platform Committee, guaranteeing a platform soaked in conservative pieties.

Item: The Senate panics over what began as a straight-forward anti-crime measure and adds provisions undercutting the Supreme Court that the John Birch Society and other right-wing outfits haven't been able to accomplish in years of trying.

Item: Many liberal candidates from all parts of the country are fearful they face a rocky road to election.

All these—and more like them—prompt the question: Is there a conservative trend in 1968?

Maybe yes, maybe no.

Voters are clearly worried. They are worried about Viet Nam, about crime, about riots, about taxes and the cost of living, about a whole range of problems.

And when voters are worried, the "ins" usually suffer.

But this is a curious year, and a confusing one, more than most, and there are signposts that say the road could lead to a liberal victory in 1968:

- In California, Rafferty—despite his primary victory—is no shoo-in for election. His Democratic opponent, former State Comptroller Alan Cranston, is popular in the state, and Rafferty might be just too much for many Democrats who voted for Reagan in 1966, and for many Republicans as well.
- The latest Gallup Poll shows Vice Pres. Humphrey a trial-heat winner over either Richard Nixon or Nelson Rockefeller if the presidential election were held now. Some of his strength must translate to senatorial and congressional liberal candidates.
- In Florida, though by the narrowest of margins, moderate former Gov. Leroy Collins wins the Democratic senatorial nomination over an opponent whose campaign tries to exploit racial divisions.
- In Idaho, the right-wing smear of Sen. Frank Church wilts under the heat of exposure to the public eye.
- In Ohio, in a clear liberal vs. conservative test, John Gilligan dislodges fixture Frank Lausche in the Democratic senatorial primary.

The Ohio victory was of particular significance in terms of the question about a conservative trend. Lausche had been a champion vote-getter, with a solid base among Democrats despite his conservative voting record. He was even more popular among Republicans, and many apparently crossed over to vote for him in the primary. He was supported by all but one major Ohio newspaper. Yet, he lost.

What created the switch was hard, intelligent work by the state COPE and thousands of union members. They got members registered, informed them on issues and the candidates, got out the vote on election day. They did the nuts-and-bolts jobs that win elections.

What was done in Ohio for Gilligan can be done elsewhere for other liberal candidates. What it takes is effort, and with the right effort, if the answer to the question is "Yes, there is a conservative trend," there is time to turn it around by Nov. 5.

Conservation Crisis:

Growing Congestion Choking Great Outdoors of America

The following is excerpted from "Conservation in Crisis" by Marvin Zeldin which appeared in the June 1968 AFL-CIO American Federationist.

THE POWER TO ALTER our environment is seemingly limitless. Most of the major rivers and lakes are already befouled with the effluents of industrial technology. Too many cities are already man-made wildernesses with their crowds and traffic jams and asphalt and noise and filthy air. Now we are in danger of loving to death the once remote outdoor recreation areas.

What we have already done to the cities and what we might be doing to the great outdoors are both elements of the environmental crisis. And whether we stay home in the cities, where seven out of ten people live, or seek out the closeness and enjoyment of the nation's magnificent natural heritage of lakes and rivers, beaches, mountains, forests and valleys, we cannot escape the crisis.

Each year there are more and more of us, with more leisure time, more money and more cars and boats, turning to the outdoors for recreation and recharging of spiritual batteries. We search out the national parks and forests, state parks and private resorts for a few days or weeks.

Estimates of increased use of major outdoor recreation areas by the year 2000 range from 5 to 40 times more than in 1960, depending on which expert you read. So if you have already experienced tent-to-tent camping, or pole-to-pole fishing, and if you've already found parking lots and campsites filled, imagine the future. Sec. of Interior Stewart Udall did. He looked ahead to the middle of the next century and predicted:

"For every person who now hopes to camp in the summertime on the floor of Yosemite Valley, there will be nine. For every present hiker down the John Muir Trail along the spine of the Sierras, there will be nine. For every tin can and bottle and carton that now litters park and wilderness trails, there will be nine. For every hundred people on the beach at Drakes Bay, there will be at least 900 and conceivably several times that many."

Marion Clawson of Resources for the Future puts it this way: "The human foot, if there are enough of them, can as effectively destroy important qualities of the landscape as can the bulldozer."

Even short of outright destruction by overcrowding and overusing natural areas, there is also the danger of reducing the level of enjoyment we receive from our visits. Waiting in line in a visitor center packed as tightly as a bus depot the day before Christmas won't add to your experience when you finally get into Carlsbad Caverns.

Another problem is money. Despite the substantial progress of the 1960s in setting aside new national parks and seashores and state parks, the major national program which finances acquisition of new outdoor recreation areas is in trouble.

Congress took a great step forward in 1965 when it created the Land and Water Conservation Fund to finance the acquisition of land and water areas for outdoor recreation by the federal and state governments. But the fund has been woefully inadequate.

While the cost of needed federal and state land acquisitions for outdoor recreation in the next 10 years is estimated at $3.6 billion, the fund will provide only $1.9 billion at the current rate of financing.

LAND PRICES THROUGHOUT the nation are increasing at a rate of from 5 to 10 percent a year. The price of choice lands for public recreation is rising even faster.

The shortage of money for acquiring and thus setting aside for public enjoyment more of the nation's priceless natural heritage is just one demonstration of the dilemma facing Congress. It commendably authorized national programs to put an end to air pollution, to clean up and prevent further pollution of the rivers and lakes, to help local government acquire needed open space. In so doing, Congress "authorizes" the necessarily large amounts of money these programs require. But when the time comes to appropriate the money to actually carry out the programs, the funds are not available in the amounts previously considered essential.

But money alone is not the answer to the outdoor recreation needs of the American people. We also need to understand that conservation is no longer only a problem of the countryside, of remote rural areas. It's a critical problem for the urban-suburban complexes in which most Americans live.

Since the end of World War II, millions of acres of once open spaces in and around the cities have been turned into housing subdivisions, shopping centers, highways, airports, industrial sites and utility rights of way. Unfortunately, most of this development has come with hardly a thought for the quality of the environment—with scarcely any attempt to build conservation values, including outdoor recreation, into the planning.

So while we need strong federal programs, with adequate financing from Congress if we are to hold on to a vanishing natural heritage. we also need concerned citizens and their organizations involved and fighting on the state and local levels. For that's where the ultimate action is. With few exceptions, land use control rests with local government. Local government makes the zoning decisions.

Impact on Unemployment:

Jobs Program Pledges Seen Well Ahead of September Goal

ORGANIZED LABOR'S representative to the National Alliance of Businessmen—a government-industry drive to train and employ 500,000 hard-core jobless—said that he is confident the effort will make a significant impact on hard-core unemployment.

John W. Livingston, assigned early this year by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany as labor's liaison to the NAB, reported that job pledges already exceed the 100,000 goal set for September of this year.

But the real test of the program's success will come within the next several months, he noted, by which time "we will have a pretty good idea of . . . the percentage of people who stay on the job." Livingston appeared on the AFL-CIO produced public affairs interview, Labor News Conference, broadcast Tuesdays at 7:35 p.m., EDT, on the Mutual Radio Network.

Livingston explained that the NAB's program has three major phases: "finding the job, finding the man, putting the man and the job together and starting him in training." The big difference between this effort and others tried in the past is that the recruits are on the private employer's payroll from the outset, he noted.

"When they finish their training . . . they will know they will have a job," he said.

Livingston stressed that everyone involved has to recognize that the hard-core unemployed will have special on-the-job problems. He said that supervisors and workers already on the job will be trained and prepared to accept the newcomers and to try to help them overcome those problems.

"The interest they take in this hard-core unemployed person will have most to do with the percentage who stay," he predicted.

He said that no special concessions are made to the recruits; "We want these people treated just the same as any other person," so that they will sooner become a part of the regular work force and "feel that the job means something to them."

Reporters questioning him were James Welsh of the Washington Evening Star and Stanley Levey, labor correspondent for the Scripps-Howard Newspapers.

By Press Associates, Inc.

NOW THAT THE 10 PERCENT surtax has been passed the reverse side of the coin, the $6 billion cut in the federal budget for the year beginning Jan. 1, is the subject of some intense speculation.

The President fought hard against the budget reduction, but the conservatives who control the purse-strings of Congress insisted that it must be tied in with the surtax.

The spending cuts spelled out in the tax bill are far more sweeping than is generally realized. It breaks down this way:

- For the fiscal year 1969, which began July 1, the President's budget figure is cut $6 billion, from $186.1 billion to $180.6 billion.
- The President, in submitting his 1970 budget in January, is required to return $8 billion of funds previously appropriated by Congress but still unspent.
- A ceiling on new obligational authority for fiscal 1969 is set at $191.7 billion. It was $201.7 billion.
- Exempted from the ceiling are appropriations for the Viet Nam war, interest on the federal debt, veterans' benefits and social security payments.
- Only three out of every four full-time vacancies that occur in federal jobs may be filled until the number of federal employes is dropped to the June 30, 1966, level of 2,366,000.

Focal point of current attention is the $6 billion cut in the current fiscal year's budget.

Where will the ax fall? Will it be a meat ax? What will happen to the great social programs that have brought new hope and a meaning in life for millions of people?

Budget Dir. Charles J. Zwick has sent out some broad guidelines to every federal government department and agency directing them to restrict contracts and other commitments so they will be able to make the necessary spending cuts.

IN HIS LETTER, Zwick made this point:

"Congress has the first opportunity to reduce the budget through its traditional appropriation process.

"Should Congress fail to reduce the January budget by the full $6 billion in expenditures, the law requires the President to make up the difference."

Congress wants desperately to adjourn sine die before the Republican convention which starts Aug. 5. With its large backlog of legislation plus appropriations bills it is questionable whether Congress will be able to buckle down to the task of budget cutting.

Even more pertinent is the question of whether Congress itself even wants to start swinging the ax during a presidential election year.

Currently, the House Appropriations Committee seems to have its hands full hacking away at new obligational authority of the President which calls for the $10 billion cut.

The President is proud of the vast progress in social welfare legislation passed during his period in the White House. It is not likely that he will starve these programs for lack of funds even if he can't nourish them as much as he would like.

The expectation is, then, that the war on poverty, housing, urban development, education and comparable programs will not feel the budget-cutting knife to any serious degree.

Although the President does not want to take such action, he could get about one-half of his $6 billion in the military spending, concentrated largely in non-Viet Nam areas. Space expenditures, foreign aid and farm programs may well be trimmed. There could be some delays in the application of education and health programs.

Few people really understand the complexities of federal budget-making (and budget cutting) but one thing seems rather clear: it will be handled far differently by the Administration than the 90th Congress would handle it.

A SIGNIFICANT IMPACT on hard-core unemployment by the National Alliance of Businessmen program was predicted on Labor News Conference by John W. Livingston, center, labor's liaison to the NAB. Questioning him were James Welsh of the Washington Evening Star, left, and Stanley Levey of the Scripps-Howard Newspapers. The AFL-CIO produced public service interview is broadcast Tuesdays at 7:35 p.m., EDT, on the Mutual Radio Network.

By Interlocking Ties:

Control of Economy Lapsing to Big Banks

America's largest banks—through investment practices and interlocking directorships—are increasingly gaining control of "vital elements of the nation's economy," a House Banking subcommittee has warned.

The warning came in a report on a subcommittee staff study which detailed hundreds of cases in which banks play the role of "middlemen" through stockholdings and directorships in competing businesses.

"This trend," the report said, "is shifting economic power back to a small group, repeating in a somewhat different manner the pattern of trusts of the late 19th and early 20th centuries."

The study raised questions of conflict of interest and restraint of trade in citing numerous instances in which a bank has interlocking directorates with a firm, holds much of its stock and manages its trust funds.

Rep. Wright Patman (D-Tex.), chairman of both the subcommittee and the full Banking committee, called upon Atty. Gen. Ramsey Clark "to take immediate action" under the anti-trust laws in the light of the study's findings.

Noting that the Justice Dept. recently acted to secure the elimination of interlocking directorates among 16 different corporations, Patman said this abuse was "minuscule" compared to the situation involving banks.

The study found that 49 banks in 10 major cities hold more than 54 percent of all bank assets in the nation and 5 percent or more of the common stock in 147 of the nation's 500 largest industrial corporations.

Because of diffusion of stock ownership, the study pointed out, 5 percent ownership of stock is enough to exercise control—or at least policy domination—in many corporations.

Adding to the banks' potential for industrial control, the study said, was a finding of 768 interlocking directorates between the 49 banks and 286 of the 500 biggest corporations.

The study cited numerous cases in which the same bank holds large blocks of stock and shares directors with two or more corporations which are supposedly competitive.

Nine major banks and the American Telephone & Telegraph Co. hold 12 interlocking seats on one another's board of directors. There are ten such interlocking links between seven banks and the Chrysler Corp.

Cleveland Trust Co. holds large blocks of stock in six competing machine tool firms, has directors on the boards of four of them; holds stock and interlocks in three competing iron ore companies and two Cleveland department stores.

The study said that of the $1 trillion in assets held by all institutional investors in the country, nearly 60 percent, or $607 billion, is held by commercial banks. Of the $607 billion, it said $250 billion is in bank trust departments.

Among holdings under trust, the study noted, half are in private trusts, 30 percent in employes' pension and welfare funds and the remainder in agency accounts.

It noted that while these securities do not belong to the banks, as trustees they often have sole or partial voting rights in the great majority of common stocks thus held.

The study listed a number of suggestions for remedial legislative or executive action to cope with the problems uncovered. The proposals included.

Full disclosure of a bank's trust fund holdings; prohibition on the holding of more than 10 percent of any firm's stock by a single bank trust department; disclosure of proxy voting by trust departments; and a ban on an officer of any commercial bank sitting on the board of a company in which his bank holds more than 5 percent of that firm's stock.

A SCOREKEEPER'S BOOTH takes form at a San Diego youth league baseball park as unionist volunteers put in a weekend of work on the project. From left are Sol Johnson, business agent of Laborers Local 89 and president of the Pony League; carpenter Bill Stone and general contractor John Reed, who has held a card in Carpenters Local 1571 more than 30 years.

San Diego's Face Lifted By Weekend Volunteers

San Diego—Just about every Saturday and some Sundays too, the rapping of hammers, the buzzing of power saws, the rumbling of a tractor echo over a wide area of the poverty section of San Diego.

The men behind the sounds of this work are volunteers from local building trades unions. They are bricklayers, carpenters, electricians, laborers, plumbers and others who donate their time to improve community facilities for underprivileged children.

Several projects are usually underway simultaneously—like a scorekeeper's booth at a southeast San Diego baseball field, or a few blocks away, a building that is to be converted into a multi-purpose youth center.

Volunteers for the projects are being lined up through a clearing house set up by the Carpenters District Council in San Diego.

The weekend volunteers try to help wherever they can. They are ready to lend their skills whenever somebody comes up with plans for a badly needed improvement on a playground or recreation center.

Much of their work is channeled into a federally-funded agency which operates five community centers that provide entertainment, job placement services and self-improvement courses.

The unionists also are ready to swing into action to convert a number of vacant lots into "vest pocket" parks just as soon as the agency can get permission from the landowners for the use of the properties.

What with only a two-day "work week" for the volunteer projects, Charles Popejoy of the Carpenters is pressing the recruitment of more volunteers.

"We've completed work on the Ocean View center," he said, "but we've got four other projects going in southeast San Diego now."

NLRB Orders Firm to Grant Dues Checkoff

The National Labor Relations Board has ordered a Virginia power tool firm to give the Steelworkers a dues checkoff in a contract the union has been trying to get for five years from H. K. Porter, Inc., Danville.

The order, involving powers the NLRB has rarely if ever used, directs management to bargain collectively with the union, to embody any understanding that may be reached into a signed contract, and to include a clause permitting members to have their union dues deducted from their pay at their own request.

Two previous NLRB orders in 1964 and 1965, enforced by two U.S. courts of appeals in 1964 and 1966, failed to produce good-faith bargaining by management of the Danville plant. Two NLRB trial examiners found management bargained in bad faith, they reported to the board.

This time the board issued an order interpreting a ruling by the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia. In its ruling the court noted that on two separate occasions the Porter firm violated federal labor law by not making a good-faith effort to reach agreement with the union.

Pointing out that the company conceded it had no business reason for refusing to grant a checkoff, the court said the board could have ordered a checkoff clause "in return for a reasonable concession by the union" or even that "in an appropriate case the board could simply order the company to grant a checkoff."

The NLRB concluded that under the circumstances a checkoff order is warranted.

ABC Bakers Win 4 Plants In California

The American Bakery & Confectionery Workers won representation rights in four California biscuit plants previously represented by the expelled Bakery & Confectionery Workers.

The victories came in National Labor Relations Board elections conducted June 21 and June 28 among workers at the Burry Biscuit Co. in Buena Park, Pacific Cracker Co. in Santa Fe Heights, Safeway Biscuit in Van Nuys, and the Weston Biscuit Co. in Burbank.

Of 575 eligible voters, 516 participated in the elections in which ABC Local 66 received 280 votes against 225 for the B&C. The election campaigns were hard fought and the old bakers' organization had the support of local Teamsters.

The California elections were the fifth contest between the ABC and the B&C since the latter affiliated with the Teamsters. ABC won all five to add 870 new members.

Workers in the California plants had the backing and active support of the AFL-CIO regional office in Los Angeles. AFL-CIO Field Rep. Ruben Diaz worked with the ABC staff in the effort.

Changing Society, Technology Seen Edging Professionals To Unions

Chicago—White collar scientific-technical employes and professionals can be organized and will turn to collective bargaining to solve their work problems.

That was the main conclusion of a one-day conference on "Collective Bargaining and Professional Responsibility" here. The parley was sponsored by the AFL-CIO Scientific, Professional & Cultural Employes Council and conducted by the University of Illinois Institute of Labor and Industrial Relations.

Here are some of the reasons expressed at the conference for the belief that higher level white collar workers will go union:

- The nature of work is changing. Automation and computerization are eating away at the decision-making powers of these workers and are reducing the prestige value of their jobs.
- Upper-level management is using the same basic techniques to control white collar workers and enlist their loyalty that were used on blue collar workers. Those techniques or strategies pushed manual workers into unions and will nudge white collar workers along the same path.
- While the United States is behind Western Europe in organizing professionals, conditions are ripening for unionization here.
- The bargaining process for professionals and high level white collar workers won't change from what it's been for manual workers, but the items on the bargaining table will be different.

The 40 representatives of unions and professional organizations agreed that there are two kinds of professional workers—"badge" and "non-badge."

Badge professionals are doctors, lawyers, teachers, engineers, etc. who need degrees and special licenses to practice their professions. Non-badge professionals—those in the arts, airline pilots, journalists, etc.—have a combination of education and work background which sets them apart from other workers.

Most non-badge professionals are unionized. In the case of musicians and pilots, the unions have strengthened the degree of professionalism of their members, it was noted.

Prof. Bernard Karsh of the Institute of Labor & Industrial Relations said the gap between the white collar middle managers and top-level management in large public and private organizations is widening. It's getting harder to become head of a department or the entire organization.

"When these middle managers realize they will probably never get to the top, they'll turn to unions," Karsh predicted.

Prof. Everett Kassalow of the University of Wisconsin said professionals in Europe and the United States are increasing in numbers at a faster pace than the rest of the work force. He said that as their numbers increase, the uniqueness of the individual and his talents will decrease.

Kassalow said that the most dramatic growth in unionization of professionals in Europe has been among public employes. He noted that the same trend is starting here.

Jack Golodner, executive director of the Scientific, Cultural & Professional Employes Council, said the council is prepared to advise professionals on how to organize and work with other organizations in areas of mutual concern.

The message of the conference to professionals was clear: Prestige or status may separate you from other workers, but it can't put more food on the table.

HOWARD JENKINS, JR., Republican and first Negro to serve as a National Labor Relations Board member, has been named to a second five-year term by Pres. Johnson. Senate confirmation of Jenkins would give the board a continuity of leadership never before achieved, the agency said, with four of the five members having served 5 years or more.

San Juan Unionists Get Dystrophy Posts

San Juan, P.R.—A new Puerto Rico chapter of the Muscular Dystrophy Associations of America has elected Benigno Mouliert of the Retail Clerks as treasurer and Pausides Casablanca of the Letter Carriers as secretary. Pres. Hipolito Marcano of the Puerto Rico AFL-CIO was named a member of the citizens' advisory committee.

Sessions Held For Training Of Organizers

The AFL-CIO Dept. of Organization has completed the 1968 round of training conferences for the federation's national organizing staff in an effort to provide the specialized training called for at the 1967 AFL-CIO convention, the department announced.

The first of five meetings was held in February in Atlanta, and others in Delano, Calif., Oklahoma City, Elkhart, Ind., and New Haven, Conn. Such "refresher" conferences are held every two years with the staff divided geographically to provide an average attendance of 35, Organization Dir. William L. Kircher said.

The conferences, conducted by Kircher and members of the headquarters staff, dealt with methods of communication, building effective in-plant organizing committees, blueprinting campaigns, use of National Labor Relations Board facilities, the role of central bodies, coordinated programs and allied topics.

Kircher called the meetings steps in the direction of assembling the "most effective organizing staff" possible. He said they incorporated suggestions made by union officers and organizing directors at the AFL-CIO organizing conference last December in Bal Harbour, Fla.

That convention conference, Kircher noted, endorsed the aim described by Chairman Paul Hall of the Executive Council's Committee on Organizing: assuring excellence in organizing through specialized training.

STRIKE SLOGANS appeal for a boycott of Kayser-Roth products as pickets of the Textile Workers Union of America picket a struck company plant in Dayton, Tenn. More than 500 members of the TWUA walked out against Kayser-Roth in May. The company was recently acquired by the Penn Central conglomerate.

Profit Power Is Cited In Textile-Rail Merger

New York—The announced acquisition of Kayser-Roth Corp. by Penn Central Co. "points up the strength and economic viability of the textile industry," Pres. William Pollock of the Textile Workers Union of America declared here.

Pollock commented after Stuart Saunders, board chairman of Penn Central, announced that the acquisition "is calculated to stabilize earnings" and "strengthen the entire company, including its transportation operations."

"The very fact that a giant conglomerate such as Penn finds Kayser-Roth a valuable acquisition," Pollock said, "is the best possible proof of our contention that the textile industry is in every sense modern, efficient and profitable."

"The industry cannot hide behind bogus 'regional traditions' or plead its inability to meet the standards of wages and industrial relations practices enjoyed by workers in most other industries," he added.

Pollock noted that TWUA has "a special interest" in the merger because some 500 of its members at a Kayser-Roth hosiery plant in Dayton, Tenn., are currently striking for a first-time contract.

The union is conducting a nationwide "don't buy" drive against Kayser-Roth's hosiery products, which include Supp-Hose, Schiapereli, Kayser and other brands of women's hosiery; Esquire socks; Fruit of the Loom and Mojud children's products, and Jiffies and Mercury slippers.

Pollock pointed out that Kayser-Roth, which employs 26,500 workers, recently hit annual sales of more than $390 million and racked up after-tax profits of more than $12 million.

At the same time, he continued, only 17 of its 117 plants are organized and wages at the Dayton plant "are barely above the federal minimum of $1.60 an hour."

Unemployment Climbs, Youths Flood Job Pool

lessness among 20-24-year-olds increased by 300,000."

The seasonally adjusted jobless rate for teenagers rose from 12.6 percent in May to 13.6 percent in June. For the 20-24-year-old group, the rate rose from 5.3 to 6.5 percent. The report said most of the rise in the teenage rate occurred among boys while the rise in the 20-24-year-old group was sharpest among girls.

Pinpointing the failure of jobs to materials, the Labor Dept. said the industries which normally provide work for young workers in June—agriculture, construction and retail trade—showed less than their usual June job pickups. The unemployment rates in all three of these industries rose over the month, the report added.

The job picture for June usually hangs on the fate of young job-seekers.

For adult and fulltime workers, unemployment showed little change over the month, the report said. The jobless rate for all workers 25 and over held steady at 2.2 percent. For married men—the key breadwinner group—the unemployment rate was 1.7 percent in June, up a shade from May's 1.6 percent but below the 1.9 percent of a year earlier.

For Negroes, the jobless rate worsened from 6.4 percent in May to 7.2 percent in June, reflecting the rise in unemployment among non-white youth.

However, a separate report on the job situation in urban poverty neighborhoods showed the jobless rate dropping from 6.5 percent to 5.7 percent between the second quarters of 1967 and 1968. Unemployment in the poverty areas of the nation's 100 largest cities was down by nearly 65,000 over the year, according to the Labor Dept.'s special report.

The improvement in the poverty areas was attributed to general economic advances, job gains in factory and blue-collar and service occupations and the expansion in private and governmental programs aimed at hard-core unemployed.

In the poverty areas, the white jobless rate fell from 5.3 to 4.6 percent over the year, while the Negro rate declined from 8.1 to 7.3 percent.

The Labor Dept.'s urban poverty report counted about 375,000 workers as unemployed in the second quarter of 1968.

On the employment side of the regular monthly jobs report, the Labor Dept. put total employment at 77.3 million in June, up 1.3 million from May. A 500,000 rise in agricultural jobs accounted for a large part of the overall job gain.

Non-farm payroll employment rose by 82,000 over the month to 67.9 million, seasonally adjusted, the report said. Gains of about 40,000 each were registered in manufacturing, transportation and public utilities, services and state and local government.

These job gains were offset in part by a seasonally adjusted drop of 80,000 in construction, the report added, as the tightness of mortgage money and weakness in housing starts contributed to the decline in construction jobs.

On hours, the report said the factory workweek held steady at 40.9 hours, seasonally adjusted. For all workers on private payrolls, the workweek rose slightly to 37.9 hours.

On earnings, a 1-cent increase in average hourly earnings of all workers on private payrolls, along with a 0.4 hour rise, boosted weekly earnings to $108.20, up $1.51 over May.

Factory Workers Average $3 an Hour

The average hourly pay of the factory production worker has hit $3 for the first time, the Labor Dept. announced.

The milestone was revealed in the June report on the employment situation, which showed the factory worker's hourly wage moving up by 1 cent since May to push his weekly earnings to $123.30.

The Labor Dept. said it took 12 years for the average to go from $2 to $3 an hour. The $2 an hour point was passed in November 1956.

IBEW Contracts Ratified:

Anaconda Accords End Copper Tieup

Chicago—New and improved contracts with Anaconda Wire & Cable Co. were ratified by members of four local unions of the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers to wind up strikes of 60,000 copper workers nearly one year after they started.

Picket lines were disbanded and 1,700 IBEW members reported for work July 8, at wire plants in Marion, Ind., Muskegon, Mich., Sycamore, Ill., and Watkinsville, Ga.

The Marion walkout started July 15, 1967. The other plants were struck when their contracts expired on subsequent dates. All were involved in a nationwide strike of 26 unions coordinated by the AFL-CIO and its Industrial Union Dept. against 11 copper firms.

Chairman Michael D. Lucas of IBEW's joint negotiating committee credited worker solidarity for winning major strike objectives in 48-month agreements at the four plants. These included wage increases of 45-90 cents an hour, doubled pension benefit payments, uniform starting rates for male and female employes, and contract expiration dates with a spread of no more than 90 days.

Lucas said Anaconda agreed to reimburse the locals for employe insurance premiums they paid during the long strike—a total of more than $300,000.

He listed these other improvements:

Pension payments for future retirees will be raised from $2.50 a month per year of service, with a top of $87.50 a month, to $5 a month times years of service with no limitation on length of service—formerly 35 years. Benefits for past retirees will be raised $1 per month for each year of employment.

Disability pensioners will get the full $5 benefit with a minimum of $100 a month, and no offset for social security benefits formerly deducted from retirement and workmen's compensation payments.

The spouse of an employe who dies before retirement will get a 50 percent pension benefit for life if the employe had 10 years of service and was 55 or older.

For the Muskegon plant, the employer agreed to a "75-80" pension in the event of permanent plant closing in the future. The plan provides a full $5 benefit if age and service total 75 at age 55, or 80 at any age.

Management agreed to triple company contributions for hospital and surgical benefits—formerly 8-15 cents an hour—and assumed all payments formerly made by employes.

All those on strike during their normal vacation period will get full vacation pay for 1967-68. Future vacations will be increased by up to 80 hours' pay.

The settlement includes immediate wage hikes ranging from 15 to 50 cents an hour retroactive to contract expiration, plus increases of 15 to 25 cents a year from now and a final hike of 15 cents in the third contract year. Anaconda also agreed to withdraw a $1 million lawsuit against the local unions and to drop all charges against strike leaders, the IBEW said.

The nationwide strike against the nonferrous metals industry began last July 15 after four big firms made one inadequate "take it or leave it" offer to the unions. It ended when each of the participating unions ratified the pacts.

Wisconsin Labor Wins Farm Pay Safeguard

Madison, Wis.—New state labor regulations permitting growers to pay piecework rates to migrant farm workers were struck down here in a ruling the Wisconsin State AFL-CIO called a "tremendous victory" for some 12,000 workers.

Dane County Circuit Judge Norris Maloney ordered growers to pay cucumber pickers the state minimum hourly wage and to keep records of hours worked and wages paid to the migrants, most of them from Texas.

The court made its decision shortly before new regulations affecting field workers were scheduled to go into effect. The regulations were promulgated by the State Dept. of Industry, Labor & Human Relations over the objections of organized labor.

Judge Maloney ruled after testimony by State AFL-CIO Pres. John W. Schmitt and other witnesses that the department had exceeded its authority under the minimum wage law, and had no right to exempt growers from paying the statutory minimum wage and from record-keeping provisions.

The decision came in a suit brought by the pickers' union, Obreros Unidos (United Workers), with the aid of the state labor federation.

The challenged rule was that if 65 percent of the women and children pickers earn at least $1.39 an hour under a piecework rate schedule, the employer need not pay the minimum hourly rate—$1.10 to $1.30—to the other 35 percent of the pickers.

Chairman Joseph C. Fagan of the labor department, which drew up the proposed rules after a study last December, told the court that the piecework rule calls for payment of $2.32 per hundredweight for cucumbers picked in the field.

Fagan testified that the piecework rate based on size would permit some workers to earn as much as $3.30 an hour. Others might make as little as 30 cents an hour, he admitted under questioning by David Loeffler, attorney for the workers.

The proposed rules would aid in recruiting migrants to harvest the crops, Fagan asserted. Employers might refuse to hire families of pickers with children if the minimum wage was applied, he told the court.

In his ruling, Mahoney said the 65 percent rule would "deny a substantial percentage of the workers their constitutional right to equal protection" under a law "adopted expressly for their protection."

The law was not designed to help the state "balance the equities between the profits of the grower and the minimum welfare of the worker," the judge said. He said the state does, however, have a right to designate minimum rates for different kinds of work but not to exclude some workers from the classifications listed.

The duty of growers to keep records is spelled out clearly in the law, the judge noted.

House Slashes Assailed:

Senate Action Urged To Preserve Funds

Slashes made by the House in funds for vital social programs must be restored if Congress is to keep its promise to the nation's poor, the AFL-CIO told a Senate Appropriations subcommittee.

Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller particularly deplored "crippling" cuts made below the budget level in "badly needed" programs to aid education, the working poor and anti-poverty efforts.

He referred to a House-passed omnibus appropriations bill in which the President's request for $18.2 billion for the Labor Dept., Health, Education & Welfare Dept. and related agencies was sliced by $1.2 billion.

First, the appropriations in this area were badly mauled in a House subcommittee by a conservative coalition of Republicans and Southern Democrats.

Rollcalls Ducked

Then, on the floor, the same coalition upheld most of the committee's action while also successfully maneuvering to avoid record votes that would show how House members voted.

"In this bill, as it now stands," Biemiller said, "poor children and poor breadwinners are most severely hurt."

And, he added, the emasculation was done even though congressmen previously insisted that programs for the poor and the nation's children would not suffer "as a part of the tax increase-budget cut package recently adopted by Congress."

The most pressing need, Biemiller said, is for restoring cuts in federal aid to education appropriations, including a reduction of $135 million in a program that helps schools meet special educational needs of poor children.

He termed it "foolhardy" that the House eliminated all funds for the Bilingual Education Act, which Congress enacted only last year, to teach English to children who come from homes where another language is spoken.

Just $30 million was authorized for this new program, which would assist mainly poor children, and $5 million was budgeted. But, Biemiller noted, "even this meager sum was stricken, solely because it was a new program."

The Teachers Corps, whose appropriation was cut in half by the House, should be restored to its budget figure of $31.2 million, which already is nearly $15 million below what was previously authorized, Biemiller declared.

He warned that there will be an increase in "deliberate cheating of poverty-level wage earners" unless there is a restoration of House cuts in funds to administer and enforce the Fair Labor Standards Act.

Pointing out that the Labor Dept. estimates that one million workers are cheated annually by unscrupulous employers, he noted that the bill now provides for only 25 additional wage-hour investigators where an increase of 75 was budgeted.

Actually, at least 325 additional investigators are needed to meet the demands of a growing work force, Biemiller said.

The "deep inroads" made in HEW and Labor Dept. funds—if left standing—"will prove to be false economy," Biemiller stressed, because they occur in programs "to overcome great weakness in our economic and social system."

"In each of these programs," he added, "America made a promise to its young and its poor that it can evade today only at a far greater price tomorrow."

Poverty Funds Cut

In the related agencies budget, Biemiller urged "most emphatically" that a $300 million cut in funds for the Office of Economic Opportunity—the anti-poverty agency—be restored.

He termed the money vital to carrying on such programs as the Job Corps, Head Start and "enlistment of the poor in the community to join in finding ways" of meeting their economic needs, as well as their social and cultural goals.

In his statement, Biemiller also cautioned that "there will be no postponing the immediate labor-management crises that can arise" unless a $428,000 cut for the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service is restored.

The agency's caseload of strikes and averted strikes is 13 percent over last year and its workload in preventive mediation is also up more than 13 percent over 1967, Biemiller noted.

Gun-Control Hassle Dims Chance For Registration, Licensing Law

The House headed for floor action on the Administration's bill to ban mail order sales of rifles, shotguns and ammunition, but the prospects were dim for added provisions to require registration and licensing of firearms.

The House Rules Committee reported out the ban on mail order sales of long guns by a 10-5 vote. It would supplement a similar restriction on hand gun sales enacted last month. The committee voted to permit an open rule, which means House members will be able to offer amendments on the floor.

But Chairman Emanuel Celler (D-N.Y.) and Rep. William M. McCulloch (R-Ohio), ranking Republican on the House Judiciary committee announced they would oppose any move, either in the House or in a later House-Senate conference committee, to add the Administration's firearms' registration provision to the bill.

Both said they still favored that measure but feared it would endanger prospects for the mail order ban.

Meanwhile, the Senate Judiciary committee voted down registration provisions on shotguns and rifles, leaving it only on hand guns, and also delayed final action on the ban on mail order sales of long guns.

Proponents of gun registration in the Senate weighed the possibility of attaching it to legislation on the floor. But they too recognized possible endangerment to the mail order ban on rifles and shotguns.

Meanwhile, Pres. Johnson appealed to Congress for speedy action on "programs vitally needed by our people," such as gun controls, housing, education, anti-poverty, health and consumer legislation.

"Even though the session may have to be resumed after interruptions for political conventions," Johnson said, "it is critical that this legislation be enacted and that Congress return to complete the unfinished agenda . . . before this session is ended."

Senate Majority Leader Mike Mansfield said he is "shooting for an Aug. 3 adjournment," just prior to the opening of the Republican convention, but that no firm decision has been reached on "how to draw the line" on legislation in the Senate.

Rep. William M. Colmer (D-Miss.), House Rules Committee chairman, previously set July 9 for consideration of rules on bills. However, he said the unit would clear previously submitted requests for rules and "emergency" new requests.

The Administration's expanded federal aid to higher education and vocational education, backed by labor, moved from the "doubtful" to "possible" category when both the Senate and House Labor Committees reported out bills.

The House vocational education bill, reported out of the committee unanimously, was set for a floor vote on July 15. The higher education bill in the House, and both bills in the Senate, were expected to be scheduled for early action.

Another labor supported measure—the Administration's Occupational Health & Safety bill to set federal standards for job safety protection—was approved by the House Labor committee. But it faced an adjournment rush logjam unless the session is resumed following the political conventions.

The House prepared to take up a $2.3 billion foreign aid authorization bill that is about $600 million below the President's request.

A big key to Congress' adjournment is whether or not a group of Senate Republicans succeed in an effort to block Johnson's Supreme Court appointments—Justice Abe Fortas to succeed Chief Justice Earl Warren and Homer Thornberry to the high court vacancy created by Warren's announced retirement.

In latest developments, Warren rejected the opponents' claim that the appointments shouldn't be made because Johnson is a "lame duck." If the effort to block the appointments succeeded, he said, he "would be obliged to stay on."

Senate Republican Leader Everett McKinley Dirksen, who supports the appointments, predicted the blocking effort would fail.

Western Electric Strikes Settled at Three Plants

The Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers announced that locals representing nearly 20,000 workers have reached agreement with the Western Electric Co., manufacturing arm of the Bell telephone system at three locations—Columbus, O., Kearny, N. J., and Omaha, Neb.

The settlements have been ratified by employes at all locations except Kearny. They provide wage increases of some 7.5 percent for the last half of an original 36-month contract term.

The union said it hopes to apply the three-plant pattern to other Western Electric plants employing an additional 50,000 workers. Strike authorization was voted at most plants but walkouts were postponed at the request of the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service.

Meanwhile 12,000 IBEW members continued a two-month-old strike against Illinois Bell Telephone Co. while Chicago Mayor Richard J. Daley (D) continued efforts to mediate the dispute over contract terms. The union's Illinois System Council reported that company offers to date have failed to close a gap of $20 to $30 a week in wages paid to workers in similar occupations.

Penn Central Election Goes to Yardmasters

Chicago—The AFL-CIO Yardmasters defeated an unaffiliated union, 790-235, in the first representation election on the newly merged Penn Central Railroad. The union was certified as exclusive bargaining agent for 1,204 yardmasters under the Railway Labor Act by the National Mediation Board.

Plan Tested to Adjust New Workers to Jobs

The AFL-CIO, in cooperation with the Labor Dept. and the National Alliance of Businessmen (NAB), has opened a program in which union members will help the once hard-core unemployed person on his new job.

Five cities, Atlanta, Cleveland, Houston, Milwaukee and Portland, Ore., have been selected for pilot projects, AFL-CIO Community Services Activities Dir. Leo Perlis announced.

"The heart of the campaign to employ the hard-core unemployed is job retention." Perlis noted. "We hope that this program will provide answers to the entry problems of the disadvantaged on the job."

CSA staffers will conduct union counseling classes to train trade union members so they can help the new employes adjust to their jobs.

NAB has gained pledges from businesses to fill more than 100,000 jobs with hard-core unemployed men and women this year. The organization, which has the cooperation of the AFL-CIO, has a goal of finding 500,000 jobs for the disadvantaged.

"An effort must be made to encourage hard-core unemployed to stay on their new job and make a go of it with some measure of personal satisfaction," Perlis said. "Many will be union members. It is only natural that other union members help their fellow workers."

After they have been trained to help, one union member will be assigned to aid one newly employed person.

Experiences gained in the four-month pilot projects will be used to outline a general program.

Perlis said the program has two primary objectives:

- Help the new employe find his way through the plant and the union, among his fellow workers and adjust himself to the requirements of his job and union membership.
- Help the employe get services he may need that are available through community health, welfare, recreation and educational facilities.

To Check Soaring Medical Costs:

Labor Asks Bold Changes In Financing Health Care

Bold, new programs—including a National Health Insurance system—are needed for Americans to attain adequate health care at a reasonable cost, the AFL-CIO told Congress.

Detailed proposals for halting "the runaway escalation of medical costs" were set forth by AFL-CIO Social Security Dir. Bertrand Seidman before a Senate Government Operations subcommittee.

The subcommittee is holding hearings to spotlight the nation's health needs and how they can best be financed. Seidman's extensive testimony ranged over three areas—the financing of health services, payment of physicians and hospitals and the organization of health services—and then advanced the AFL-CIO recommendations.

Soaring medical costs are a matter of great concern to unions, Seidman pointed out, because they have negotiated "more and more money" in the form of health insurance coverage for their members and their families.

While the aim is to improve and extend health benefits, he said, the unions are finding that medical costs rise so rapidly "the additional funds barely maintain existing benefit levels."

Thus, he said, while union members "sacrifice" other issues to win improved health care services, they and employers are watching the additional money go to "simply enriching physicians and other providers of health care."

In calling for "early consideration by Congress" of a National Health Insurance system, Seidman said the AFL-CIO recommends that it be placed under social security and financed on a tripartite basis—worker, employer and government.

He stressed that such a system is the most important "long range" solution to the problem of assuring every citizen adequate health services—"a right that he should not be denied for any lack of funds."

The system, he said, "wouldn't cost us any more than we now pay for an inadequate, costly disorganized system, or non-system (of health care) with its many gaps."

"Under such a program all citizens would have equal access to health services and the 'one door' of entry into the health system for rich and poor alike would become a reality instead of a still distant goal."

Pending approval of a National Health Insurance System, the federal government should allocate "sizable resources for the development of comprehensive, group practice, prepayment plans (GPPPs)," Seidman testified.

He cited a study by the National Advisory Commission on Health Manpower that found pre-paid group practice plans have proved "to be the most effective system of providing quality medical care at substantial savings over the prevailing fee-for-service solo practice."

Seidman recommended that:

- At least 10 percent of all federal expenditures for hospitals and other health facilities under the Hill-Burton law be earmarked for inpatient and outpatient facilities for new GPPPs.
- At least 10 percent of federal funds directed toward increasing the number of physicians be utilized to provide initial staffing for GPPPs.
- At least 10 percent of funds allocated for state and local health planning under the Partnership for Health program be earmarked for technical services related to actual planning and development of GPPPs.

While pursuing the two "long-range" objectives — development of an NHIS and expansion of group practice prepayment plans, Seidman urged the following "short-range" actions to "mitigate the worst features of our present non-system" of health care:

- Application of medicare to the disabled and as rapidly as possible to all social security beneficiaries.
- Extension of medicare coverage to additional health needs and services; elimination of its deductibles and coinsurance; merging of its hospitalization — extended care and physicians services parts; improvement of its administration; and steps to control fees paid to doctors under federal programs.
- Control of hospital costs by requiring hospitals under federal programs to be staffed by physicians subject to the director of the hospitals, as well as reimbursing them on a per capita basis.
- Restoration of medicaid to its original purpose of providing across-the-board health care for the needy and medically needy.
- Expansion of neighborhood health centers "to the maximum extent possible" so they will be "integrated into the mainstream of health care in the area."
- An end to "exploitation" of consumers by drug manufacturers by requiring them to be licensed by the Food & Drug Administration, giving FDA "adequate funds and staff" to police the law and test drugs and compelling generic prescription of all drugs.

Seidman concluded by appealing to the subcommittee "not to follow the usual path of compromise, piece-meal and inadequate measures . . . when we already know so much of what must be done."

"This is the time," he said, "to call for bold, fundamental changes which alone can assure quality medical care at reasonable cost to all the American people."

Humphrey Spurs Debate On Candidate, Platform

Vice Pres. Humphrey declared in a statement that his campaign for the Democratic party's presidential nomination "welcomes the broadest involvement and participation of the party's rank and file."

Humphrey made it clear that he favors full and open debate by all segments of the party in drafting its platform and selecting its candidates at the Democratic convention, set to open Aug. 26 in Chicago.

"As a Democrat, I pledge myself to support that platform," the Vice President declared. He added:

"I pledge today—as I have in the past—my active and enthusiastic support of the national convention's nominee for President. And I take this pledge without qualification, amendment or condition."

Humphrey issued his statement shortly before canceling scheduled campaign appearances this week on the West Coast because he was suffering a mild case of the flu.

Position Outlined

He outlined this position on the conduct of the campaign and the convention:

- A proposal that open hearings on the Democratic platform be held in all parts of the country before the convention.
- A further proposal that "all elements of the party be fully involved in drafting the platform planks. . . ."
- A pledge to "press vigorously" for implementation of the standards adopted by the 1964 convention relating to broad-based selection of convention delegates. "The era of token representation for Mexican-Americans, Negroes and other minorities is over," Humphrey declared.
- Full support for the proposal that candidates for President and Vice President who are convention delegates be permitted to address the delegates.

Humphrey's pledge to back the party ticket stood in contrast to the position of his rival for the nomination, Sen. Eugene McCarthy, who so far has refused to commit himself to support for the Vice President if the latter is the convention's choice.

Humphrey said his commitment was "measured only" by his concern to "build a Democratic party which is fully responsive to the needs and demands of all persons who call themselves Democrats, and more importantly, to build a party which is truly responsive to the needs of the American people."

Meanwhile, the overwhelming support within organized labor for the Vice President's candidacy was broadened further by the unanimous endorsement of the Pennsylvania AFL-CIO Executive Council.

State Federation Pres. Harry Boyer, in announcing the council's action, traced Humphrey's public career and cited his "indelible imprint" on "all of the important social legislation enacted during the past two decades."

Boyer said the council took the view that solutions to the many problems confronting the nation and the world could best be achieved through Humphrey's leadership. "He is, indeed," Boyer added, "a man for our times."

Landmark Housing Bill Wins Approval of House

000 new public housing units over the next three years at $400 million, a $1.4 billion authorization for urban renewal, $140 million for rent supplements and $1 billion for model cities.

In other areas, the legislation authorizes grants for mass transit plans, water and sewer projects, new programs of flood and riot insurance, rehabilitation, rural housing and college housing.

The Administration's House victory on the legislation, which is solidly backed by labor, came after two days of debate and attempts, mainly by Republicans, to tack on crippling amendments.

One proposed amendment would have cut 10 percent from the total $5.3 billion authorization and another would have hacked all but $250,000 from the $1 million designated for model cities. Both lost on voice votes.

An attempt to knock out labor protective conditions from mass transit programs—protections won by unions in 1964 legislation—was beaten by an 87-82 vote.

Other defeated amendments would have cut public housing authorization to $200 million, upped the level at which the government would subsidize interest costs from 1 to 3 percent and reduced grants for rent supplements.

One problem in conference will be to resolve differences between the bills brought on by an adopted amendment proposed by Rep. John B. Anderson (R-Ill.).

It would limit the programs of government subsidies in buying and renting dwellings to families whose income is not more than 30 percent above the maximum income that would make them eligible for public housing. This figure varies from city to city.

The Senate bill uses a different formula which its proponents contend would concentrate a greater percentage of the government aid among the lowest-income persons—those in the $3,000 to $4,000 bracket.

Nixon Scored On Milliken, Stevens Role

New York—Pres. William Pollock of the Textile Workers Union of America assailed former Vice Pres. Richard M. Nixon's appointment of Roger Milliken and Roger T. Stevens to a group of 51 "economic advisers" in his campaign for the presidency.

"If Mr. Nixon does indeed accept 'economic advice' from these men, it will be a sad day not only for textile workers but for all union workers in America," he said.

He noted that Milliken heads the Deering Milliken textile empire in the South which closed its Darlington, S. C., mill rather than tolerate unionism in the plant. That action was found illegal by the National Labor Relations Board in a ruling upheld by the 4th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals.

Pollock pointed out that Stevens heads J. P. Stevens & Co., another textile giant, which has been found guilty by the NLRB on five separate occasions of illegal firings to keep unions out.

Education Bills Advance in Congress

Measures Extend Aid Programs

By Duane Emme

Legislation calling for substantial changes in the size and direction of the nation's vocational education programs has passed both the House and Senate unanimously.

The Senate also enacted, 83-0, a bill authorizing $14 billion in federal aid to higher education over the next four years. The House is expected to take up a narrower version of the same program shortly.

Pres. Johnson has placed both vocational education and higher education legislation on his list of "essential" measures Congress should clear before it adjourns.

The Senate and House kept intact the vital sections of the Administration's proposed Partnership for Learning & Earning Act to improve and strengthen the Vocational Education Act of 1963.

The AFL-CIO gave strong endorsement to a key section that would consolidate all vocational education laws within the 1963 law and apply its standards for the allotment of federal funds.

The change was a main recommendation advanced in a report earlier this year by the National Advisory Council on Vocational Education, of which Otto Pragan of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Education staff was a member.

Training Broadened

In previous testimony, the AFL-CIO stressed that the consolidation would permit federal grants to help workers learn skills "in the total spectrum of all occupations."

Further, the federation pointed out, the change would greatly simplify administration, matching of funds, reporting and accounting of vocational education programs.

In another area, the legislation allows grants for new "exemplary" programs of experimentation in bridging the gap between education and work.

Funds would be available to familiarize junior high school students with occupations, for special guidance and counseling, to improve curricula and teaching materials, to exchange personnel between schools and government agencies as well as industries and to set up work-experience programs.

Both bills also contain another labor-sought provision that permits the use of union trust funds for guaranteed student loans.

The Senate bill, approved 88-0, and the House bill, passed 389-0,

Building Trades Spell Out Model Cities Labor Policy

ROUND AFTER ROUND of applause greets delegates from the former Packinghouse Workers as they arrived in San Diego to join with the Meat Cutters at a merged convention session. Both conventions approved the merger and the joint session added its unanimous confirmation.

Wirtz Hails Guidelines As 'Sound'

By Eugene A. Kelly

The presidents of 17 building trades unions have unanimously adopted guidelines for employment and training of residents of areas earmarked for rehabilitation under the model cities program.

C. J. Haggerty, president of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept., announced the guidelines after a meeting of the union presidents in Washington. He cited the "proud tradition" of the building trades in responding effectively to national emergencies.

The announcement brought statements from Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz commending the building trades department for its "sound blueprint" and from Sec. Robert C. Weaver of the Dept. of Housing & Urban Development congratulating Haggerty and the union presidents for their "initiative."

The guidelines implement a decision made at Bal Harbour, Fla. last winter when the union presidents pledged cooperation with efforts to open up job and training opportunities for residents of inner-city slums

Since that time, Haggerty told a news conference, unions and contractors cooperating with the Labor Dept. under the Outreach program and other government-funded efforts have screened about 12,000 applicants from minority groups and trained some 2,000 workers who have been admitted to unions in 45 U.S. cities.

Work under the Model Cities program may be a year or more away, Haggerty said, but the union presidents recommended that all affiliated unions and councils be prepared to "take into account

Johnson Bids Congress Act —Or Return

Pres. Johnson repeated his call to Congress to pass "essential" legislation this year, even if it means that the lawmakers will have to return to Washington after the national political conventions.

The President's "essential" list included bills covering housing, aid to higher education, occupational safety and health, conservation, pipeline safety, wholesome poultry, veterans, foreign trade, and the Teacher Corps.

It marked the second time within a week that Johnson had proposed

UPWA Caravan Welcomed:

Joint Session Seals Meat Union Merger

By David L. Perlman

San Diego—Delegates to the Meat Cutters & Butcher Workmen convention cheered until they were hoarse and clapped to the point of exhaustion in a welcome to representatives of nearly 100,000 members of the Packinghouse Workers entering their union.

Nearly 600 UPWA delegates came in a caravan of buses from their Los Angeles convention to cement the merger agreement in a joint session with the Meat Cutters convention.

If they had any doubts as to their welcome, they were dispelled within minutes.

The Meat Cutters had reserved the center section of the huge convention hall for the UPWA delegates and had prepared special unity convention badges for the occasion.

A band played loudly as the UPWA contingent entered the hall, but it was many minutes before it could be heard over the shouts of welcome and the drumbeat of applause from 1,250 Meat Cutter delegates on the main floor and their families and guests in the balconies.

Sec. of Labor W. Willard Wirtz was on hand to extend his own congratulations and to bring special messages from Pres. Johnson and Vice Pres. Humphrey.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany had earlier wired the delegates a prediction of "a brighter future" for the merged union "in an atmosphere of unity and dedication."

Elimination of conflicting and duplicating jurisdictions by voluntary merger was one of the goals of the AFL and CIO merger in 1955, Meany noted, "and I con-

Industrywide Strike Vote Slated Among 400,000 in Basic Steel

Pittsburgh, Pa.—The 400,000 Steelworkers employed in the basic steel industry will vote July 23 on giving union negotiators the power to call a strike when the present contract expires Aug. 1.

The referendum vote, first of its kind in the union's history, will be taken under procedures authorized by the 1966 USWA convention to bring members closer to the decision-making process.

Members of the Steelworkers' executive board and two other bodies—the 200-man bargaining advisory committee and the 600-member basic steel industry conference—approved a recommendation that the vote be taken, with each local union using customary polling procedures—at their union hall, at special meetings or by plant gate balloting.

USWA Pres. I. W. Abel told a press conference after the meetings that negotiations since Apr. 15 produced some progress, especially on local issues, but that the 11 companies involved have put no economic offer on the table.

"Time is running out on us," Abel said. "We are required to meet certain provisions [of the union constitution] and the timetable" compels action.

Asked whether he expects a strike Aug. 1, Abel replied "I would hope not. I hope that in the remaining two weeks" before contract expiration "we can get down to real hard bargaining and reach an agreement."

Union committees have been meeting here with committees from the 11 basic steel firms on local plant-level issues. At the same time,

Chavez Says Labor Far From Too 'Fat'

San Diego—Don't try to tell farm workers that the labor movement has grown "fat" or complacent, Cesar Chavez told the Meat Cutters convention. They know better from "pure experience."

The United Farm Workers Organizing Committee, which he heads, has received "all kinds of help from the labor movement."

Chavez told the delegates: "If it weren't for the labor movement, we wouldn't be striking today. We would not be here today."

Strike Vote Set For 400,000 In Basic Steel

a committee of five union representatives and four company men has been meeting frequently on the wage sections of a proposed new agreement.

Those meetings will continue while the union polls its steel industry members. Other members in aluminum, can and miscellaneous industries will not be polled.

The USWA has put no estimate on the cost of its new contract proposals to the industry, but recent settlements in the can and aluminum industries have set new high marks.

90¢ in Can

In January, the USWA's can industry conference won settlements valued at 90 cents an hour in new three-year pacts covering 32,000 employes of American Can Co. and Continental Can Co.

In March they won hefty settlements from two other can firms, and in June got a 55.9-cent wage hike from five aluminum firms in a package that Abel called "the largest and best" ever negotiated in the industry.

Delegates to a special USWA convention Mar. 20 in Atlantic City voted to arm the union with a strike and defense fund and raised the dues structure for the 1.2 million members. The convention approved an extra $5 monthly increase from April through August, with a new dues structure raising member payments from $5 a month to a figure based on two hours' average earnings, effective Sept. 1.

NEARLY 400,000 members of the Steelworkers will take a strike authorization vote July 23, the union announced in Pittsburgh. USWA Pres. I. W. Abel, shown with Sec.-Treas. Walter J. Burke, left, and Vice Pres. Joseph P. Molony, right, said 11 company negotiators have made no wage offer in talks that started Apr. 15, and have until Aug. 1 to do so, unless the contract expiration date is extended.

Right-Wing Effort Seen To Cloud Critical Issues

Philadelphia—Forces of reaction are trying as they never have before to confuse the public on critical issues, AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler warned the Bookbinders convention here.

Schnitzler was the featured speaker on the second day of the five-day biennial convention in the city where the union was founded 76 years ago.

Nowhere, Schnitzler told the 300 delegates, is the attempt at confusion more evident than in the Chamber of Commerce opposition to the Administration's health and safety bill.

The C of C's false cry of "Labor secretary wants to close your business" is typical of the illogical confusion the reactionaries employ, Schnitzler declared.

He appealed to delegates to support the presidential candidacy of Vice Pres. Hubert H. Humphrey as the "man of the hour" to lead America toward solving its many difficult problems.

Humphrey, Schnitzler said, is the one candidate in the field who throughout his government career has heeded the voice of labor and has been ahead of his time.

A call for political action was also given by AFL-CIO Organization Dir. William R. Kircher. He said that "there is little that we can look forward to with respect to collective bargaining advancement unless we can provide the organizational growth for our unions."

Growth Impresses

"There is nothing more impressive to a legislator than to be able to tell him that in their constituent district the union gained 15 percent of its size in membership in the pats two years," he said.

In outlining the Bookbinders' gains over the past two years and setting the goals for the 1968 convention, Pres. John Connolly said the union has maintained its policy of "reasonable settlement without resort to drastic action," in regard to strike threats.

The one big exception has been the five-year-old strike in Kingsport, Tenn. During the opening day's business, a resolution was brought up to continue the boycott actions against Kingsport Press, Inc., which has involved more than 1,000 members of five AFL-CIO unions.

The convention was called upon to renew and redouble efforts to rid school systems of books produced at the Kingsport Press.

Each member union was urged to give all possible publicity to the fact that World Book encyclopedia and the Childcraft series are being printed and bound by strikebreakers.

Merger talks with other printing trades unions were also mentioned by Connolly. "Your officers are keeping in close touch on this matter," he reported.

Striking Tucson Drivers Operate Jitney Service

Tucson, Ariz.—A little union of 29 bus operators is fighting gamely here with the only weapon at its command—"jitney" service—to win a strike started three months ago against a giant transit combine.

The company is American Transit Corp., owner of bus lines in 23 cities, beneficiary of $22 million in annual income and employer of 2,500. The union is Tucson, Div. 1167 of the Transit Union, first organized in 1938 and holder of continuous contracts until the big St. Louis, Mo. corporation bought the local bus line 17 months ago.

The union was negotiating a contract when the new owners took over. Corporation bargainers not only refused to offer better terms but unilaterally put into effect a change in working conditions that cut take home pay by $50 a month, ATU Pres. John M. Elliott said.

With picketing restricted, union members have been providing free jitney service with their own automobiles while the corporation operates eight buses with strikebreakers, and tries to provide token service in a city with more than 250,000 population. Jitney drivers collect no fares but do accept voluntary offerings.

ATU is telling the story of the strike, and its causes, in the 22 cities served by the corporation, Elliott said the Tucson union voted to strike after negotiations ran 14 months beyond contract expiration.

The men walked out Apr. 22 and began picketing after inferior terms were put into effect by the management.

Tucson city officials made one move in the direction of buying the bus property and establishing a transit authority, but dropped the idea and have made no effort to intervene since.

ATU is paying strike benefits of $25 a week to its Tucson members.

IBEW Repeats Arbitration Bid To Illinois Bell

Chicago—A strike of 12,000 Illinois Bell Telephone Co. plant craftsmen and installers could be settled "in a few hours" if Bell management would agree to arbitrate the strike issues, Chairman Robert A. Nickey of the Illinois Bell Plant System Council of the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers said here.

Nickey reiterated the union's offer to arbitrate after a previous management turndown of the proposal and rejection by union bargainers of the latest company settlement terms. Bell management merely "juggled" proposals repeatedly rejected since the strike started in May, Nickey said.

The IBEW unit filed a charge with the National Labor Relations Board's regional office that Illinois Bell has refused to bargain in good faith. It accused management of trying to force acceptance of a predetermined "package."

Federal mediators and Mayor Richard J. Daley were expected to resume efforts to settle the dispute in time for the installation of equipment for the Democratic national convention, due to open here Aug. 26.

For Two Industries:

Oil Union Shapes Bargaining Goals

Denver—Two bargaining policy committees of the Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers voted here to ask the oil and chemical industries for major contract improvements including wage increases of 72 cents an hour in oil and "very substantial" salary boosts in chemicals.

OCAW Pres. A. F. Grospiron said a 14-point program of collective bargaining goals was drawn up by the union's national chemical bargaining policy committee here in mid-July. This followed similar action by the union's national oil bargaining policy committee, which met here a few days earlier.

The oil proposals Grospiron said, will be presented in simultaneous coordinated bargaining sessions involving several hundred oil company contracts. The chemical industry proposals, on the other hand, will serve only as guidelines and not as mandated demands. The difference in approach is due, Grospiron said, to the fact that there is "no substantial degree of coordination" in negotiations with the chemical companies, whose contracts in various plants are negotiated over a longer period of time.

Negotiations Set

In the oil industry, negotiations will begin about Nov. 1 if union proposals are ratified by the affected locals.

Oil locals will ask for general wage increases of 12 cents an hour effective Oct. 1, 1968; another 32 cents as of Jan. 1, 1969, and the final 28 cents Dec. 1, 1969, in contracts scheduled to expire Nov. 30, 1970.

An additional 15 cents an hour will be asked for craftsmen effective Jan. 1, 1969, plus another 10 cents on Dec. 1 next year.

Oil locals want to increase night premium pay from the present 10 cents an hour to 5 percent of wages for evening shift work, and from the current 20 cents an hour to 10 percent of wages for midnight shift work.

Other Proposals

Other oil company proposals are that 1 cent for each hour worked be put in a fund to increase the pensions of employes already retired; that the companies assume full costs of adequate pension plans and insurance-hospitalization plans; that employes on vacation get a bonus equal to half their regular pay; that two additional paid holidays be allowed each year and that a minimum of time and a half be paid for all Sunday work.

The union said it will approve no oil contract which does not contain these mandatory provisions. Its committee recommends, but does not call manatory, adequate health and safety clauses establishing joint safety committees in each installation, and full protection for the income of employes in plant shutdowns or relocations.

In chemicals, OCAW will purpose substantial wage hikes plus special adjustments of 25 cents an hour for skilled craftsmen, and provision for wage adjustments equal to cost of living increases during the term of the contract.

Other goals call for premium pay for night shift and weekend work; protection against layoffs or demotions; 10 paid holidays and other fringe improvements similar to those sought in the oil industry.

The union bargains for some 175,000 oil and chemical workers divided about equally between the United States and Canada.

Growers Sue N.Y. Unions on Grape Boycott

New York—More than 100 California grape growers and shippers have filed a suit in U.S. District Court in Brooklyn charging labor organizations with illegally boycotting their grapes.

The $25 million suit alleged that the defendants had "unlawfully threatened, coerced and restrained" various supermarket chains, wholesalers, jobbers and brokers from selling their struck grapes.

Named in the action are AFL-CIO United Farm Workers Organizing Committee, New York City AFL-CIO, Seafarers, Meat Cutters 342, Retail Clerks Local 1500 and Retail, Wholesale & Dept. Store Union Local 338.

Francis Ryan, the farm workers boycott director in New York, said that chain store representatives had held a meeting at which "they freely decided to assist our effort."

A Seafarers' representative pointed out that a complaint similar to that filed in the suit was presented to the National Labor Relations Board and rejected.

Spokesmen for the unions described the court action as a sign that the California grape growers "are hurting" despite their claims to the contrary.

Joint Session Seals Meat Union Merger

gratulate you for achieving it."

He told the delegates that "all the talent the labor movement can command will be needed in the months ahead to protect and expand the economic and social progress most Americans have enjoyed, and to extend the benefits of that progress to those who have thus far been left behind."

Pres. Johnson said the merger will benefit "all working Americans" and Humphrey said his close relationship with the leaders of both unions over the years gives him confidence that the progress of the past is a prelude to greater gains in the future.

Leaders of the newly merged union spoke with deep emotion.

"At long last and thank God," Sec.-Treas. Patrick E. Gorman told the unity session. "From now on we are one union . . . standing together, fighting together for a common cause, not only for ourselves but for working people everywhere."

Dignity Stressed

Pres. Thomas J. Lloyd read a resolution confirming the ratification of the merger agreement by the separate conventions, pledging the merged organization to "full recognition of the inherent dignity and worth of every person, regardless of sex, race, creed, color or national origin."

A unanimous vote and a standing ovation put the final seal on unity.

Ralph Helstein, longtime president of the UPWA and now speaking as a vice president of the Meat Cutters & Butchers Workmen, told the hushed convention:

"Today we clasp each other's hands in the sacred bond of fraternity, knowing that 'when the union's inspiration through the workers' blood shall run, there can be no power greater anywhere beneath the sun.' It is this knowledge that led us to build these unions in the first place. It is this knowledge that led us to merging them today."

There were other speakers, eloquent, sincere, moving. And as the leaders of the newly merged union took their oath of office, the Meat Cutters executive assistant, Hilton E. Hanna, charged them with a religious fervor:

"May the responsibility of leadership so scorch and haunt your consciences that you will strive day in and day out—in every way—to prove yourself equal to the task and worthy of the confidence placed in you. . . .

"May you never lose identity with those from whom your power is derived—those generous enough to entrust to you the guardianship of their welfare as citizens and wage earners.

"May the genuine concern so ably demonstrated by you in your previous activities in behalf of your fellow men grow ever more fervent with the passing hour. May there be no resting place for you until peace prevails, hope ends in fruition, hunger is banished and opportunity and dignity become living realities for all mankind—in the here and now."

It wasn't all solemn, this first gathering together of the two unions.

When the final gavel fell and the delegates walked side-by-side back up the aisles, former UPWA members were joining in singing, "It's always fair weather when good friends get together." And the chorus, "We're the Amalgamated Meat Cutters and Butcher Workmen, Too."

Delegates Open Hearts, Wallets For California Grape Strikers

San Diego—Thousands of dollars in cash and checks and tens of thousands of dollars in firm pledges came from delegates to the Meat Cutters convention in a dramatic demonstration of trade union solidarity with the AFL-CIO United Farm Workers Organizing Committee.

Delegates took Cesar Chavez and the cause of the farm workers to their hearts after hearing him speak of the "jungle" in which the UFWOC is trying to organize.

The vast $5 billion agricultural industry in California, Chavez told them, is dominated by corporations "so big and powerful that they own not only all the land, but they own many of the politicians and even many of the judges."

For more than half a century, he stressed, "they have also owned the workers."

In this "jungle," there are no laws to protect the workers or to compel employers to bargain with a union. But there are laws, judges and dubious injunctions to help the employers resist union organization.

Chavez, who was accompanied to the convention by AFL-CIO Organizing Dir. William L. Kircher, spoke of the help of the labor movement, including locals of the Meat Cutters and other retail store employes, in the nationwide boycott of California grapes.

Union Essential

He said farm workers have been willing to suffer, "to give up everything that they have" to build a union. "They have nothing to lose. A union to them is the only way, the only way out."

The delegates stood and applauded until the officers of the Meat Cutters suggested a more practical demonstration of support.

In some 30 minutes, $37,000 was raised in donations and firm pledges. Cash collection boxes were passed from table to table—and filled to overflowing. There were hurried caucuses of local union and district council delegations. Commitments ranging from $100 from the smallest locals to $1,000 and more from large locals were announced.

Sec.-Treas. Patrick E. Gorman and Pres. Thomas J. Lloyd held their own caucus—and announced to the cheers of the delegates that the international union would add $10,000 to the pot.

Other delegates said their local union bylaws required membership approval of all donations—and expressed confidence that additional thousands of dollars would be forthcoming in the weeks to come.

Said Chavez, as he returned to the podium, "I think the expression of love you have shown us will be remembered forever."

A series of convention resolutions reaffirmed support of the grape boycott and called on Congress to extend the protection of the National Labor Relations Act to farm workers.

In other resolutions as the delegates cleared the agenda for the climactic unity session with the Packinghouse Workers, the convention:

- Called for strong gun control legislation, including the registration and licensing of all firearms.
- Urged full participation in labor's political program, declaring that "the life of American labor and American democracy may depend on the magnitude, strength and effectiveness of this work."
- Called for support of "the basic recommendations of the Kerner Report for massive expenditures to meet the special problems of housing, education, employment and community rights of all people who today suffer discrimination."

There were several speeches in support of the omnibus civil rights resolution but one of the most effective came from a delegate who took the floor to say:

"In our shop, we have Puerto Ricans, Spanish, Negroes, Poles, old-stock Americans, and we are all treated alike. I hope the day will come when our great country is like my shop."

Delegates picked Louisville as the site for the next convention, in 1972, and changed the constitution to permit delegates to vote the full per capita membership of their local unions on any roll calls. Previously only locals which were able to send a full complement of delegates to the convention would have their union's full membership strength reflected on a roll call.

2 Conventions Mourn Death of UPWA Leader

Two conventions joined in mourning the death of George Thomas, 53, director of District 5 of the Packinghouse Workers since 1954.

Thomas, one of the nation's leading Negro trade unionists, died in Houston, Tex., July 10 of a heart attack. Funeral services were held in Fort Worth, the headquarters for his union's southwestern region.

The Packinghouse Workers convention in Los Angeles honored his memory with a resolution, and a session of the Meat Cutters convention in San Diego adjourned in tribute. At the unity session of the two unions in San Diego on July 12, delegates from the two unions—now merged into one—stood in silent tribute.

Thomas started his union career as a steward in the Armour plant at Fort Worth. He served as a field representative for the union before his election as regional director.

He is survived by his wife, Thelma, and two sons.

Opera Singer-Unionist Named to Cultural Post

World-renowned opera and concert singer George London has been named artistic administrator of the John F. Kennedy Center for the Performing Arts in Washington, D.C. He is president of the American Guild of Musical Artists, an affiliate of the AFL-CIO Actors & Artistes.

London will supervise programming, booking and production of musical activities for the national cultural center.

The position of the artistic administrator was created to administer the program policy decisions of the Kennedy Center trustees and board chairman with the advice and counsel of the center's Musical Adviser Julius Rudel, said Roger L. Stevens, board chairman.

London is expected to move to Washington soon to assume his duties at the Kennedy Center. He has been residing in New York City and Switzerland.

The 47-year-old performer and union leader also is a director of the New York Center. He made his professional opera debut as Dr. Grenvil in "La Traviata" at the Hollywood Bowl in 1941.

He also performed with the San Francisco Opera, the Vienna State Opera and the Glyndebourne Opera before his debut with the New York Metropolitan Opera in 1951. He debuted at La Scala in 1952.

Rudel recommended that the board, which includes AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, accept London for the post.

Rudel said London and he share similar aims: "We share, as well, a sense of the future direction of the Kennedy Center to a position of international eminence.

"Our hope is to create not only a living monument and to enrich the cultural life of the nation's capital, but through it, enrich the cultural life of the nation."

Meany supported the idea of a national cultural center when he was appointed a trustees of the center in 1962. He pledged labor's enthusiastic backing for the project.

State and local central bodies have been involved in raising $30 million through public subscription for the Kennedy center.

Pulp-Sulphite Leader Heads ICF Department

Geneva, Switzerland—Pres. Joseph P. Tonelli of the Pulp, Sulphite & Paper Mill Workers has been elected chairman of the pulp and paper department of the Intl. Federation of Chemical & General Workers' Unions (ICF).

It marked the first time in the history of ICF that an American has been elected chairman of the department.

Delegates from 25 countries attended the annual meeting of the secretariat, which has affiliated unions in 55 countries.

Massachusetts Enacts Bargaining Rights Law

Boston—A labor-backed bill to extend collective bargaining rights to employes of hospitals and other non-profit institutions has been passed by the Massachusetts legislature and signed into law.

Every legislator who voted for the bill received a letter of thanks from Local 254 of the Building Service Employes, a leader in the drive for the new law.

An Overwhelming 'Aye!' For Hubert H. Humphrey

San Diego—The Meat Cutters convention here pledged the union's "full support" for the presidential candidacy of Hubert H. Humphrey.

The resolution described the Vice President as a tested champion of labor's causes and a man of "burning idealism, fertile imagination, great intelligence and immense political skills." It said he is best equipped to assume "the tremendous burden" of leading the nation.

Delegates debated the resolution, hearing speakers on both sides.

But when the question was called, the vote was overwhelmingly "Aye!"

The resolution of endorsement was proposed to the convention by the union's executive board.

ENGLAND-BOUND Glass Bottle Blowers board a jet for London and a 17-day tour of glass and industrial plants in Britain. An exchange study team of GBBA members visits England in alternating years as guests of the General & Municipal Workers Union. which has jurisdiction in the British glass industry. The British union will send a team to the United States next year.

Corporate Postal Plan Greeted Coolly by Labor

A presidential commission has proposed turning over the postal service to a government-owned corporation and has recommended a broad range of actions to improve efficiency, reduce costs, improve working conditions and provide more meaningful collective bargaining.

The 10-member commission was headed by Frederick R. Kappel, former board chairman of the American Telephone & Telegraph Co. The proposal for transforming the Cabinet department into a semi-autonomous corporation had originally been advanced by former Postmaster Gen. Lawrence F. O'Brien.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, a member of the commission, expressed reservations about the proposed change of status.

"I agree with the goal of modernizing the postal system and improving working conditions and job opportunities for its employes," Meany said. "However, the status of the Post Office as a Cabinet department has a positive value that should not be discarded lightly."

While the commission's proposals would broaden the scope of collective bargaining to include wage rates—now set by Congress—employes would not be permitted to strike and disputes would be submitted either to voluntary arbitration or decision of the President.

The principal postal unions—the Letter Carriers and the Postal Clerks—both expressed opposition to key portions of the plan, including removal of Congress from the wage-setting procedure when workers would not have the rights held by unions in private industry.

Pres. Johnson described the commission's report as "a sobering judgment on what is required to provide for excellence in postal service."

He did not comment directly on the commission majority's recommendations, saying merely that he has asked the postmaster general and the budget director "to review the report carefully and report to me."

Congressional leaders likewise took a cautious attitude to the report, praising its analysis of postal problems but reserving judgment on its conclusions.

J. M. Scott Retires, AFL-CIO Staffer

AFL-CIO Staff Rep. James M. Scott of the Texas regional office has been granted early retirement status for health reasons after nearly 20 years of service with the federation and the former AFL, Dir. of Organization William L. Kircher announced.

Scott became an AFL organizer in 1948 after long service with Local 587 of the Boilermakers in Orange, Tex. He took part in every major organizing campaign in Texas before merger, and has worked since then on organizing campaigns and in coordinated collective bargaining assignments, Kircher said.

Before the start of an illness that led to his request for retirement, Scott was a key figure in a far-ranging campaign to organize drillers and "roughnecks" in the vast Permian Oil Basin of western Texas, Kircher reported. Scott is 55.

In Royal Commission Report:

British TUC Hails Rejection Of Strict Legal Framework

London—British trade union leaders have opened talks with the Labor government about a new structure for the nation's labor movement following publication of an extensive inquiry into the future of trade unionism in Britain.

Observers here point out that the British Trade Union Congress goes into the talks with its major battle already won; the Royal Commission on Trade Unions, headed by high court judge Lord Donovan, came out strongly against the imposition of a stringent legal framework for trade union activity.

This was the major conclusion of the report, and it has brought a sympathetic response from British union leaders.

"There are many things in this report that one welcomes," says Engineering Union Gen. Sec. Jim Conway, "and the most important is the rejection of the myth that trade union agreements, and in particular procedure agreements, should be made enforceable at law."

Already the Donovan report has been heavily criticized by commentators in the Conservative Party, industrial management and the press for its failure to recommend tough legal sanctions against the unions.

TUC leaders are nervous about only one of the legal recommendations in the report. This proposes that the immunity against a civil court order for damages, which has been granted to British trade unionists since 1906, should no longer apply to leaders of some unofficial strikes. This proposal was included in the report as a straight swap for the extension of immunity to union officials in actions for breach of commercial contract.

But the TUC does not disagree with the report's analysis which led it to the conclusion about unofficial strike leaders. Although Britain's strike record is good compared with other industrialized countries, including the United States, 90 percent of the strikes are lightning, unofficial actions. These, the report concluded, damage the unions and the national economy.

TUC Gen. Sec. George Woodcock, a member of the commission, and his allies had to fight a stubborn rearguard action against management representatives on the commission to prevent the inclusion of comprehensive financial sanctions against the unofficial strikers. Their argument for the traditional British system of voluntary negotiation to end strikes of all kinds eventually won the day.

The TUC also supports the Commission's major positive proposal designed to bring more order to the British collective bargaining system. This is that an Industrial Relations Commission be established by the government to take over responsibility for the smooth functioning of collective bargaining agreements.

The report proposes that all companies with more than 5,000 employes should be made to register their agreements with the Dept. of Employment & Productivity (successor to Britain's Labor Ministry). The hope is that companies with poor agreements would be ashamed to register them, and would act, with the unions, to improve them. If companies are shameless, their agreements would then be investigated by the IRC.

The idea of an IRC has been welcomed privately by the government as well as the trade union movement. Officials in both sectors foresee a liberal interpretation of the IRC's powers.

Government officials are less enthusiastic about the commission's recommendation that the new body should not have power to enforce its recommendations. The TUC, influenced by Woodcock, argues against compulsion.

(The report did not discuss the effect on trade unions of the legal interference in collective bargaining introduced in the Prices & Income Acts. These give the government power to delay implementation of a voluntary collective agreement if its Prices & Incomes Board reports that the agreement gives workers too much money. The TUC opposes this legislation.)

There is likely to be much harder bargaining between the government, TUC and employers organizations over two other recommendations in the commission's report. These propose statutory provision for the protection of the individual trade unionist against:

- Unfair dismissal by an employer, with a right of complaint to a Labor Tribunal.
- Unfair treatment and abuse of power by trade unions, with a right of complaint to an independent review body.

The employers mistrust the first proposal and the unions the second. The government is inclined to accept both.

Trade union reactions to the main analytical conclusion in the report have been tentative so far. This is that the source of collective bargaining power in the trade union movement has shifted from national to local level. The strength of the TUC has been historically based on the importance of national bargaining, and the implications of a shift to local level are potentially serious for the leaders represented on the TUC.

It means that shop steward training is becoming an increasingly important TUC function, and it is significant that a new push by the TUC to improve trade union education has already begun.

In fact, Woodcock's major criticism of the Royal Commission report, which will be echoed throughout the British movement, does not concern its recommendations, but its omissions. Woodcock has gone on record as saying that the report does not answer the question he asked some five years ago: "What are we here for?"

Construction Unions Urge Steps To Assure All-Year Employment

The lack of stable, year-around employment in construction "is a national problem requiring a national solution," Pres. C. J. Haggerty of the Building & Construction Trades Dept. told Congress.

Haggerty, leaders of BCTD affiliates, management representatives and Labor Under Sec. James J. Reynolds testified before a House Labor subcommittee in support of a bill which would make a start toward doing something about the problem.

The bill would amend the Manpower Development & Training Act of 1962 to direct the secretary of labor to make a comprehensive study of "seasonality in the construction industry with special attention to its implications for a national manpower policy."

The secretary of labor would report to the President and to Congress.

The measure is sponsored by Rep. James G. O'Hara (D-Mich.), subcommittee chairman. A similar measure sponsored by Sen. Winston L. Prouty (R-Vt.) has been reported out by the Senate Labor committee as part of another bill.

Haggerty said the pattern of sharp layoffs in construction in the fall and winter is as old as the weather and—although supposedly based upon the weather—occurs in both cold and warm climates.

The "unnecessary" fluctuations, he added, result from building codes based on "obsolete considerations" of material strength and the affects of weather and government planning that make building money available only in the summer months.

Elimination of these fluctuations, he continued, would give the nation "more efficient use of skilled manpower," and also "reduce the cost of construction . . . to the great benefit of all our people."

"We turn to the federal government to relieve the situation," Haggerty said, "because it is a national problem requiring a national solution."

Pres. Thomas F. Murphy of the Bricklayers and Vice Pres. Maurice Fancher of the Laborers gave the subcommittee figures showing the harsh affect of seasonality on their members.

A 1966 survey of local unions, Murphy said, revealed that bricklayers are unemployed on the average 15 weeks of the year—"a period in which they have no opportunity to use skills acquired at considerable cost to themselves and the nation."

"This is an enormous waste, and it creates personal hardships and anxieties," Murphy said. "This industry's skilled workers accept a pattern of employment that most Americans would find intolerable."

Fancher said a study made by his union, also in 1966, found that members of the Laborers worked an average of 814 hours a year—or "the equivalent of only five months full-time employment."

Seasonality "levies a staggering cost on a laborer and condemns him, through no fault of his own, to a marginal participation in what we in this country have come to consider the 'good life,'" he declared.

In calling for the bill's passage, Reynolds said that current employment fluctuations in the industry "result in a steady drain on unemployment insurance trust funds, far in excess of contributions by the construction industry."

He recalled that as far back as 1924 a government report recommended year-around construction and the scheduling of public works for the off season. The report was prepared by a then successful civil engineer, Herbert Hoover.

O'Hara suggested that the government might find that it "is a great deal cheaper to subsidize construction the year around" than continue the drain on jobless benefits funds.

Haggerty said building trades unions haven't proposed subsidies in this area, but he added "should such a program be tried, it is our feeling that it would more than pay for itself."

AFT's Cogen Not Running For Re-election

Pres. Charles Cogen of the Teachers announced that he will not be a candidate for re-election to the post he has held for four years.

"I feel that it is time for someone else to carry on," Cogen said as the union began preparations for its annual convention starting Aug. 19 in Cleveland, O.

Cogen was a classroom teacher before serving for 12 years as president of AFT Local 2 in New York City.

Under his leadership in both posts union locals won exclusive bargaining rights, more control over teaching conditions and collective bargaining contracts in numerous city school districts.

Two years ago he headed a slate of 18 AFT candidates pledged to "responsible militancy" in organizing, bargaining, and crusading for better public schools.

Lowry Succeeds Leighty:

TCU Chief Pledges Rail Merger Aims

St. Louis—The newly-elected president of the Transportation-Communication Employes—A. R. Lowry—pledged to "do everything possible" to implement a merger plan adopted by the union's convention here.

The proposal authorizes the union's top officers to contact the Railway & Airline Clerks and other unions as to merger possibilities.

If the grand lodge and general officers approve a merger plan, it is then to be submitted to TCU's membership which can ratify it by a majority vote.

Hailing the machinery for implementing a merger, Lowry said the convention's action "gives us an opportunity to move forward." He termed it a "fine thing for all railroad labor and for the entire labor movement."

The delegates elected Lowry to the presidency by a 166-165 secret-ballot vote over D. A. Bobo. Both men had been TCU vice presidents and Bobo subsequently was unanimously re-elected to his first vice president post.

The new president succeeds G. E. Leighty, who retired from office after heading the TCU, formerly the Railroad Telegraphers, since 1946. Leighty's leadership was praised in numerous addresses to the convention.

Pres. Harold Crotty of the Maintenance of Way Employes said that Leighty, more than any other single person, is responsible for "the 40 hour week for railroaders, the union shop and our health and welfare program."

Leighty was described by Pres. Michael Fox of the AFL-CIO Railway Employes Dept. as "a great American and one of the finest trade unionists I've ever had the privilege to work with."

After losing in his bid for the presidency, Bobo told the delegates: "It was a clean campaign and while it was only a one vote majority, I shall support Brother Lowry in the years to come."

Lowry, for his part, pledged relentless efforts to carry out the convention's program. "We came here as a house divided," he said, "but conclude as a house united."

The delegates approved a $12-a-year increase in per capita dues to the grand division, effective next Jan. 1 if the union does not join in a merger prior to that date.

Without a merger, it was explained, the increase would be urgently needed to finance increasing costs and offset declining income due to losses in membership, in turn due to a steady drop in railroad employment.

The convention adopted resolutions supporting a collective bargaining goal of a guaranteed annual wage, a cost-of-living clause; severance allowance for retiring employes; paid sick leave, and improvements in holidays and vacations.

Delegates also called for standardization of various rules on a national basis and adopted a provision that wage-rules settlements reached on railroads be subject to a majority vote of TCU's general chairmen.

In another action, the convention voted to give Canadian delegates the right hereafter to elect two vice presidents, a member of the board of directors and delegates to the Canadian Labor Congress convention.

TCU Sec.-Treas. L. H. Freeman was unanimously re-elected and three new vice presidents were elected to fill the vacancies left by Lowry and by retiring Vice Presidents O. C. Jones and R. J. Woodman.

The new vice presidents are Ralph O. Norton, S. T. Bishop and Richard I. Kilroy. Incumbent vice presidents re-elected are: F. E. Easterbrook, H. D. Smith, J. W. Whitehouse, J. I. Steed, S. Z. Plackin and R. C. Smith.

NEWLY-ELECTED Pres. A. R. Lowry of the Transportation-Communication Employes, right, receives the gavel from G. E. Leighty, left, who retired after 22 years in the union's top post. The TCU convention that elected Lowry also re-elected L. H. Freeman, center, as the union's secretary-treasurer.

Top Officers Re-elected by Rail Firemen

Houston, Tex.—Pres. H. E. Gilbert and four other top international officers were re-elected by acclamation at the 39th convention of the Locomotive Firemen & Enginemen. Gilbert, who has served as chief executive of the BLF&E since 1953, was chosen unanimously for another four-year term as president of the 60,000-member brotherhood.

Other top officers re-elected were M. W. Hampton, assistant president; Robert W. Bryant, secretary-treasurer; William C. Midcap, editor and manager of BLF&E publications, and A. M. Lampley, vice president and national legislative representative.

Thirteen of the fourteen incumbent vice presidents were also re-elected. The fourteenth vice president, Martin L. Mellett of Roselle, N.J., was defeated by Thomas W. Keating, Jr., of Pittsburgh, Pa. Keating had served formerly as vice general chairman of the Pennsylvania Railroad with offices in Philadelphia.

In accepting re-election, Gilbert, 61, noted that this would be his last convention and his last term of office. The BLF&E meets to elect international officers only every four or five years and brotherhood rules require officers to retire at 65. Gilbert will be succeeded upon retirement by Hampton.

Before electing officers, the nearly 1,000 delegates from the United States and Canada also took action on several constitutional amendments and held elections for members of the board of directors.

In later sessions of the convention, the delegates were scheduled to act on a resolution supporting unity with the Trainmen, the Signalmen and the Conductors & Brakemen.

Pilot, Stewardess Cited For Air Safety Efforts

Seattle—A veteran commercial plane pilot and an airline stewardess were honored for their contributions to air safety at the 15th annual safety forum of the Air Line Pilots here.

Capt. Richard H. Beck, New York-based Trans World Airlines pilot who has been flying for more than 28 years, received an ALPA award "for his contribution to all-weather flying development, and his perseverance in formulating criteria for safe operations during adverse flying conditions."

Miss Del Russell, who flies from Los Angeles as a stewardess for Western Airlines Intl., was cited "for her persistent efforts to improve cabin safety for stewardesses and the public" while serving as the union's central safety chairman on her airline from April 1967 through January 1968.

Beck has flown 54 different types of aircraft during his career. He has been flying for TWA's international division for 17 years.

Since 1963, the union said in its citation, Beck produced five major papers that have become "must" reading in his profession. Among them were studies of jet noise abatement and jet crew fatigue.

He became air safety chairman of TWA's international pilot group in 1962, and a member of his union's all-weather flying committee in 1963.

On May 10, 1967, he was the first airline pilot in the U.S. to make a blind landing at Oakland, Calif., in a passenger-carrying jet transport using only a "head up display system" of guidance with no reference to conventional panel instruments or outside visual clues, ALPA reported.

Miss Russell was safety chairman of her local union executive council in San Francisco before becoming central safety chairman for ALPA stewardesses on Western.

During 1967 she worked on a safety research project with her air line. Evacuation methods were tested, such as exits for children. A study was made involving baggage carried on by passengers. As a result, some company manuals were revised, the union said.

Gen. William F. McKee, chief of the Federal Aviation Administration, was keynote speaker at the awards banquet.

Capt. Clay Vagneur, chairman of ALPA's training plans committee, told the safety forum that there are no valid reasons, considering flight simulators and modern training methods, for risking lives in planes by requiring "repeated engine-out training close to the ground or extensive 'under the hood' flying in congested airport traffic patterns."

Capt. E. K. Banning, chairman of ALPA's B-747 evaluation committee, said ground facilities, airports and surface transit lines have not kept pace with aircraft progress. He called for greater use by airlines of safety equipment such as fireproof and toxic-free interiors of planes, and a greater airline role in reversing the "tide of pollution in our skies."

ALPA Pres. Charles H. Ruby said airports are not prepared for new aircraft and called for effort by all aviation industry elements to develop a "total systems concept" of future needs.

House, Senate Approve Vocational School Aid

authorized expenditures beyond what was recommended by the Administration. The Senate bill calls for $2.2 billion over three years and the House authorizes $1.4 billion for two years. These and some other differences are to be ironed out in conference.

In the Senate, a bipartisan amendment was offered to the vocational education bill to provide an additional $100 million a year for three years to expand the program of feeding needy school children.

The amendment, backed by the AFL-CIO, was offered by Senators Jacob K. Javits (R-N.Y.), Joseph S. Clark (D-Pa.), Edward W. Brooke (R-Mass.) and Philip A. Hart (D-Mich.).

They said the amendment offered the only possible way to get these funds through the Senate at this late date in Congress. The House previously had authorized the added $100 million a year in a separate bill.

Although the amendment did not go through, it led to approval of a substitute proposal offered by Sen. Allen J. Ellender (D-La.) to provide an added $50 million a year.

Congressional leaders said their move at least assures added funds for the school lunch program. Meanwhile, liberal lawmakers were planning further moves to secure the additional $50 million okayed by the House.

The Senate approved a labor-opposed amendment to its vocational education bill that would transfer Head Start, the pre-school training program for poor children, from the Office of Economic Opportunity to the Office of Education.

Sen. Peter H. Dominick (R-Colo.) got the amendment approved, 60 to 29, even though the Senate had rejected the same proposal last year.

Bertrand M. Harding, OEO acting director, described the amendment as "most harmful to a coordinated approach to the problems of poverty . . . and the best interests of the poor."

The Senate-passed higher education bill would extend existing programs of federal aid to help students, colleges and universities at a cost of $13.8 billion in fiscal 1969 and three succeeding years.

It also calls for new programs authorized at $241.7 million over the 1970-72 period, to include aid to cooperative education, educational television, graduate programs, training for public service and clinical experience programs for law schools.

Long Lines Agreement Averts CWA Bell Strike

New York—Negotiators for the Communications Workers and the long lines division of the American Telephone & Telegraph Co. stopped the clock at midnight July 17 and reached agreement a few hours later on a new contract for 24,000 long distance operators, plant craftsmen, cable constructors and engineering workers.

The old contract was due to expire at midnight. A similar clock-stopping technique was used in St. Louis by CWA and Southwestern Bell Telephone Co. to complete bargaining on a new agreement for 50,000 Bell employes in Missouri, Texas, Oklahoma, Kansas and Arkansas.

Both pacts follow the "pattern" set earlier in CWA-Bell negotiations. The long lines settlement is subject to a mail referendum ballot of CWA members between now and August 15. The Southwestern Bell terms are effective at once under a prior agreement between the union and management.

A day before the long lines settlement, CWA negotiators asked the union's executive board to authorize a nationwide strike, previously sanctioned by CWA's bargaining unit members by a 3-1 margin. Bargaining then resumed until agreement was reached.

The pact gives employes benefit increases of 19.58 percent over three years, with the top rate rising by $12 a week the first year, and an additional $6 in each of the next two years. Top operators' rates were raised by $8, $4 and $4 a week per year, with proportionate rates to other employes, and some changes in geographic differentials and working conditions.

The St. Louis agreement was concluded without a strike vote, six hours after the expiration deadline. Employes of Southwestern Bell in the traffic, plant, commercial, accounting, and directory sales department of the five-state area will get wage hikes and other benefits totaling 19.58 percent over a three-year span.

Pay Hike Won In Canadian Seaway Strike

Ottawa, Ont.—St. Lawrence Seaway workers in Canada ended a 24-day strike over contract terms by ratifying an offer of a 19 percent wage increase over a three-year period; an improved vacation provision, and an 11th paid holiday—Boxing Day, Dec. 26.

The settlement brought wages closer to the level of U.S. Seaway workers, a major objective of the strikers.

The Canadian Brotherhood of Railway, Transport & General Workers, affiliated with the Canadian Labor Congress, represents 1,250 bridge and lock operators, maintenance crews and office workers on the Seaway. They struck June 21 for wage parity and protection against replacement of men by machines.

The Spoiler

THE RADICAL RIGHT did not die with the Goldwater disaster in 1964; it has taken on new life in the George Wallace campaign of 1968.

The fanaticism that sparked the rightwing drive four years ago is evident anew in the campaign that is expected to put Wallace's American Independent Party on the ballot in nearly all the states in time for the November voting.

And the intensity of the drive is showing up in the national opinion polls. The former Alabama governor nearly doubled his support from April to July, according to the Gallup Poll, moving from 9 to 16 percent. A substantial share of that vote would normally go to Republican candidates, according to the poll.

The Wallace campaign is compounded of many elements, nearly all of them out of the classic handbook of the radical right. There are the attacks on the Supreme Court, the liberals, the intellectuals and anything that smacks of progress. It is all wrapped up with the standard oversimplifications and epithets and packaged to appeal to the fears and uncertainties of the American people as they face up to the complex and difficult problems of our times.

Wallace's stance is typical of the appeal—he's long on oratory and earthy rhetoric and short on substance. His record as governor of Alabama can perhaps best be summarized by these measurements:

- Alabama ranks 48th among the states in per capita annual income and is $900 below the national average.
- Alabama ranks 48th among states in per-pupil expenditures in public schools.
- Alabama ranks 49th in welfare payments for dependent children.
- Alabama has one of the highest illiteracy rates in the nation.

This is after Wallace's terms as governor of the state where his record is devoid of any concern for the workers, for the welfare of the men and women in the plants, the mills, the stores.

ON THIS record Wallace is now bidding for the presidency, for an opportunity to put into operation on a national level the policies which have left Alabama near the bottom of the heap.

The Gallup Poll says that the prototype of a Wallace supporter is a white male living in the South, a Protestant, a person with a grade school education and mostly employed in clerical or sales work.

The poll notes also that the rise in support for Wallace from April to July reflects a doubling of support among union families—from 9 to 17 percent.

A look at the governor's record in Alabama should quickly convince any trade union member that support for Wallace is against the worker's own self interest as well as a subversion of the national interest.

Wallace has clearly spelled out his role in this election—to be a spoiler. He would deny the major party candidates the necessary margin of votes in the Electoral College, if he has his way in the election, unless they "deal" with him on future policies, programs and appointments.

The radical right was stopped cold in its tracks in 1964. It must be stopped again in 1968 with the overwhelming repudiation of George Wallace.

Shady Marketplace:

Weak Laws Permit Swindles To Rob Consumers of Billions

A SAVAGE INDICTMENT of the mercenaries among merchants is punched out in human terms by Sen. Warren G. Magnuson in his new and angry book, "The Dark Side of the Marketplace."

The Washington Democrat rips antiquated debt-collecting laws as "instruments of extortion." They are, he says, "as destructive and vicious as the debtor's dungeons" of centuries past.

The book is broken into two equally devastating parts. The first deals with widespread legal larceny committed by those who prey generally on people least able to cope with their con game.

The second is a chilling exposure of the extent to which millions of unsuspecting Americans are endangered—often maimed and killed—by those who profit through a lack of laws protecting the health and safety of the individual.

Magnuson, chairman of the Senate Commerce Committee, estimates that there are some 800 varieties of deceptive selling practices that legally rob Americans "of several billion dollars yearly—more than is lost through robbery, burglary, larceny, auto theft, embezzlement and forgery combined."

Weak state laws—and in some cases states with no consumer protection at all—combine with a lack of federal statutes to permit the swindles. A few states, like Washington, have stronger statutes, and the results are startling.

While noting that there is no color line where swindlers are involved, Sen. Magnuson writes that "the evils of allowing legalized thievery to flourish are nowhere more strikingly evident than among the poor, especially the minority groups in the ghettos."

He terms the exploitation of the poor in the ghetto "one of the silent shames of our country. From coast to coast, mainly in our urban areas, those who can least afford to pay are paying unconscionable prices for junk, pawned off on them though trickery, deceit and fraud."

He reports of stores luring customers with "easy to purchase credit" transistor radios for $59.50 which cost the stores $3.45 each, of toasters marked up from $5.49 to $49.50, of sets of aluminum cookware hiked from $6.47 to $69.50.

A disturbing aspect in the credit swindle is the fact brought out by Magnuson that many of the rackets could not operate without the cooperation of financial institutions—and that many of the most prestigious moneylending institutions are providing the green lifeline to the hucksters. He names the Chase Manhattan Bank of New York City, the First Pennsylvania Banking & Trust Co. of Philadelphia and Sherwood & Roberts, largest finance company in Seattle, as examples of those who have profited from the deals made by the merchants of menace.

He reports that today's credit debt is $95 billion, excluding mortgages.

"The interest and finance charges on this consumer credit debt is $13 billion, almost as much as the interest payments on the entire $300 billion federal debt," he writes.

THE SECTION ON HEALTH AND SAFETY aptly opens with a chapter titled "200,000,000 Guinea Pigs." Revealed are such items as:

- About 100,000 persons will be cut, disfigured or killed this year while walking through glass doors. Safety glass could prevent this carnage.
- Accidents are the number one cause of death for persons aged one through 36.
- 100,000 persons will be mangled or killed while operating power mowers. Rotary mowers will amputate feet and hands, even though blades can be designed to stop when the operator releases the handle, and even though blades will cut grass just as well at 11,000 rpm as at the 21,000 rpm commonly used.
- Fire will engulf 150,000 persons who will suffer excruciating pain, often scars and not infrequently death because the fabric they wear, as well as their bedding and upholstery, is flammable.
- A thousand persons will be electrocuted and many times a thousand will be burned and injured by faulty electrical equipment.
- Babies will be strangled in ill-designed cribs.

A $2 device that automatically releases the wringers on a washing machine would prevent 100,000 children and the same number of adults from "the horror of seeing their hands, fingers, arms and clothing being caught and fed through turning rollers."

The device has been available since 1940. Yet in 1966, the authors report, 300,000 wringer-washing machines were sold without it.

Magnuson and co-author Miss Jean Carper have avoided the temptation to write in technical terms. They have told it like it is.

1968 Political Mix:

Conventions Hold Key to Voter In Year of Election Surprises

The following is excerpted from "The Candidates and the Conventions," by John M. Barry, which appears in the July 1968 issue of the AFL-CIO American Federationist.

SELDOM HAS THE AMERICAN voter been confronted, at mid-summer of a presidential election year, with so many uncertainties as in 1968.

A series of decisions and events has alternately stunned and horrified him, creating doubt, confusion and a troubled national mood as the two major political parties approach their national conventions. A campaign that just four months ago seemed almost pre-ordained has suddenly been transformed into a giant question-mark.

But the complicated politics of this presidential year will soon be simplified by that most peculiar of American institutions, the nominating conventions. After the Republicans meet in Miami Beach, Aug. 5-8, and the Democrats in Chicago, Aug. 26-29, there will be only two major candidates in the field.

At this stage, Vice Pres. Hubert H. Humphrey is far out in front in his quest for the Democratic nomination for President. And former Vice Pres. Richard M. Nixon holds a commanding lead among the Republican contenders. Barring the unforeseen, both must be considered heavy favorites to capture the nominations on early ballots.

Yet the unforeseen has become the norm in 1968. Less than four months ago, for example, Humphrey was not even in the presidential picture.

The catalogue of surprise began mildly enough on Feb. 28, when Michigan Gov. George Romney announced he was pulling out of New Hampshire's first-in-the-nation presidential preference primary, leaving the Republican field to front-runner Nixon and a shadowy write-in challenge from supporters of New York Gov. Nelson Rockefeller.

Then followed, in rapid sequence:

- The unexpectedly strong showing of Sen. Eugene J. McCarthy of Minnesota in polling more than 42 percent of the New Hampshire Democratic vote against fewer than 50 percent in write-in votes for Pres. Johnson.
- The announcement by Sen. Robert F. Kennedy of New York that he was entering the Democratic race.
- The declaration by Rockefeller that he was not a candidate, "directly or indirectly, for the presidency of the United States."
- The President's dramatic withdrawal from the campaign with his nationally televised announcement that "I shall not seek and I will not accept the nomination of my party for another term as your President."
- Johnson's decision, announced in the same broadcast, to de-escalate the bombing of North Viet Nam and his overtures to Hanoi that subsequently led to the Paris peace talks.
- The assassination of Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr., leader of the non-violent civil rights movement, and the angry wave of ghetto rioting that followed.
- Humphrey's formal entry as a candidate for the Democratic nomination.
- The switch of Rockefeller from the stance of a non-candidate to an active bid for the Republican nomination "right up to the last vote."
- The assassination of Kennedy that transformed his California victory celebration into a new tragedy for the entire nation.

Then there is the third-party threat of former Alabama Gov. George C. Wallace, a threat that causes uneasiness among both Democrats and Republicans, but particularly the latter.

Wallace, at this writing, had filed enough petitions to secure listing on the ballots of 25 states and he hopes to extend his candidacy to nearly all the states. The polls show him with 10 to 18 percent of the total vote in his corner, with the great bulk of his support in the southern states carried by Goldwater in 1964—Alabama, Georgia, Louisiana, Mississippi and South Carolina.

WHILE WALLACE TALKS occasionally of going to the White House, he is quick to acknowledge that his main objective is to carry enough states to prevent either major candidate from capturing a majority of the Electoral College (270 votes).

Having accomplished that, he would then be in a position to work a deal—a "covenant," he prefers to call it—with one candidate or the other over federal policies and appointments. If the candidates refuse to play Wallace's game, the election would be thrown into the House where each state would cast a single vote controlled by the party with majority representation.

The greater likelihood is that Wallace, who prefers to be called a "segregationist" rather than a "racist," will in fact carry some or all of the states that went to Goldwater, states the GOP had hoped to retain this year. At the least, he can be expected to siphon off ultra-conservative votes from the Republican candidate in a number of states, perhaps enough to throw them into the Democratic column.

As is often the case, the nature of the presidential campaigns will bear heavily on the make-up of Congress. A big Republican victory could well swing to the GOP the 31 seats they need to take control of the House. And conversely a strong showing by the Democratic candidate could bring back many of the 47 House seats the party lost in 1966.

On the Senate side, the Democrats have the most to lose with 23 seats at stake against 11 for the Republicans. Most of the Democratic senators seeking re-election are liberals and many of them face difficult contests.

But for now, the party nominating conventions hold the center of national attention. The speeches, the resolutions, the debate and finally the nominations that are the principal business of the conventions will distill and blend the complex ingredients of the 1968 political mix. And for the American voter they will provide at least some of the answers to the "unknowns" that presently confront him.

Success Hailed:

Youth Corps Trims School Dropout Rate

THE NEIGHBORHOOD YOUTH CORPS, now three and one-half years old, has been one of the nation's most successful anti-poverty programs, Labor Sec. Willard Wirtz reports.

Wirtz said the program has significantly reduced school dropouts and juvenile delinquency rates.

It has placed hundreds of thousands of hard-core jobless young people in permanent jobs and sent more thousands back to classrooms, he declared.

The Neighborhood Youth Corps has enrolled 1.4 million youngsters 14 years and over since it began in December 1964. Of this number 957,000 were in-school and summer enrollees and 439,000 were out-of-schoolers. The federal government has invested close to $1 billion in this effort.

On April 1, 1968 approximately 200,000 youths were enrolled and at work, 137,000 participating in the in-school program and 63,000 in the out-of-school program.

The latest study of enrollees reveals these characteristics:

- A third of the enrollees are from families with eight persons or more. The median family size is six persons.
- About a quarter of the enrollees come from families receiving public assistance.
- About one-half of the enrollees are from households headed by a father.
- Some 53 percent in the out-of-school program and 48 percent of in-school enrollees are non-white.

During the past year, the average out-of-schooler was paid $1.40 an hour, while his in-school counterpart was paid a minimum of $1.25 an hour.

Communities throughout the nation have reported dramatic cuts in school dropout rates as a result of the Neighborhood Youth Corps.

In Cleveland, the dropout rate among enrollees in 13 inner-city schools was 3 percent for the 1966-67 school year, compared to a dropout rate of 15 percent in these schools for non-NYC youth.

In Pittsburgh, a survey completed in May 1967 of all 16 high schools for the 1965-66 school year disclosed that the dropout rate for NYC enrollees was 4 percent or half the dropout rate for non-NYC students.

In Washington, D.C., a study of NYC teenagers during 1965 and 1966 at three high schools revealed that fewer than 2 percent of these youngsters had dropped out of school by June, 1967. The normal dropout rate for these schools is nearly 20 percent.

In Minneapolis, a study of 11 high schools for the 1966-67 school year revealed an overall dropout rate of 15 percent. Only 4 percent of the NYC enrollees quit school. Some 61 percent of the 1,766 enrollees in the project between September, 1966, and September, 1967, came from welfare families.

WIRTZ SAID the record shows that NYC youths get into less trouble with the law after they enroll.

In San Antonio, for example, juvenile delinquency declined nearly 13 percent in the slums last year, where NYC was operative, while it jumped 5.5 percent during the same period in the higher income areas of the city and county.

NYC enrollees serve as aides in libraries, schools, hospitals and other public and nonprofit institutions. The in-school program allows youngsters 14 and up to work in their spare time up to 15 hours a week. In the summer and out-of-school projects, enrollees spend up to 40 hours a week working or taking advantage of supportive services such as remedial education, job-related training, counseling and health care.

The Labor Dept.'s Manpower Administration funds up to 90 percent of the cost and lays down the guidelines. The local sponsor—a community action agency, a state agency, a municipality, a county institution or a school system—handles the administration, such as locating the work sites, recruitment, record-keeping and arranging for supportive services.

Labor Economist Says:

More and Better Jobs Needed To Solve Crisis For Negroes

MEETING THE SEVERE employment problems of young Negroes demands both more job openings and freer access to better quality jobs, an AFL-CIO economist declared on a network radio interview.

Minority group workers are often channeled into lower-paid jobs, said Marvin Friedman, assistant director of the AFL-CIO Research Dept. As a result, he said, underemployment may be an even more serious job-market problem for minority group youngsters than unemployment.

"It is not simply a question of dealing with the number of jobs in the aggregate," he declared.

"We have to come to grips" with helping these workers enter better-quality jobs "to which they do and should aspire." Friedman appeared on the AFL-CIO produced public affairs interview, Labor News Conference, broadcast Tuesdays at 7:35 p.m., EDT, on the Mutual Radio Network.

Friedman said that the special problems of unemployment and underemployment affecting young Negroes can't be resolved by "aggregative measures alone." He said there must be stepped-up programs of anti-discrimination, as well as greater training and educational efforts to help these workers qualify for better jobs.

The labor economist said that the problem of recruiting minority group youngsters for apprenticeship programs is in part due to lack of conviction that such opportunities are open to them.

He described efforts to build that understanding—to recruit applicants and help them get the preparation they need to qualify for apprenticeship programs. He said that such out-reach efforts are now operating in some 38 cities and "are steadily increasing."

MORE JOB OPENINGS and freer access to better quality jobs are essential in meeting the severe unemployment problems of young Negroes, AFL-CIO Asst. Research Dir. Marvin Friedman, center, declared on Labor News Conference. Questioning him on the public affairs program, broadcast Tuesdays on Mutual Radio, were Harry Conn, left, of Press Associates, Inc. and Alan Adams of Business Week magazine.

How to Buy:

Packaging Law Helps Make Shopping Mathematics Easier

By Sidney Margolius

THE NEW PACKAGING LAW which became partly effective July 1 fails to solve major shopping problems. However, if you use it, it can be of some help in selecting best values.

You still have to do some arithmetic to figure out the cost per ounce of different sizes of the same item. The section of the original "truth in packaging" bill that would have authorized establishment of standard units like a pound, half-pound, etc., was eliminated before the law was passed.

While such standard units would have made it simple for you to compare prices, the grocery manufacturers objected. They wanted to preserve your right to a free choice among different brands of tuna fish containing, respectively, 6, 6½, 7 and 7¾ ounces. They also wanted to preserve their right to package in such confusing ways.

So what you've got is a "clear labeling" law. At least it requires some uniformity for the placement of the "contents" declaration. Now you will find this information on about the lower third of the main panel (no more hunting all over the box or can). Too, the type now must be larger.

Moreover, the contents must be stated both in total ounces and pounds. For example, the label must say "18 ounces (1 lb. 2 oz.)." Or for liquids, the label might say "Net Contents—20 ounces (1 pt. 4 oz.)."

So you no longer have the problem of translating pounds, pints and quarts into ounces before dividing the number of ounces into the prices of X, Y and Z brands to see which is cheapest. But you still may have to cope with fractions.

A less-certain help is the requirement that manufacturers who state the number of servings they claim must also state the size of each serving. The Food & Drug Administration made a weak regulation here and manufacturers already have found ways to make it meaningless. For example, the new Lipton packages for "Beef Stroganoff," "Chicken Baronet" and similar dried foods, say "two adult-size main dishes," and then in smaller type further down, "two generous cupfuls."

Unfortunately the FDA gave the manufacturers lots of leeway, by permitting a serving to be defined in ounces, or tablespoons, or cupfuls. So you're still going to have to struggle to compare one manufacturer's idea of a serving with another's.

As before, ingredients must be listed on the package in order of predominance except when a standard of identity has been established by FDA. More people should look for this list to see what they are getting, not only in foods but also in non-prescription household medicines.

The FDA now also is requiring something new and somewhat useful in the list of ingredients on household drugs. Instead of just a list of the chemical ingredients, the chemical names must be accompanied by a description of the ingredient's action or purpose, such as, "decongestant" or "pain reliever."

Several additional features of the new law come under the jurisdiction of the Federal Trade Commission instead of FDA.

There has been some progress in that part of the law encouraging manufacturers to try voluntarily to standardize or at least reduce the confusing number of sizes.

The Commerce Dept. reports that 11 industries so far have agreed to cut the number of package sizes, including soluble coffee, cooking oils, green olives, detergents, paper towels, jellies, dry milk, salad dressings, rice, cereals and toothpaste.

The number of package sizes for these products will be reduced from 289 to 104. For example, the coffee packers are eliminating all sizes except even ounces from 2 to 16. There's still a lot of comparing to do but better than the present jungle. Betty Furness, the President's consumer assistant, points out, for example, that there now are 57 different sizes of toothpaste alone.

Sixty-eight other industries have said they too plan to reduce the number of package sizes.

If the Commerce Dept. continues to push this program, it will not only help you with your shopping, but will help keep down costs. The proliferation of package sizes has become an expense problem for stores, distributors and manufacturers themselves. This has to be included in the prices you pay. Many of the present variations are unnecessary.

Soup to Nonsense:

Power of Negative Thinking Conjures Up a Loser's Image

By Jane Goodsell

IF I WAKE UP at, say, 6:30 in the morning when it's too early to get up and too late to go back to sleep, I engage in a pastime known as Facing Facts. That's a fancy name for thinking about things in the grimmest possible way, and yesterday I spent a bleak half-hour considering the things that happen to other people but don't happen to me.

I've never had a doctor tell me I should go away for a while. I keep hearing about other people whose doctors advise them to head immediately for Palm Springs, Arizona, Gstaad or the third race at Pimlico, but I've never had a doctor advise me to go anywhere except for a brisk walk.

Secondly, I've never had a premonition that something awful was going to happen. Other people, with varying regularity, receive bad news with the announcement that they had a feeling that something like that was impending.

I've never had a dream come true, either. There is a school of thought which holds that dreams go by opposites, but I don't think I even qualify there—not unless you can count my dream of falling into the river as coming true exactly opposite because I didn't fall into the river.

Another thing: I never seem to go to the right places at the right times. I don't mean that I'm not punctual. Knowing where to go—and when—seems to depend not on clocks, but on extra-sensory perception, just as premonitions do.

Some lucky people have it. They are the ones who say to me after I've seen a stage play, "Oh, you should have gone Tuesday night before they censored all the best parts."

If I visit a resort, it turns out that I should have gone the year before. "It was marvelous then—lovely and unspoiled. But now it's become so touristy and commercial. Nobody goes there anymore."

I just miss catching glimpses of famous people. Why, only five minutes ago it seems that Mia Farrow or Kenneth Galbraith or one of the Supremes was at the very next table.

Well, I guess there's no use brooding about these things. And anyway, about a quarter of seven this morning I had a cheering thought. Back in the days when I was a kid, you could get twice-as-big candy bars for only a nickel. I think maybe I'll start hanging around the school playground to tell the children what they're missing.

Use Trash Can to Beat Mail Cheats, FTC Says

If you didn't order it and don't use it, you don't have to pay for it—or even return it.

That's the advice the Federal Trade Commission gives in its Consumer Bulletin No. 2, dealing with unordered merchandise.

Unless the recipient has signed a contract—as with a book or record club—to pay for or return merchandise, he is free to throw all the dunning letters he receives in the wastebasket, along with the unwanted merchandise.

In fact, the FTC bulletin says, firms that seek payment or return of unordered goods must include a clear statement that the recipient "is under no obligation either to return the merchandise to the sender or to preserve it intact" and is required to pay for it only if he uses it or decides to purchase it.

Another FTC pamphlet, titled Fight Back, tells consumers what steps to take to "avoid being gypped" and to put a stop to business cheats.

Both pamphlets are available on request from the Federal Trade Commission, 6th St. & Pennsylvania Ave., NW, Washington, D.C. 20580.

Look at Tomorrow:

Big Changes Seen In Transportation

TOMORROW'S TRANSPORTATION system is going to make today's look like a throwback to the days of the oxcart, but it will have one basic purpose—to enable workers to get to and from their jobs better than they can now.

In a message to Congress transmitting a summary report of a major study of future transportation systems, Pres. Johnson stressed that the basic idea is "to ease the problems of Americans who live in, or commute to, work in cities."

The first major federal study of the subject has been made through the Dept. of Housing & Urban Development and some idea of what is now going on in the field is available.

Here are some of the projects that the transportation experts are playing around with:

- Dial-a-Bus: You pick up the telephone and notify the transportation company where you are, where you want to go and when you want to be picked up. A computer figures out the best way to handle yours and similar calls and a bus—midway between a regular one and a taxi cab—is sent to pick you up.
- Personal Rapid Transit: These are small vehicles which would travel over a right-of-way or a guideway network and would provide you with your own transportation which would then be available to other people when you are finished with it.
- Automated Dual Purpose Bus: This would be a combination of short-haul regular bus service, plus high-speed long-haul automated trips on a private right of way.
- Pallet or Ferry System: This is an extension of the piggy-back railroad freight transportation, the use of pallets to carry automobiles, minibuses and freight on high speed guideways.
- Fast Intraurban Transit Links: This is somewhat of a throwback to the old interurban days when fast electric cars were used to carry passengers from one nearby city to another. Speeds in excess of 100 miles an hour would be common, cars would be automated and the cost of operation theoretically would be much less than today's commuting systems.
- New Systems for Major Activity Centers: The idea behind this is to use various modes of transportation in concentrated areas—moving belts, vacuum tubes, monorails, coordinated taxi systems. Some of the vehicles would operate on guideways, others would be overhead.

One section of the study deals with the inadequacy of today's transportation systems for the physically handicapped, the poor and the elderly. This section said that the cost of living in cities is substantially greater for low-wage workers than for others. Inability to get cheap—frequency any kind of—transportation limits job opportunities, limits places to live, makes people dependent on others for transportation and makes it difficult for workers to reach public places.

The elderly and the handicapped, in addition, need such facilities as elevators at all rapid transit stations, redesign of escalators to accommodate wheelchairs and experimentation with small fleets of buses designed especially for the two groups. (PAI)

UNION LABEL AND SERVICE TRADES DEPT., AFL-CIO

Concern for Jobs:

Stage Union Hits 'Runaway' Filming

Kansas City, Mo.—Delegates of the Theatrical Stage Employes examined their present state of progress and problems of the industry from the broad perspective of history as the union opened its 75th anniversary convention here.

The foreign "runaway" filming problem was a major topic of concern as the 1,200 delegates opened the union's 49th convention. With about a third of the IATSE membership centered in the Hollywood area, the union has seen as many as 14,000 of its members there out of work at one time. Foreign production of American films, running as high as 65 percent of the industry's production, was described as seriously affecting employment opportunities of American workers.

IATSE Pres. Richard F. Walsh, in his report to the convention, said the executive board has concluded that action may be necessary to show the public how much is being lost to the country in runaway film production. Expenditures for such an undertaking have been authorized by the board, Walsh reported, if no other remedy is forthcoming.

"I will not hesitate to use, if necessary, the full power granted to me by the executive board to help correct the serious imbalance which has developed," Walsh said.

Union members were urged to shun foreign-produced films and to patronize, instead, the pictures which have given full employment to American craftsmen.

A joint committee representing the producers, the distributors and the union has been established to explore the problems and to consider possible solutions to runaway film production. Conferences with the two California senators, Thomas Kuchel and George Murphy, have explored the possibilities of some form of government financial assistance, such as the Eady plan used in England, to wholly American-produced films.

The opening sessions of the convention also focused on the need for training of new craftsmen. Despite a high retirement rate in the Hollywood area, chronic unemployment in that segment of the industry makes it difficult to recruit new workers for the industry.

In the distribution section, on the other hand, the growing number of theaters has left many locals hard-pressed to fill the newly created jobs. The big problem, in these days of full employment, Walsh stated, is to persuade enough young people to enter a craft which calls for evening and weekend work.

IATSE was established in Elk's Hall in New York on July 17, 1893, by unions of stage employes from 10 cities—New York, Chicago, Pittsburgh, Philadelphia, Cincinnati, St. Louis, Denver, Syracuse, Buffalo and Boston.

This year's gathering is the union's third convention in Kansas City. The first was held in 1936, in the depths of the great depression when unemployment and depressed wages were paramount issues.

In contrast, the convention this year is taking note that it is meeting just one year after Montreal Expo '67, which has been widely hailed as sparking a new era in the spectacular and imaginative use of motion picture film. "I see the role of our own international growing—because increased leisure will sharply step up the need for entertainment," Walsh said in concluding his report to the union.

Among speakers scheduled to address later sessions of the convention were Missouri Gov. Warren E. Hearnes; Jack Valenti, president of the Motion Picture Association of America; Sherrill C. Corwin, board chairman, National Association of Theater Owners; Al Barkan, national director, AFL-CIO Committee on Political Education, and Vice Adm. Arnold F. Schade, commander of the Atlantic Submarine Force.

A $5,000 CHECK is presented by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany to Executive Dir. Palmer Dearing of the Group Health Association of America. It is the first year's allocation of a $25,000 contribution over five years voted by the Executive Council in support of a GHAA project under a government contract to develop group practice prepayment health plans.

Labor Invests In Developing Health Plans

A project through which Group Health Association of America will develop group practice prepayment health plans has received an initial $5,000 contribution from the AFL-CIO.

The Executive Council in May voted to contribute $5,000 a year over five years to the program being carried out by GHAA through a contract with Public Health Service.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany presented Palmer Dearing, GHAA executive director, with a check to meet the federation's pledge for the first year.

Under the project, funded by PHS at a level of $165,000 annually with the first year amount of $124,000 for nine months, GHAA will conduct feasibility studies to select three target cities.

A project director and three field staff representatives, still to be named, will then go into these cities to assist them "in the design and creation of a comprehensive" group practice prepayment plan.

From these initial cities, it is expected that the project will be expanded to other cities throughout the nation over the five-year period.

An advisory committee for the project will be named to include leaders in labor and prepaid group practice, as well as experts from the medical care field. A majority of representatives on the committee will be from labor.

In each of the cities where group practice prepayment plans are being drawn up, the project will work closely with representatives of AFL-CIO state and local central bodies.

Leather Workers Stress Organizing, Job Security

New York—Delegates to the sixth convention of the Leather Workers called on all local unions to emphasize organizing as their major activity and voted unanimously to endorse the candidacy of Vice Pres. Hubert H. Humphrey for the presidency.

Pres. Richard B. O'Keefe and Sec.-Treas. Joseph A. Duffy were returned without a contest. Board member Joseph Sek of Gowanda, N.Y. Local 44, won the vice presidency by one vote in a contest with board member Gordon W. Paul to succeed Vice Pres. Richard K. Stapleton.

The convention re-elected eight board members, including Paul. Four new members were named to fill vacancies—Joseph Ranno of Peabody, Mass.; John Zabielski of Winchester, N.H.; Richard Mentley of Gowanda, N.Y. and Richard Demers of North Andover, Mass.

The officers reported bargaining gains since the last convention and stressed the need for continued protection against job losses due to automated machinery.

Dir. of Organization Edward J. Freeman told of delays open to employers under the National Labor Relations Act and court rulings. He cited one Northeast election victory which took two years to fight through the labor board and the courts, though the union won every round.

A major need is a revival of union spirit in all phases of labor activity, Freeman asserted.

The convention adopted a series of resolutions supporting AFL-CIO legislative objectives, including more protection for the consumer, particularly elderly persons, against the high cost of drugs; more participation by union members in community services, and improved training programs to meet the crisis caused by automation.

Idaho Unionists Rally To Fight Right Wingers

Pocatello, Ida.—The Idaho AFL-CIO has grown substantially in the past year and must marshal all its strength to meet the challenge of far-right-wing extremists in the future, Pres. Robert W. Macfarlane reported to the annual state federation convention.

Macfarlane stressed the need for voting in the Aug. 6 primary elections, and for registering and voting in the general elections Nov. 5. Every labor family must be alerted to the danger of complacency in the face of a resurgent anti-labor movement, he said.

The federation president, first elected a year ago, reported that the National Right to Work Committee has returned to Idaho for its eighth attempt to weaken and divide labor. Seven previous campaigns for a law forbidding the union shop in labor-management contracts were frustrated by statewide labor and community leaders.

By unanimous vote convention delegates asked for a change in the wage-hour law which permits potato processing plants to be exempted for 20 weeks a year from the overtime provisions of the Fair Labor Standards Act. The exemption was designed to protect sellers of perishable crops but is no longer needed because growers have ample storage facilities, delegates from the Grain Millers and the Meat Cutters told the convention.

Macfarlane was authorized to name a committee to draft a proposed change in the law with the aid of the AFL-CIO and its Legislative Dept. Nearly 5,000 workers would be affected in Idaho alone, Macfarlane said.

The convention updated its constitution to meet changed conditions and adopted a series of resolutions supporting labor goals, including increased appropriations for the work of the U.S. Dept. of Labor; genuine collective bargaining for state, city and county employes, and an increase in workmen's compensation benefits.

Sen. Frank Church (D-Idaho) complimented labor for its role in helping achieve liberal legislation and thanked Idaho unionists for their support of his candidacy.

Stanton Smith, AFL-CIO coordinator of state and city central bodies, warned the delegates that "exhortation alone" will not do the job of returning Church and other able candidates to the Congress. Needed, he said, is "organized effort based on a sound program."

Textile Workers Ratify Viscose Pact

New York—The Textile Workers Union of America reported here that 9,000 workers in six plants of FMC Corp.'s American Viscose Division have ratified a new three-year agreement that will provide an improvement package valued at 55 cents an hour.

Terms announced by William S. Davis, the union's synthetic fibers director, call for wage hikes totaling 49 cents an hour—22 cents retroactive to June 1, a second raise of 13 cents a year later and the final installment of 14 cents an hour due June 1, 1970.

Davis said improvements in vacations, life insurance and hospital, accident and medical benefits are valued at 6 cents an hour. TWUA members involved are at plants in Lewistown, Meadville and Marcus Hook, Pa.; Nitro and Parkersburg, W.Va., and at Front Royal, Va.

Longshoremen Launch Talks on Key Contract

New York—A master contract covering 60,000 dockworkers at North Atlantic ports, loading and unloading of all containers by union members at the piers, along with substantial pay and fringe improvements, highlight proposals made by the Longshoremen in negotiations here.

The negotiations are technically with the New York Shipping Association, but the union committee includes representatives from ports from Maine to Virginia and employer representatives from other ports have been sitting in on the talks.

ILA Pres. Thomas W. Gleason said a national contract would provide advantages to the entire industry as well as to union members through increased stability.

Gleason said automation and containerization have increased productivity on some piers by as much as 500 percent. The union's proposals on wages, pensions and guaranteed incomes, he said, would "to some degree reflect this increased productivity."

Initial union proposals include a basic hourly wage of $6 with doubletime for overtime—compared with the present $3.62 scale—and a six-hour workday instead of eight hours.

The union is also asking a major improvement in pensions, payable regardless of age after 20 years service, and added holidays.

It has asked for a guaranteed weekly wage, without deduction for the cost of fringe benefits, to replace the present guaranteed annual wage.

Management has not yet come up with a counter-offer in key areas, the union said, and talks have been recessed until Aug. 9.

The existing contract with the New York Shipping Association expires Sept. 30 and both sides have expressed hope that a settlement can be negotiated by that deadline.

Alien Work Permit Rule Termed Vital

A proposed Labor Dept. regulation dealing with employment of aliens has been endorsed by the AFL-CIO as "desirable" and "very necessary."

Aliens now can be admitted either under a visitor's visa, which does not permit them to work in the United States, or under a section of the Immigration Act which allows them to be brought in to accept employment which does not lessen job opportunities, wages or working conditions of American citizens.

AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller noted that some employers have deliberately hired aliens with only a visitor's permit—often at substandard wages. The proposed regulation would bar "employment offers" needed to admit aliens under a work permit by employers who within the preceding three years had knowingly hired aliens with only a visitor's visa.

An estimated 50,000 to 60,000 such aliens are illegally employed in New York City alone, Biemiller noted.

He said in a letter to Labor Sec. Willard Wirtz that these knowing violations have resulted both in exploitation of alien workers and depriving American workers of jobs.

Humphrey Program: 'To Extend...

In 20 years as a U.S. senator and as Vice President, Hubert H. Humphrey has compiled a liberal, creative public record that is familiar to most trade unionists.

He has pioneered, or vigorously championed, bold programs in virtually every legislative sphere—social security and medicare, the war on poverty at home and abroad, federal aid to education, jobs and manpower training, world peace and disarmament, etc.

It has been said, indeed, that nearly every piece of progressive legislation enacted over the past 20 years bears the Humphrey imprint.

But what of America's problems now? What of the future?

The Vice President, in seeking the Democratic Party's nomination for President, has begun to present his program to the people. That program for the nation is summarized on these pages as it has emerged from Humphrey's campaign statements thus far.

Human Rights

I reject the idea that we have to be two nations, black and white . . . or two nations, North and South . . . or two nations, rich and poor. No responsible person wants that. There is a vast silent group of Americans—a majority of many millions—that wants to make this country work . . . that wants safety and equal rights for everyone . . that bears no ill will against other Americans. I think this silent America—an America still unaroused—can be aroused. I mean to try.

So I would set to work, on my very first day in office, to pull this country together, and then, to see if we couldn't pull the world a little closer back to sanity and peace.

The Negro is not and should not be satisfied with speeches about fulfilling the Emancipation Proclamation. He wants specifics—a skill and a job for himself, a pleasant home for his wife and family, a good school for his children. He wants to be a full participant in American society—an equal partner with first-class citizenship.

. . . I count this fulfillment of human rights as the central issue of our times; and I expect in the months ahead to contribute the best that is in me to the formulation, through democracy's essential process, of a new and complete national commitment to human rights.

The next President will face, as have few before him, the insistent demand now for one citizenship for all Americans—one birthright of freedom and opportunity to which all may claim equal inheritance.

We shall know in our time whether this democratic ideal can be won—or whether America, despite her momentous achievements and her promise, will become another of history's false starts.

Realizing the fullness of our democracy will depend, first and foremost, upon our ability to extend the promise of American society to every citizen in an environment where the rights of all are preserved—peacefully and without violence.

The Environment

Our commitment is to conserve and enrich the new America we are creating . . . We can no longer neglect great urban resources, such as our city waterfronts. We can no longer afford heedlessly to discharge more wastes into our rivers and streams. Our country is not so rich that it can afford unthinkingly to destroy historic places that give us our identity with our past.

Our country is not so strong that it can afford to alter the human environment by changing the course of a wilderness river, or by laying down a new expressway . . . without first considering what it does to the quality of our lives.

The rivers . . . the wooded hillsides . . . the lakes . . . the Redwoods . . . the North Cascade forests . . . have values which must be measured not by dollars alone but by their contribution to the personal well-being of men . . . It will take the commitment of all our institutions . . . public and private . . . and all of our citizens . . . to secure quality in our environment . . . There is room in America for the highways and the wilderness.

Pollution—like migration, modern transportation and much else that goes with our contemporary society—has little respect for our present jurisdictional boundaries, many of which were drawn in an agrarian age.

Our existing anti-pollution programs recognize the necessity of close regional cooperation.

I believe, however, that we shall need to go farther—to create totally new Regional Pollution Authorities, which would be funded by the states or localities covered and authorized to receive and administer federal anti-pollution funds.

But sustained and efficient pollution control will require more than what are essentially public programs designed to clean up after industry.

In our free enterprise economy, acceptable disposal of wastes should rightfully be a normal part of doing business. Any additional costs involved should be treated as regular operating costs—costs which the man in the street must be prepared to share when he buys a box of stationery or a new car.

Jobs

We must recognize the civil right of every American to earn a living.

The richest society man has ever known cannot afford to permit the festering frustration of unemployment which can so easily erupt into violence. Jobs bring dignity to the individual and resources to his family—and wealth to the nation.

The idea of guaranteeing decent jobs to everybody who will work at them makes sense—with private employers providing job opportunities to the fullest extent possible, and with the government making whatever back-up or financing arrangements are necessary.

I don't believe that anyone wants a welfare check or a handout. I believe people want the dignity and the self-respect that comes from an honest job.

And it is now within our power to see that everyone who wants a job has that job. And for those who cannot support themselves because of age, illness, or disability, it is time to provide enough help to permit people to lift their heads in self-respect.

If there is one thing that Americans ought to have as a top priority, that is maximum performance of this economy, maximum participation of the people in this democracy, a vital, vibrant economy, a vital democracy, and when we have it, there is no power on the face of this earth that can stand up against us. . . . It is the best foreign policy, my fellow Americans, an effective social policy here at home, domestic and social economic policy.

As we approach the 200th anniversary of our independence, it is clear that America faces a new challenge—the challenge of using its material plenty to provide a full and free life for all its citizens.

That means building cities that are safe and clean.

It means eliminating the slums and joblessness, poor education and hopelessness that are part of our urban environment today.

To me—and I feel this very deeply—it means an urgent national effort to revitalize rural America and develop its full potential not only for those who live there, but for those who want an occasional chance to get away from the cities.

Right now, for every 175 rural youngsters who reach working age, there are less than a hundred jobs.

In 1960, 22 percent of all rural five-year-olds were in kindergarten. In the cities, the figure was 46 percent.

The average rural teenager completes about 9 years of school. The figure is over 12 in the cities.

A third of our rural housing is substandard.

What this means, particularly for our young people, is that the basic American right to freedom of choice—choice of where to live . . . choice of employment—is restricted.

So when America sets out to provide full and equal opportunity for every citizen—and that is a task I mean to see completed as nearly as possible by 1976—we have to mean every citizen, young and old, black and white, rural and urban.

The Cities

I think that the American people know that the Marshall Plan as it was administered as foreign aid was a success. I think they'd like to believe they could have a similar success at home. The Marshall Plan was a success primarily in Europe because it was worked out in concert with the recipient and the donor, with industry and labor and the people in the area that needed the help. We could make that work in Europe, we can make it work in America.

Local initiative, careful planning, coordinated policy, strict priorities, and massive commitment—these techniques brought a new Europe from the ashes of World War II.

These are also the requirements for perfecting the American city.

It will cost money—a great deal of it.

To help solve the central problems of financing, I propose the creation of a National Urban Development Bank, financed through subscription of private funds.

I propose federal underwriting of the unusual "risk" elements which are inevitably going to be involved in meeting the hardest and most critical urban problems.

An appropriation of federal funds would get the bank started. The balance of the funds would come from federally-guaranteed bonds, to be sold by the bank to private investors.

Affiliated regional banks would be chartered by the National Bank for specific metropolitan areas.

Regional bank funds would be available to both public and private borrowers for programs which cannot be financed through any other means, but which are found essential to urban development.

This is essentially a program for federal underwriting of loans.

This is even more essentially a proposal to commit ourselves, as a country, to paying whatever is the cost not just of saving, but of perfecting, our cities.

I urge that commitment of the people of America.

I will urge that meeting the needs of America's cities be made in effect a prior lien on the additional several billions which we will realize each year in increased revenues from present taxes on our vastly-expanded national income.

I will urge, too, that we use, on these problems, a fair share of the "peace dividend" which can be ours—if we are steadfast in our determination to achieve an honorable settlement in Paris—and if we can achieve mutual deescalation in the costly and futile arms race between our nation and the Soviet Union.

We can never build the cities we need without the full commitment of private enterprise.

We must, therefore, be prepared to offer financial incentives to engage the enormous power of the private sector.

We must also offer these incentives, in addition to schools and first-class public services, as magnets to draw new industry and populations to the smaller city and new town—which can become the well-planned metropolis of tomorrow.

I urge, too, the adoption of the plain principle of public administrative responsibility: that the worst problems get the first attention.

...the Promise of American Society'

In most cities today, public services are poorest where the needs are greatest.

Schools are weakest where learning is hardest. This is wrong.

Garbage collection is slowest where the rats are.

Building codes are not enforced where the conditions they were designed to prevent are most prevalent.

Where health problems are most severe, medical facilities and personnel are least adequate—and often the most expensive.

It is time to change that pattern. I don't suggest we impair city services in the better neighborhoods. I only say: We must make these services available to all our citizens.

Civil Order

Government of, by and for the people depends on respect for and observance of the law. Violence and lawlessness cannot, and must not, be condoned in America.

I put these items at the top of the agenda for civil order:

First. The rioting in American cities must stop. And if it breaks out again it must be put down promptly, firmly and effectively.

Today, more than ever before, violence is the enemy of civil rights and civil liberties. It is the ally of reaction—and can be used as an excuse for not doing the things that need to be done in this country.

Second. The sale and the possession of firearms has to be governed by the sole consideration of what is necessary and effective to stop their criminal use. It demeans us as a civilized people to put any other consideration ahead of this one.

The laws against carrying concealed weapons must be greatly strengthened, and the penalties for violation increased.

Third. Federal, state and local agencies must be organized in a massive effort to stop the drug traffic in this country.

Fourth. Councils for Civil Peace should be organized at the state and metropolitan level . . . to provide a state community relations service designed to prevent violence and to gain community cooperation and communication.

Fifth. We must take a hard look at the effects of television on our children. What happens when they are exposed to endless exercises in the casual infliction of injury and death on our television screens?

I submit that the recommendations of the President's Commission on Civil Disorders are right—and that as they are carried out civil order—as well as social justice—in America's cities will be served.

The War On Poverty

There is no reason in America—with unequaled wealth and agricultural productivity—for anyone to go hungry.

It is immoral to allow some children to suffer from malnutrition while others in America are concerned about the dangers of overeating.

It is time to make an adequate diet part of the Bill of Rights of every American, and to be sure our farmers get a fair return for their product.

We have done more about poverty in the last four years than in the thirty that went before. But, there is still so much to be done. Our country is only half awake, half at work, about what poverty really means. For too many people, it's still only a bad dream—about a riot in a slum. I am going to drive it home hard in this campaign not just that poverty is wrong—but that it can be eliminated—by us—in our time.

The same courage that is required to wage war in Viet Nam must be applied to wage war on the vestiges of deprivation and poverty in this country. I think the American people would like to win a war in their own country. I think they would like to be able to do something for their own people and I think I can rally them to get them to do something for their own people.

The victims of poverty don't want to endure the indignity of the dole. They want skills, not scraps; work, not welfare; independence, not idleness; opportunity, not paternalism.

I think this silent America—an America still unaroused—can be aroused. I mean to try. That is why I went to the poor people's march to build bridges. To show fortunate Americans that many of the claims of the poor are legitimate, and to show the poor that they are not shut off from the leadership of this nation. That the democratic system can work.

Policies:

- Develop an active, working partnership between government and business to make financing, insurance and training and business techniques available to the inner-city neighborhoods. In most of our cities it means helping to build a whole structure of new locally owned businesses that communities will value and protect, because they are their own.
- Develop a system of national service for youth which distributes the burdens of military service fairly and offers incentives to contribute to our domestic needs.
- Repeal restrictive welfare provisions requiring welfare mothers to work or undergo job training and freezing the level of federal relief contributions.
- Drastically reform the welfare system to avoid demeaning recipients, destroying motivation and adding excessive costs to the public.
- Develop a better form of income maintenance.
- Put Food Stamp and Commodity Distribution programs in every county where severe hunger exists.
- Provide school lunches on a year-around basis.
- Greater involvement of the poor in the governmental decisions which affect them.
- Provide adequate day-care centers so that children will not return home from school to empty homes.
- Encourage welfare mothers to work when possible.
- Provide selective public service employment for the jobless and generate the maximum number of jobs in the private and public sectors.

Education

The cost of educating every American must be recognized as an investment that will be fully repaid.

We spend billions of dollars for relief and welfare, for institutional care, for crime and violence—as the costs of people not being educated and trained.

The question is whether to pay as our children grow—to educate them—or whether to pay later the prices of ignorance, incompetence, frustration, and alienation.

I believe that we should—as a nation—declare here and now that 1968 will be the year when the decision was finally made to make the investments . . . to make the changes . . . to make the personal commitments necessary to provide quality education for every individual American child—from age four through college.

1. Every individual has the right to receive the fullest and best education that individual can put to good use.

2. Every individual with the capacity to be self-sufficient has an obligation to use this educational opportunity toward responsible membership in a free society.

3. The costs of a policy of full education will be large. They include the cost of training and paying teachers on a basis which recognizes that their work affects the future more directly than the work of any other profession . . . the cost of a national pre-school program available to all children from age four . . the cost of whatever arrangement is necessary to put staying in school, right through college, on a straight ability-to-learn, not ability-to-pay, basis . . the cost of educational centers, developing and providing creative and innovative teaching tools and methods, in each of our 50 states . . . the cost of a minimum of 25 federally-subsidized centers of advanced study in high school and college education.

4. A new full-education policy must take into account individual differences and circumstances. Equal educational opportunity ought to mean the preferential treatment of those who have gotten off to a slow start—almost always for reasons entirely beyond their control.

5. Age 16 should not be a cut-off date for compulsory education. There should be case-by-case handling of students who for any reason decide to leave school before they have finished the 12th grade.

6. We need combination learning-and-earning programs, and closer relationships between the schools and the employers in the community.

7. Each student should receive the right instruction for his level of intellectual capacity, and for his aptitude—from the retarded to the most brilliantly gifted.

8. We must nourish individuality—the individuality of every child, white or black, rich or poor, urban or rural. We must find and touch that priceless substance within each child which makes him a separate entity—unique and precious—so that he may utilize it to the fullest, on his own behalf and on behalf of his society.

9. We must declare a deliberate policy of innovation in educational administration.

10. There is obvious need for the 12-month use of our school facilities.

11. We need long-term planning so that our schools, at all levels, will be placed in areas of future population growth—not according to old jurisdictional lines.

World Peace

The objective of this nation and the objective of your government—and it is your government—has been a political settlement of the cruel, costly and ugly war in Viet Nam . . . to take the conflict from the battlefield to the conference room and negotiation table. . . .

We have a conference and a negotiation underway today in Paris. I am not so foolish as to believe that the search for peace at the conference table will be much easier than the price we have had to pay to resist aggression on the battlefield. But I do feel that we have to have the same persistence and the same patience—the same willingness to be brave and courageous and tenacious at the negotiating table as we have on the battlefield.

I favor—and the President favors—an immediate cease-fire in Viet Nam so the killing will stop—now. Hanoi won't agree. So the Paris discussions must go on in an environment of psychological and military pressure which has become so much a standard Communist negotiating pattern. I hope that the American people will have the patience and tenacity to withstand that pressure and to support Ambassador Averell Harriman and Cyrus Vance in Paris—no matter how long their efforts may take . . . and it may take a long time.

I have devoted a good deal of my life to the causes of the works of peace. I have never changed in that thought. But I do not think that peace comes to the timid or the weak or to the cowardly. I think it comes to those of great moral purpose—people of strength. . . . Just as you cannot permit violence in your streets and your cities with a handful of brigands running loose and hope to gain anything called social justice for the great vast majority of your people . . . neither can you permit violence to run rampant throughout the world when outside forces seek to destroy the hopes of simple and plain people.

I suggest that the strengthening of the United Nations—its peacekeeping operations, the building of regional institutions of economic and political and social development must be the top agenda of the American people. I suggest the highest purpose of this country must be to reduce the tensions that exist in this world.

We must do our part to protect world security by maintaining whatever strength is necessary to meet our commitments to the United Nations charter, to regional treaties, to whatever contracts we become signatory and we must above all maintain our own security. But we're also obliged to concentrate on the arts of peace through affirmative action to meet human needs. I believe through that kind of action we can build security and peace. . . . We are not a nation of warriors. We're a nation of nation builders. We seek to destroy no one. We would surely like a lasting peace, an enduring peace.

Forces of emancipation and freedom are at work throughout the whole world, in every country, restlessly, and at times violently and fitfully. The pages of history, a decade, a generation, yea, a hundred years from now, will surely reveal that this last half of the 20th century saw the greatest move towards freedom that the world has ever known. . . .

Wirtz Hails 'Sound Blueprint':

not only the urgent need for doing the job but also for getting it done in good time" when the first contracts are awarded to employers.

Haggerty noted that the policy statement is a guide to local unions and councils in seeking agreements with employers in their area on rehabilitation and new construction work, including demolition repair and alteration of residential structures in urban areas under the Model Cities program.

"We want an orderly procedure that will not destroy our very valuable apprentice training programs," he said. "We are willing to accept suggestions for future procedure from the unions involved, and from the government agencies" responsible for developing the Model Cities program.

Wirtz said in his statement that the guidelines on the involvement of slum residents in the rehabilitation of their neighborhoods "form the basis for significantly improving the employment prospects of these disadvantaged residents" not just to prevent discrimination "but to enable a large number of unemployed to become productive wage earners."

Weaver expressed the hope that the policy statement "will provide a framework for a satisfactory construction manpower program to be negotiated with all elements in each local community." While the agreement applies to residential structures and commercial construction is not specifically covered, the "maximum opportunities" clause in the law pertains to the entire Model Cities program "and will be rigorously observed," Weaver said.

Under the guidelines, building trades councils are advised to take the initiative in establishing a joint labor-management Model Cities Administrative Committee for each area. They are urged to negotiate special local agreements as supplements to existing agreements, specifying wage rates and conditions of employment.

Residents of slum areas who are eligible for work within the scope of the special agreements will be grouped according to their experience on construction work, as follows:

- Those fully qualified to be laborers or mechanics.
- Those with appreciable construction work experience but not qualified to be mechanics or laborers.
- Those with little or no construction experience.

The statement says that area residents who are fully qualified would be assigned at the rates for laborers or craftsmen provided in the agreement. Those with appreciable experience would be "given preference in employment opportunities" over beginners, and employed at a wage step in accordance with a schedule to be negotiated.

"The negotiated schedule should provide for wage step increments . . . dependent on the experience and performance of the employe," the presidents' policy statement said. "This schedule may or may not be identical with the wage schedule for apprentices" but should "provide the possibility for advancement to the top-group."

Those with little or no construction work experience are to be paid an entrance wage as negotiated by the parties.

In recruiting residents of the area to be rehabilitated, the B& CTD presidents recommended that the agreement provide a procedure for the preliminary screening of applicants and training before on-site work.

"Such preliminary training," the statement said, "should include orientation to work operations and safety." The training programs are to be developed in cooperation with representatives of federal and local government agencies and community groups.

The guidelines recommend that the local agreements provide where needed additional basic education programs under government or industry financing. This, it was noted, may result in the workweek for some employes being divided between on-site work and specified classroom instruction.

The number of employes in the second and third group of trainees —those with less than full experience—"shall be determined locally" where circumstances vary from craft to craft and job to job, the statement said.

Other provisions:

- "The determination of size of workforce, establishment of quality standards and judgment of workmanship required, and the maintenance of discipline shall be the responsibility" of the contractor.
- "Provision" should be made for uniform starting times and for shift work at shift rates.
- "The agreement should provide specifically that there will be no work stoppage over jurisdictional disputes."

Any controversy on that subject "shall be handled under the established jurisdictional machinery" of the construction industry.

A subcontracting clause recommends that "any contractor bound by the agreement shall notify each subcontractor of its provisions" and require him to conform.

The so-called Model Cities program was enacted in 1966 as the Demonstration Cities & Metropolitan Development Act. Its objective is to "provide additional housing and community facilities and to provide federal assistance to cities" in building adequate housing for low and moderate-income residents.

The guidelines, Haggerty said, can be used in "fitting the employment and training phase of the program into the overall accomplishment" of the objectives of the President and Congress.

Since the program is in an experimental stage, Haggerty said, "recommendations for the employment and training phase must also be experimental and tentative in character."

He said the building trades drew up a memorandum of agreement last February as the basis for a national agreement with the contractor associations. When the Associated General Contractors presented a substitute document, the Building Trades unions found it "completely unacceptable" and drew up their own policy statement.

A MERGER AGREEMENT of the two Philippine national labor centers is reported by Pres. Democrito Mendoza of the Philippine Labor Congress as he chats with AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany. Mendoza came to Washington for talks with labor officials following the close of a session of the Intl. Labor Organization in Geneva, Switzerland, where he was the worker delegate from the Philippines.

Consumer Legislation Progresses in Senate

The Administration's consumer protection program, backed by labor, moved ahead in Congress as the Senate passed two bills and the Senate Commerce Committee approved another.

One Senate-passed measure would authorize the Federal Trade Commission to seek preliminary injunctions in federal courts against deceptive advertising and other unfair merchandising practices in nearly all industries.

At present, the FTC can seek injunctions only in cases involving food, drugs, medical devices, cosmetics and the labeling of wool, fur, textiles and flammable fabrics.

In other cases involving alleged violation of the Federal Trade Commission Act, the agency can only secure cease-and-desist orders, which when contested can be held up for as long as three years.

The second bill, approved by the Senate, would authorize FTC to probe sales rackets in the home improvement industry and specifically spell out the agency's right to go to court to halt them.

The National Better Business Bureau has estimated that deceptive practices in the home improvement field alone now fleece consumers of more than $500 million annually.

The Senate committee voted out a bill to set and enforce standards for equipment that emits radiation, including color television sets, X-ray equipment and other electronic products.

Meanwhile, the Senate Agriculture Committee approved legislation to improve poultry inspection by the states to supplement the inspection already required of poultry shipped in interstate commerce.

The bill, however, is weaker than the previously passed House bill in that it broadens industry exemptions and inserts a provision that would permit poultry inspected under state laws to enter interstate commerce. Efforts are expected on the Senate floor to remove these provisions.

The Secretary of Health, Education and Welfare, who would set the standards, would further be empowered to require manufacturers to certify that their products are safe and give notification that they meet the standards.

The senate bill also requires the manufacturer to repair or replace defective products at his own expense, and it authorizes factory inspections. It further provides for the licensing and training of X-ray technicians.

A committee spokesman voiced hope that the measure would be passed by the Senate and sent to conference with a previously passed House bill which is not as inclusive as the Senate version.

Although the two Senate-passed bills giving broader power to the FTC have not been acted upon in the House, leaders there were looking into the possibility of bringing them directly to the floor under suspension of the rules.

resuming the current session of Congress after the conventions.

And most congressional leaders appeared resigned to a post-convention meeting, even while scheduding extra-long daily and Saturday sessions in an attempt to quit for good Aug. 3, just prior to the Republican convention.

The biggest threat to adjournment continued to be the effort by a group of Senate Republicans to block Johnson's Supreme Court appointments—Justice Abe Fortas to succeed Chief Justice Earl Warren and Homer Thornberry to the vacancy created by Warren's announced retirement.

Although the appointments need be confirmed only by the Senate, dragged-out Senate Judiciary committee hearings and the possibility of a floor filibuster loomed as a block to Senate action on legislation.

The House took up debate on a $2.3 billion foreign aid authorization bill that is about $600 million below the President's request, with House members threatening to cut it even further or delay all aid for one year.

As debate got underway, Johnson issued a statement saying he would not oppose the cut already made but with that slash the program "has been pared to the bone."

The House also headed for floor action on the Administration's bill to ban mail order sales of rifles, shotguns and ammunition. It would supplement a similar restriction on hand gun sales enacted last month.

While House leaders were not slated to press for an Administration provision to require registration and licensing of firearms, this measure was expected to come up when gun control legislation reaches the Senate floor.

The House, in a marathon 13-hour session, dealt with 25 bills leaders had put down for action under a suspension-of-the-rules procedure requiring a two-thirds vote for approval.

Major measures approved under the procedure included:

- Creation of a new 28,400-acre redwoods national park in California, as compared to a 64,000-acre park proposed in the bill previously passed by the Senate. Differences must now be ironed out in conference.
- Authorization of a national trails systems for hikers, designating the Appalachian Trail from Maine to Georgia as the first and listing others for study. A Senate-passed bill authorized five trail systems in all.
- An omnibus rivers and harbors and flood control bill authorizing 72 new projects and furthering others underway at a cost of $1.6 billion. This bill goes to conference with a $2 billion version previously passed by the Senate.
- Legislation to provide that military cargo may not be carried by ships which are not built, or rebuilt or registered in the United States. The bill is still in committee in the Senate.

Reported out of House committees but still awaiting rules were two important labor-backed proposals — one to prescribe health and safety standards in the workplace and another to bring farm workers under the National Labor Relations Act.

The Senate by a voice vote passed a measure to increase the so-called G.I. Bill educational benefits of Viet Nam war veterans by 50 percent to bring them up to benefits granted to World War II and Korean War veterans.

Metropolitan Insurance on 'Unfair' List

The AFL-CIO Union Label & Service Trades Dept. has urged unions and union members to help the Insurance Workers win their strike against the Metropolitan Life Insurance Co. by a consumer boycott.

The department put Metropolitan on the "unfair" list, and noted that the strike issue has shifted from a dispute over pay to the company's demand for the right to fire any of the striking agents it wishes.

In addition to refusing to purchase insurance from Metropolitan, the union label statement said, individuals and affiliates presently covered by Metropolitan policies should consider a change of carriers.

95% of Steelworkers Back Strike Vote

AFL-CIO News

Vol. XIII | Issued weekly at 815 Sixteenth St., N. W. Washington, D. C. 20006 $2 a year | Second Class Postage Paid at Washington, D. C. | Saturday, July 27, 1968 | No. 30

Abel Says Discretion To Be Used

By Eugene A. Kelly

Pittsburgh, Pa.—Members of 348 locals of the Steelworkers voted by a margin of 95 percent to authorize their union to strike the basic steel industry if necessary, USWA Sec.-Treas. Walter J. Burke announced here.

Balloting at local union halls, at special meetings or in plant gate tallies, members agreed by an overwhelming margin to authorize the USWA executive board "to call a strike if and when one is deemed necessary." A strike call would put 400,000 workers on picket lines.

The union's contracts with 11 basic steel companies are scheduled to expire at one second after midnight Aug. 1. Negotiations on new pacts are continuing in meetings with local managements and on the national level here.

Strike authorization, Pres. I. W. Abel cautioned, does not mean there will necessarily be a strike.

Continuing Negotiations

He said "officers and board members will exercise the authority to strike with discretion, and only after exhausting all efforts to negotiate fair and reasonable contract terms." Abel added "it is our hope that the steel industry in our continuing negotiations will recognize that the needs of the steelworkers are not only genuine and urgent but also that prompt and just consideration must be given them."

At a press conference in mid-July Abel told newsmen that industry spokesmen had made no wage offer to the union since negotiations began June 3 in New York.

Delegates from USWA locals agreed at a special meeting last March that an equitable wage structure will be the major goal of the union in negotiations this year with the steel and aluminum industries.

A substantial pay increase "is of major importance," the two conferences said, "for union members squeezed by steadily rising living costs" and the erosion of jobs and wage rates.

Other factors cited were the profitability and productivity of the industries; the sustained growth of the U.S. economy, and the levels of contract settlements in other industries, notably auto, rubber and can.

Since then the USWA has negotiated new three-year contracts calling for nearly 56 cents an hour in average wage hikes for 30,000 members employed by five aluminum companies.

In January the USWA's can in-

$5.3 Billion Housing Bill Aids Low-Income Families

STEELWORKERS voted by emphatic margins in a nationwide poll to arm their negotiators with strike authorization if contract agreement is not reached with the basic steel industry by Aug. 1. Shown about to vote are members of USWA Local 1408 at U.S. Steel Corp.'s National Tube Works at McKeesport, Pa.

Landmark Measure Nears Final Action

By Duane Emme

A far-reaching housing bill—with new programs to help the poor in obtaining adequate dwellings—passed the Senate and headed for certain House approval and the signature of Pres. Johnson.

The measure cleared the Senate by a voice vote after a joint conference committee ironed out differences between previously-enacted House and Senate versions of an Administration bill. Final action by the House was pending at AFL-CIO News' presstime.

The legislation, solidly backed by labor, calls for starting 1.7 million new or rehabilitated dwellings, mostly for low income families, over the next three years.

All told, it authorizes $5.3 billion in federal expenditures as a starter on the President's target of 6 million apartments or homes for low and moderate income families over the next 10 years.

Although the funds still must be appropriated, the legislation represents a triumph for the Administration, which had placed it high on the list of "essential" bills in the current Congress.

Two key programs provided for by the bill—both new—are aimed at helping families without means to buy or rent homes.

Under one program the federal government would subsidize all but 1 percent of conventional mortgage payments, now running at about 7 percent. Buyers of homes would pay 20 percent of their monthly income toward mortgage and interest payments. The goal is 500,000 new houses in the next three years.

The rent program provides that eligible families pay 25 percent of their incomes toward rental with the government subsidizing the rest. An estimated 700,000 families would be brought under the pro-

Congress Ups Pace, Sets Recess

Congress continued to dig into a mountain of legislation, but the backlog was so great that it will have to return after the national political conventions.

House leaders have agreed to recess Aug. 2, just prior to the Republican convention, and return Sept. 4. The Senate has agreed not to meet during the conventions or between them. It set no dates for recessing or returning.

Senate Majority Leader Mike Mansfield and Senate Republican Leader Everett Dirksen agreed that there would be plenty of work ahead for the September session.

The Administration and the nation's urban centers won a round when the Senate approved a $1 billion appropriation for the model cities program to revitalize riot-torn ghettos.

Before voting the amount requested by Pres. Johnson, the Senate rejected an amendment pushed by Sen. Gordon Allott (R-Colo.)

Strikers to Install Equipment:

IBEW Offer Assures Chicago Convention

Chicago—Striking electrical workers solved a crisis for the Democratic national convention by agreeing to install communications equipment for the convention while continuing their strike against the Illinois Bell Telephone Co.

The convention is scheduled to start Aug. 26.

Five local unions of the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, representing 12,000 telephone installers and other workers on strike since May 8, offered to provide enough volunteers to install telephone, radio and TV equipment in the Intl. Amphitheatre as soon as the hall is vacated by a big housewares show. Illinois Bell agreed to go along with the plan.

IBEW System Council T-4, representing the five locals, gave the proposal to Mayor Richard J. Daley, who approved it at a meeting in Chicago AFL-CIO headquarters with countywide union leaders. Illinois Bell agreed to furnish the equipment but declined all attempts to get back to the bargaining table, the union said.

(In Miami Beach, meanwhile, another group of IBEW electricians agreed to arbitrate a dispute which had halted preparations for the Republican convention, scheduled to open Aug. 5. The union and the CBS television network agreed that, without prejudice to the arbitration,

Aerospace Negotiators Face Strike Deadline

Los Angeles—Negotiators raced the clock to avert strikes at two of the nation's prime aerospace facilities—McDonnell-Douglas and Lockheed corporations—as bargaining for new three-year labor agreements was pressed.

Machinists union members from California to Florida voted better than 96 percent to walk out at McDonnell-Douglas, the merged airplane and space vehicle giant, by 12:01 a.m. Monday, July 29.

At Lockheed, a similarly overwhelming vote by Machinists was registered in support of contract improvements.

Crux at both bargaining tables was labor's demand for conditions in aerospace on a par with such basic U.S. industries as steel and auto.

Some progress in non-economic items was noted at midweek. But at McDonnell-Douglas, where the deadline was set, management had yet to put its wage proposals on the table.

Apprentice Plan Places 645 Trades Trainees

New York—Some 645 minority-group youths have been placed in building trades apprentice training under a joint program of the Workers Defense League and the A. Philip Randolph Educational Fund.

The tabulation of placements since the program began in 1964 was announced in a progress report by the two organizations linked with another announcement—the placing of 116 poor youths into construction apprenticeships throughout the city and 11 other men as journeymen.

The latest placements bring to 461 the total of youths placed by pre-apprentice programs operated by the joint program's offices in Harlem and Brooklyn's blighted Bedford-Stuyvesant area.

The other placements have been made by offices in New Rochelle, N.Y., Rochester, N.Y., Newark, N.J., Cleveland, Buffalo and Nashville.

The joint project of the two organizations recruits, tutors and counsels minority youths under Apprenticeship Outreach plans, funded through Labor Dept. grants.

Deadline Near In Aerospace, Talks Continue hikes of 5, 3, and 3 percent for each year of a three year package —substantially less than union proposals, estimated at 7 percent the first year alone.

Auto Workers, continuing cooperative bargaining with the Machinists as in years past, also voted strike action at McDonnell-Douglas.

The Machinists and the UAW together represent about 55,000 of the firm's employes.

Machinists represent some 40,000 Lockheed workers.

A walkout at either of the big aerospace plants could affect activity at such locations as Cape Kennedy, Fla., and Vandenberg and Edwards Air Force Bases, Calif.

So far, both sides have been negotiating without the formal aid of federal mediators.

Besides wages, a key factor this year in aerospace, the unions are proposing significant advances in such fringe items as pensions and health care.

The unions had started talks early in hopes of avoiding so-called "crisis bargaining" in 1968. But unexpected management indifference at the table dashed those hopes.

Both the Machinists and UAW scheduled mass meetings around the country July 28 and 29 in anticipation of "final" management proposals. Members will be asked to accept or reject them, or reaffirm strike action.

All told, unions will be seeking new agreements this year for 250,000 aerospace workers.

Farm Workers Harvest Pay Gains at Schenley

Delano, Calif.—The United Farm Workers Organizing Committee, AFL-CIO, signed a new contract with Schenley Industries Inc. setting rates the union believes are the highest paid any agricultural workers in the continental United States.

UFWOC won wage increases of 15 cents an hour for grape laborers and irrigators—from $1.75 an hour to $1.90; 20 cents for tractor and truck drivers, to a new rate of $2.05; 30 cents for crew leaders—from $1.95 to $2.25.

Also agreed to were pruning rates of $2.10 an hour for hand pruners and $2.25 for operators of recently introduced pneumatic pruning rigs, a step toward automating the fields.

Ranch Committee Chairman Paul Vargas announced that, in addition to wage improvements, Schenley representatives agreed to pay 10 cents per hour per worker into a health and welfare fund keyed to retirement, and for dental and medical care for workers and their families.

Dir. Cesar Chavez signed the agreement for UFWOC, with AFL-CIO Dir. of Organization William L. Kircher also signing as a witness.

It was a memorable occasion for both men, who performed the same function Apr. 6, 1966, when Schenley first agreed to recognize the infant union after a bitter eight-month strike and a boycott widely supported by U.S. unions.

This is the union's third contract with Schenley. The first one was for $1.75 an hour minimum. The second was a renewal contract maintaining the same minimums. This year the workers decided it was time for a raise, and management wanted some changes also. Nine days of peaceful talks brought agreement on a two-year contract.

The farm workers' paper, El Malcriado, said of the new pact: "This is the way labor and management should deal with each other, with mutual respect and consideration, on a rational and humble basis. The Giumarras" and other growers who refuse to sign "are hurting themselves as well as their workers."

"When will they learn?"

Under the new Schenley pact, piece rates for pickers will average $3.25 an hour, the union said. Vine tying will bring $2 an hour or 2.5 cents per vine, whichever is higher.

Sullivan Asks Public Aid In Nursing Home Strike

Service Employes Pres. David Sullivan rallied public support for striking workers at a Washington, D.C., nursing home in one of the first strikes since the National Labor Relations Board agreed to allow representation elections in convalescent homes.

Sullivan charged the Mar-Salle Nursing Home is "guilty of violating" its workers' legal rights and also their human rights.

The home's 122 employes voted Apr. 2 to join SEIU Local 536. They struck July 7, charging the home's management refused to bargain with them.

The home, in Northwest Washington, had 192 patients when the strike began. All the strikers are Negroes, and most are practical nurses. Wages range from $1.30 to $1.45 an hour, and many employes of the nursing department were compelled to work up to 16 hours a day to meet living costs, Local Pres. Peter Sheehan reported.

Sullivan accused the management of violating the legal rights of employes by refusing to obey an NLRB order to bargain, and their human rights by paying wages "below the poverty level."

"The real disgrace of this situation," Sullivan said, "is that the nursing home industry is heavily subsidized by the government through medicare, welfare and other programs. And it has been heavily subsidized by the underpaid men and women who work there in nonprofessional and semiprofessional jobs."

Sullivan said his union is "100 percent behind this strike that was caused by flagrant disregard for law and justice."

Local 536 won bargaining rights by a 71-38 vote. After failing to get management to bargain, it filed refusal to bargain charges June 14. The NLRB issued a complaint after investigating, and has given the home until July 29 to show cause why it should not be found guilty of violating its employes' rights to organize and bargain.

The strikers have the support of area unions, the Catholic Interracial Council and other civic groups. Members of these groups and of the Medical Committee for Human Rights have been holding public rallies on the picket line every Sunday.

Sheehan said the home's owners are members of the American Nursing Home Assn., and are represented also by the association's legal counsel. The fight against the association may spread soon to other area nursing homes, he said.

Telegraphers Union Changing Its Name

The Commercial Telegraphers announced that as of Aug. 1 the name of the union will be changed to the United Telegraph Workers, and that of the union's publication to the Telegraph Workers Journal.

The name-change was authorized by delegates to the 1967 CTU convention in San Francisco. It was later approved by the union executive board and the AFL-CIO Executive Council, Sec.-Treas. John T. Dowling said.

CTU's history goes back to Dec. 6, 1902, when Samuel Gompers, first president of the former AFL, signed its charter of affiliation.

Acts to Expand Own Role:

AFTE Bars Move To Seek Merger

Philadelphia—The American Federation of Technical Engineers turned back a movement within its ranks for amalgamation with other white collar unions, deciding the way to its future was to expand its own union role.

Part of the move to expand, as the union's 50th anniversary convention opened in Philadelphia last week, was a proposal to change its name to the American Federation of Professional & Technical Engineers.

In that way, it was pointed out, the union could attract professional engineers who might otherwise object to union representation and tend to join professional societies. It now represents draftsmen, designers, and technicians. The name change must now be approved by two-thirds of the union's locals before it is submitted to the AFL-CIO Executive Council.

The keynote to the convention was given by AFTE Pres. James Woodside who stressed organization and expansion of the union.

Woodside also set the scene for the defeat of the merger proposal when he said:

"In the past, some have suggested that we consider the proposition of merging with a larger union. There is no logical reason to seriously consider such a proposition. There is no reason to lose our identity and become lost in a sea of unallied crafts and vocations. There is every reason to hold on to our autonomy and our identity."

When the amalgamation proposal came to the convention floor later, it was with the recommendation that it be rejected and it was.

Woodside pointed out that in the two years since the last convention AFTE has increased its membership by 15 percent.

There is no reason, he said, for the membership not to double within the next few years as there are more than 10,000 eligible workers who have not yet been organized.

The aim in the future, he said, is to organize the younger men coming into the field. In the past, organization has stressed the old hands, and the old hands have been the backbone of the labor movement, Woodside observed.

"Not so today," he continued. "It is the younger men in this society who must be approached and they must be approached in new ways."

That is where labor education, particularly in the field of organization is so necessary, he said.

The theme of education and more organization was taken up by Otto Pragan of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Education.

Pragan suggested that the white collar worker himself represents the future of the labor movement because labor needs his brains and abilities.

The white collar section of the labor force is growing much faster than any other segment, he said, as automation continues to replace many of the blue collar jobs. Professional people, he said, "must be told—must be educated—that they have as much at stake in labor as anyone."

"And how do you reach the white collar worker?" Pragan asked. "In exactly the same way as you reach the blue collar worker—through money and better working conditions."

Techniques worked out in the operation of the AFTE, said John A. McCart, operations director of the Government Employes Council, work just as well in bargaining for federal employes. It is comparatively recently, he noted, that federal employes have been allowed to bargain and the problems they are running into now "must seem like an old movie," to those who bargain with private industry.

Bussie Named to Mental Health Unit

President Johnson has named Victor Bussie, president of the Louisiana State AFL-CIO, to the President's Committee on Mental Retardation.

Two others also were named to three-year terms on the committee. They are Victor R. Fuchs, associate director of research for the National Bureau of Economic Research, and Kenneth J. Ryan, director of the Obstetrics and Gynecology Dept. at Western Reserve University School of Medicine.

Bussie succeeds Pres. Joseph A. Beirne of the Communications Workers on the President's committee. The President reappointed four others to the committee.

POSTER GIRL Holly Schmidt for the Muscular Dystrophy Association of America makes friends with AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany. Holly, a 10-year-old 5th grader in Saginaw, Mich., will be on the Labor Day Telethon with comedian Jerry Lewis to kick off the 1968 MDAA fund-raising campaign.

Strikers to Install Equipment:

an IBEW craftsman will operate a videograph under CBS News supervision. (The videograph is a device that superimposes a printed message on TV screens.)

Chairman Robert A. Nickey of the Chicago IBEW council took his proposal to Daley after getting the backing of the local labor movement.

Under the plan, the All-Chicago Labor Committee will contract to do the installation work. The IBEW will round up 300 volunteer installers who will get no pay for their work but will continue to draw strike benefits as long as the dispute continues.

The contractor, consisting of union officers who will make up the committee, will bill the hall at $5.15 an hour for all straight-time work and pay the proceeds into the System Council's strike benefit fund.

Nickey said in a statement that "our members are not only fighters who believe in their cause but good citizens . . . Recognizing this, the System Council decided on their behalf to authorize . . . certain members who will volunteer their services . . . to install all the communications facilities needed in the amphitheatre."

The national Democratic convention, Nickey said, has "unfortunately become an issue in this labor dispute" although "we did not intend it to be."

Disputing an Illinois Bell claim that communications problems in the convention hall have "clouded the normal processes of negotiation," Nickey replied: "We know this is not true. It is only another excuse by the giant Bell System to cover up its bad faith bargaining."

Since the installation plan will not affect the strike, the union chairman asked Illinois Bell's president: "Can you now commit your company to honest and fair dealing with its employes?"

Daley praised the IBEW, Nickey and the Chicago labor federation for helping solve the deadlock threatening the convention.

Their action, he told newsmen, "shows how grateful and thankful the people of Chicago should be to their wonderful labor movement."

The IBEW named Frank Cunningham, business representative of Local 134, one of the five striking local unions, as its coordinator in installing the necessary equipment in the amphitheatre at 42nd and Halsted Sts. Illinois Bell said it too would name a coordinator to help expedite the work.

The striking installers have been out of work since Apr. 18, when they declined to cross picket lines of the Communications Workers. The CWA settled its dispute not long before the IBEW rejected a company offer and voted to stay out for an acceptable contract.

Executive board members of the Chicago AFL-CIO heard a report on the strike and urged business leaders "to exercise their influence toward a fair and equitable resolution of the issues" as offered by the striking locals.

Bell management recently refused a union offer of binding arbitration to settle the dispute.

Service Union Wins Backpay At Army Base

Some 600 civilian mess attendants at the Army Proving Grounds in Aberdeen, Md., are entitled to nearly $45,000 in back pay from a private contractor, a Labor Dept. hearing examiner has ruled, upholding a claim by Service Employes Local 536, Washington, D.C.

Examiner John B. Mealy said City Wide Janitorial Service, Inc., Atlanta, Ga., violated the McNamara-O'Hara Service Contract Act by failing to give the workers money due them in wages, overtime and other benefits.

City Wide won a $1.5 million Army contract in June 1966. It gave up the contract a year later and left the area without giving the mess attendants their final pay, according to Local 536, which now represents custodians at Aberdeen.

Under the McNamara-O'Hara Act, private employers must pay the wages prevailing in the area for the type of work performed. If City Wide refuses to pay the award, the Labor Dept. can file suit for payment, the union was told.

Steelworkers Approve Strike Action by 95%

dustry conference won settlements valued at 90 cents an hour in new three-year pacts covering 32,000 employes of two big can firms.

In announcing the vote to authorize a steel strike Aug. 1, Abel said "we regard this vote as a clear indication that basic steelworkers fully and enthusiastically support their union's objective—to achieve an equitable agreement."

Basic steelworkers, he said, "seek no more and no less than an opportunity to share fairly in the product of their labor. They desire the same consideration already provided hundreds of thousands of union workers in many other industries."

Union bargainers had their attention directed by the March conference to other basic needs of members:

- "Our search for methods of preventing and offsetting the loss of jobs must continue.
- "The premium for overtime work should be increased to discourage excessive overtime.
- "Prohibition against subcontracting, especially by sending work outside the plant, and rules against performance of bargaining unit work by supervisors must be strengthened."

Greater protection against arbitrary reduction of mill crews and combinations of jobs should be sought, the union conference said for the benefit of negotiators. It called also for better pension programs, expanded medical coverage, improved job and income protection, more holidays, improved severance pay, safety conditions and health facilities, and the upgrading of contracts covering office and technical employes.

In addition to support in the form of strike authorization, union spokesmen now have for the first time a strike and defense fund voted last winter by delegates to a special convention at Atlantic City. The convention raised dues for 1.2 million USWA members from $5 a month to an average of $10.

New Buyer's Guide Sums Up Pitfalls

A new and updated edition of "Consumer Beware!", a guide to installment buying, is now available from the AFL-CIO.

The 22-page publication goes into the specifics of installment buying and maps the pitfalls and problem areas. It contains tables on costs of loans and the laws in effect in various states on small loans.

Copies of "Consumer Beware!", Publication No. 47, are available from the AFL-CIO Pamphlet Division. Single copies are free; up to 100 the cost is 15 cents per copy; for larger orders the price is $13.50 per hundred.

Rail-Signalmen Talks Halted Until Aug. 14

Chicago — Negotiators for the Railroad Signalmen and the nation's railroads failed to reach agreement on the union's wage movement during three days of conferences here. They announced that talks will be resumed Aug. 14.

The Signalmen served notices in March on individual roads calling for sizeable wage increases, skill differential pay and a cost of living escalator clause.

The dispute went to "national handling" after negotiations on an individual basis proved fruitless and many managements served sweeping counter-proposals calling for cutbacks in benefits and a 20 percent pay cut.

Meanwhile, three rail operating unions—the affiliated Locomotive Firemen & Enginemen and the unaffiliated Locomotive Engineers and Conductors & Brakemen—said they anticipated further conferences with the railroads in their separate wage-rules disputes.

So far, seven rail unions have reached agreements for their members on wage-rules disputes through 1968 negotiations with the carriers.

Steelworkers Wind Up Pilot Educational Plan

Pittsburgh—Another 1,100 Steelworkers, at nine plants of seven major companies, have completed a unique program to upgrade the educational level of workers to qualify them for advancement to higher-level jobs.

The pilot program, which graduated 650 union members last January, has now come to a close and a joint union-management evaluation of the program will begin.

program now operates in 35 cities. Other contractors under it include the Urban League, Opportunities Industrialization Center (an anti-poverty project) and local AFL-CIO building trades councils.

Once applicants are recruited under the Workers Defense League-A. Philip Randolph Educational Fund program, they are immediately helped in filling out applications to secure high school diplomas and necessary forms.

They are then given a six-week tutoring program which is followed by a written examination and an oral interview to determine their qualifications for placement.

The latest 127 placements—mainly Negro and Puerto Rican youths—were recruited with the help of the New York State Employment Service, the Urban League and a number of anti-poverty organizations.

They were placed in jobs as apprentices for locals of the following unions: Operating Engineers, Plumbers & Pipefitters, Plasterers, Elevator Constructors, Sheet Metal Workers, Painters, Bricklayers and Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers. Two were placed as journeymen in IBEW Local 3 and nine as journeymen in Plumbers Local 2.

Ernest Green, director of the joint program here, appraised it as "moving along well" after encountering and resolving some problems that were to be expected in any new venture.

At a press conference attended by the new placements, Green declared, "We've learned a lot from past failures and we're determined to see that no employer has a chance to refuse to hire our people through any fault of ours."

"The construction industry is a viable industry," he continued, "and the opportunity is there. So long as our program is well organized and everything is 'go' we plan to keep things moving."

He praised craft unions for their cooperation with the program and pointed out that aside from their participation in it they have been instrumental in finding jobs for youths unable to finish high school.

Green announced that the program has some 150 applications pending from youths seeking apprenticeships with the Iron Workers, Carpenters, Painters and Seafarers.

Labor Paper Adds 5 Youth Advisers

St. Paul, Minn.—A move to bridge the generation gap in organized labor has been taken by the St. Paul Union Advocate here, official publication of the St. Paul AFL-CIO.

The Advocate editor, Fred B. Sweet, has set up an advisory panel of youthful union members from the St. Paul area as an informal means of helping him "to tune in on the attitudes of the growing number of young people in the labor movement."

The five-member panel, all under 30, will be expanded.

Sweet described himself as "an old goat of 59." He said he and the Advocate's board of directors, all over 30, will be "listening to the thoughts of organized labor's new people in the hope that listening will help the Advocate speak to the needs of the thousands of young men and women entering our ranks."

Dunlop Quits Construction Labor Posts

Construction industry representatives announced that they have accepted "with deep regret" the resignation of Dr. John T. Dunlop of Harvard University from two major posts and have named to succeed him Richard J. Mitchell, labor-management relations specialist in the office of the Labor Dept. solicitor.

Mitchell will serve as chairman of the Construction Industry Joint Conference, and as impartial umpire for the appeals board of the National Joint Board for the Settlement of Jurisdictional Disputes.

Dunlop resigned after years of service in the two posts to reduce his numerous outside duties, the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. reported. It said the conference reviews processes and programs in the broad areas of collective bargaining, manpower, productivity, construction safety and allied subjects. The entirely separate appeals board acts on appeals from rulings of the National Joint Board. It consists of the impartial umpire and two members each from labor and management.

Mitchell was chairman of the National Joint Board from 1957 to 1962, after 35 years as an executive with the Trimble Co. of Pittsburgh, Pa. For the last 18 months he has been acting deputy associate administrator in the Labor Dept. solicitor's office.

Who's for Democracy?

AS THE POLLS, speeches, position papers, interviews and all of the paraphernalia of the 1968 election campaign keep piling up and the nation's attention focuses in on the conventions, a pertinent question emerges:

Who are the voters and how many of them will turn out on Election Day?

A number of recent studies have established that the bulk of the voters in past elections were whites in their middle years earning a reasonably decent living. In the phrase of one political scientist, the person entering the polling booth in past elections was "un-young, un-poor and un-black."

The studies establish also that a turnout in a presidential year exceeding 60 percent of the eligibles is considered remarkable. The 1964 turnout of 61.8 percent falls into this category.

In the so-called off-year elections for Congress the vote drops off sharply—to 50.1 percent in the 1966 balloting.

THERE IS NEW HOPE in 1968 that more citizens will exercise their rights and privileges and mark a ballot or pull a voting machine lever in November. For one thing there are an estimated 11,424,000 new voters since the 1964 presidential election, bringing the total potential vote to 118,465,000.

For another, the young people, the poor and the minority groups, especially the Negroes, have become more and more involved in the political process since 1964 and should account for a higher proportion of these groups voting this year.

But all of this will go for naught unless there are intensive campaigns to turn potential voters into eligible voters—to make sure they are properly registered and in time for the November elections.

Despite continuing campaigns by labor and other national interest groups against outmoded and restrictive laws that make it easier to get a hunting or fishing license than to register to vote, the laws are still pretty much unchanged.

And despite the hammering away through all the mass media at the need for all citizens to participate in the process of electing their government and its leaders, there is an apathy, a "let-George-do-it" approach that runs counter to the basic principles of representative democracy.

This is the time, then, to make every possible effort to plan and execute registration campaigns—campaigns aimed at all segments of the electorate to assure them a voice in selecting their government.

THE LABOR MOVEMENT, as it has for elections past, is carrying out a non-partisan register-and-vote drive in major urban areas of the nation. It is selling nothing except good citizenship—the rights and privileges and responsibilities of living under a democratic form of government.

This year the effort must be even more intensive than in the past. All trade union groups at all levels must turn loose all possible resources to this effort to bring as many Americans as possible to the polls.

'Your Future Looks Bright'

Exploding the Myths:

Humphrey Record Points Up Role as 'Brother's Keeper'

The following editorial entitled "His Brother's Keeper" appeared in the July 15 issue of Justice, official publication of the Intl. Ladies' Garment Workers Union.

IN HIS MANY YEARS of public life, Vice Pres. Hubert H. Humphrey has lived the role of his brother's keeper.

When he was elected mayor of Minneapolis in 1945, he put through the first municipal Fair Employment Practice Act in America to open job opportunities to his black-skinned brothers. When he went to the Democratic Party convention in 1948, he made the historic fight for a strong civil rights plank to carry the Minneapolis idea to all America.

When he went to the Senate, his very first bill in 1949 called for medicare to provide health service for his senior citizen brothers.

He proposed the Peace Corps to care for our less fortunate brothers in many lands. He devised the food-for-peace program to feed our hungrier brothers of the earth. He sponsored disarmament programs to ease world tension. He headed the programs for youth employment to give hope to our younger brothers. He battled for anti-poverty legislation to help our poorer brothers. He wrote farm legislation to care for his rural brothers and urban legislation for his city brothers.

He did so well in all this that James Reston of the New York Times called him "the most creative legislative mind to come out of the Senate in a generation."

In the Senate, Humphrey had another brother, the junior senator from Minnesota, who generally followed Humphrey's lead. As the Congressional Quarterly wrote in 1964: "When the record indicates McCarthy has co-sponsored a major new bill, it often turns out to be a bill Humphrey has authored."

For many years, Sen. Eugene J. McCarthy was able to shine in the reflected glory of Humphrey's energy, creativity, eloquence and legislative skill.

This year, McCarthy backers are calling upon Humphrey to step aside for the "junior" senator. They say that Humphrey has no right to the Democratic nomination because McCarthy is the choice of the people.

To block Humphrey, some McCarthyites have tried to disrupt meetings where Humphrey spoke. Some of them have even threatened to run a separate ticket if Humphrey is nominated. All this is justified by the myth that McCarthy is the man the Democrats want.

What are the facts?

ACCORDING TO A HARRIS POLL (July 8) Humphrey is, by far, the choice of Democrats over McCarthy. Among labor people—Negro, white, lower income—Humphrey outstrips McCarthy by three to one. Even in the suburbs, reports Harris, Humphrey has "more appeal than any other Democrat." McCarthy does well among the richer folks. But most Democrats are not rich!

Last week the Gallup Poll made a similar finding: that in contests with Nixon and Wallace, Hubert Humphrey showed greater strength than McCarthy among Democratic rank-and-filers and with such traditionally Democratic groups as manual workers, nonwhites and union families.

The second McCarthy myth is that he has won in the primaries. The myth started in New Hampshire where McCarthy ran unopposed and lost to a Johnson write-in. McCarthy lost in Indiana, Nebraska, South Dakota, and California. The only state where he won against any opposition was in Oregon, where he beat Kennedy.

Now the McCarthy people have spread a new myth that the Kennedy voters were really for McCarthy. But the Harris Poll (July 8) reveals that "among the hard-core following of Robert Kennedy, Humphrey is preferred over McCarthy by 50 to 37 percent."

Those who can recall the Democratic convention of 1960 must be amused by McCarthy's recent conversion to a belief in the primaries. That was the year that John F. Kennedy carried the presidential primaries—which did not stop McCarthy from asking the Democratic convention to ignore this fact and to nominate Adlai Stevenson—a worthy man who had won no primaries.

So far, Hubert Humphrey—his brother's keeper—has withheld criticism from his "old friend." While we admire Humphrey's attitude, the Veep will have to forgive us for scolding his junior brother. We just want to make it clear that while the McCarthyites speak for a minority, they do not, in their opposition to Humphrey, speak for us—or for the millions of plain people who have provided the voting battalions for Roosevelt, Truman, Kennedy, Johnson and now Humphrey.

Using NLRB Formula:

Solution of Social Crises Seen In Free Collective Bargaining

The following is excerpted from an address by Frank W. McCulloch, chairman of the National Labor Relations Board, to the Alabama Bar Association.

AS WE NEED HARDLY BE REMINDED, many American institutions today are being severely challenged. The nation faces urgent problems: in race relations; in housing; in foreign affairs; in agriculture; in public education; in dealing with the many sides of poverty; in controlling crime; in providing for the population explosion; in making our cities livable; in restraining inflation; and in other critical areas, too.

This is a national election year, and responsible candidates for high public office have properly addressed themselves to each of these problems. But my own list of national problems does not include a crisis in labor relations. Nor do I know of any major candidate for public office who asserts that there is a labor relations crisis in our society today. Unsolved issues, yes. Crisis, no.

Why not?

The answer, I believe, is that to a remarkable extent our society has found a long-term and generally satisfactory solution for dealing with labor-management problems.

The solution is composed of several main elements: freedom of choice; rule of majority; and participation in industrial life through free collective bargaining and voluntary agreements. Together these elements constitute a "rule of law" for industrial peace which, in our lifetime, has in increasing measure furnished a foundation for the structures and processes to resolve one of America's oldest and most vexatious social conflicts. The success of this experience might be relevant and instructive as we search for long-term approaches to today's urgent unsolved problems.

The three decades since the passage of the Labor Act—introducing the rule of law to American labor relations—have witnessed substantial, regular, measured achievement in the pursuit of industrial peace, as the concepts of majority rule and free collective bargaining have taken root in our industrial system. While the formula of the law may not work perfectly in solving all labor-management problems, the law is not a laboratory science, and perfection is not its goal.

Fairness and justice are its goals. These goals have surely been achieved in labor relations today more fully than ever before.

Despite the real success of the rule of law in American labor relations and despite universal acclaim for the institution of free collective bargaining, an unresolved verbal battle against the policies and administration of the law has been carried on by some parts of the American community and their lawyers for over 30 years. Their slogan, which has not changed in a generation of constant change, is that the National Labor Relations Board has ignored the will of Congress in administration of the law.

In an area of life where interests are so sharply opposed and convictions so deeply held and conflicts so bitter, criticism and controversy are here to stay. They are part of the democratic process. They keep us humble, point up our errors, reveal misunderstandings, point up real issues. We study them thoughtfully, especially when they come from the courts, and endlessly seek to accommodate our work more closely to the will and purpose of Congress which has laid down the charter of labor law. Out of the free play of ideas and observations, we hope to distill a greater truth.

I question only whether this process is served by attacks that are exaggerated, misleading, or based on carefully selected lists of cases and misinterpretation of board and court decisions.

In some of our great cities today, the law is under severe strain from those for whom our society has not yet found long-term or generally satisfactory solutions. Those who live in poverty, who find the doors of opportunity closed because of their race, who send their children to inadequate schools, who are inadequately fed, who have inadequate medical and health care, and who otherwise do not enjoy the abundance which surrounds them in American life have less respect for the rule of law than others.

ON THE CAMPUSES of some of our great universities today, the law is also under strain from children of middle class, affluent families.

As lawyers and as concerned citizens, it may not be enough merely to inquire into the merits of the grievances of the poor or the complaints of rebellious students. The merits of such matters are always difficult to evaluate because they are very subjective.

More important, perhaps, is the task of finding peaceful, voluntary, and rational ways for the poor and for students to participate in procedures for reaching agreements which relate to the causes of their grievances. In order to secure a greater sense of responsibility and a truer devotion to civil obedience from them, should they not be given responsibility for helping to shape decisions which affect their lives in vital ways?

The solution to America's labor relations crisis of a generation ago may, indeed, be relevant in our search for solutions to very different crises of today. But while our society struggles in search for solutions to its present problems, must we not be wise enough not to unsettle solutions which were painfully found a generation ago and which contribute so much to more orderly,, peaceful, responsible relations for meaningful participation by millions of our fellow citizens in shaping their working lives.

New Labor-Civil Rights Booklet Stresses 'Right-to-Work' Trap

EL DERECHO A TRABAJAR is the Spanish half of the title of a new combined labor-civil rights pamphlet which spells out for Spanish-speaking workers the hypocrisy and fraud of "right-to-work" laws.

The pamphlet, written by Cesar Chavez of the AFL-CIO United Farm Workers, and Bayard Rustin of the A. Philip Randolph Institute, carries parallel columns in English and Spanish. It calls "right-to-work" a "trap for American minorities" and makes clear what "right-to-work" does not mean and what it does mean.

"It does not mean that every worker has the right to a job and to receive work at fair wages, reasonable hours and under decent labor standards," the pamphlet says.

"It does not mean that every worker has a right to secure employment with proper provisions for paid vacations and insurance benefits against sickness and old age.

"It does not mean that every worker is protected against arbitrary discharge.

"It does not mean to strengthen the individual worker's bargaining position through a union of his choice.

"WHAT IT MEANS is the opposite of all these things. And what it does mean is weakening the worker's bargaining power by keeping unions out of the factory or field.

"It does mean creating the open shop.

"It does mean destroying the institution of collective bargaining and thus keeping minority workers at the bottom of the economic ladder.

"It does mean wrecking the whole structure of labor union democracy and effective labor-management relations."

In a foreword, five civil rights leaders lend their support to the pamphlet: Dorothy Height, president of the National Council of Negro Women; the late Martin Luther King, Jr., president of the Southern Christian Leadership Conference; Clarence Mitchell, director of the Washington Bureau of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People; A. Philip Randolph, president emeritus of the Negro American Labor Council, and Roy Wilkins, executive director of the NAACP.

IF THE PUBLIC OPINION POLLS reflect the voting patterns for next November, the election of the next President of the United States could be decided by the House of Representatives.

Former Alabama Gov. George Wallace, the polls say, now has the support of between 16 and 21 percent of the electorate.

The fact that a substantial proportion of this vote would come from the South leads to the inescapable conclusion that from four to eight states, possibly more, could be in the Wallace column.

The expectation is that the race between the Democratic and Republican nominees will be close. So, the prospects are very real that the winner will not have an absolute majority in the Electoral College.

Then, under the provisions of the 12th Amendment to the Constitution, the House must decide the winner from the three candidates receiving the highest number of votes for President.

Since the House has not decided a presidential election since 1825, in the race between John Quincy Adams and Andrew Jackson, some points of procedure should be outlined.

The House vote will be decided by state delegations which will caucus and determine which candidate they will choose. Each state has one vote. If there is an even division in any state delegation, its entire vote will be thrown out.

A quorum of two-thirds of the states is necessary, but a majority of 26 is needed to elect.

If the House, through neglect or otherwise, should fail to elect a President by the scheduled inauguration date in January, then the Vice President shall act as President, as in the case of death or other constitutional disability of the President.

If no candidate for Vice President should receive a clear majority in the electoral college, then the Senate will choose a Vice President from the highest two candidates. Two-thirds of the entire Senate is the required quorum with a majority of all senators (51) required to elect.

Under the present system, if the election of the President is thrown into the House, a small minority of the House membership could actually elect the chief executive.

As Rep. Jonathan Bingham (D-N.Y.) and Sen. Ralph Yarborough (D-Tex.)—both of whom have proposals to change the system—have pointed out, it is mathematically possible for only 59 of the 435 representatives—a mere 13.5 percent of the membership—to elect our next President. They would represent about the same percentage of the total population. This would occur if the House delegates from the 26 smallest states voted for one candidate.

A University of Virginia professor, who views with real concern Wallace having any role in the determination of the next President, has advanced a proposal that has been given wide circulation. He suggests that the Democratic and Republican parties write in their platforms an agreement to support the candidate who receives a plurality of the electoral vote if the decision is given to the House.

Our history books recount the scandalous conduct of the House members in 1825, the buying and selling of votes, before determining the election of Adams—the candidate with the least number of votes.

We have some other rather shameful electoral episodes in our history. In 1876, for example, Republican Rutherford B. Hayes received only 48.04 percent of the popular vote to 50.99 for Democrat Samuel J. Tilden. Returns from four southern states were contested and an electoral commisson was set up. There was a deal, though. The commission decided the votes in favor of Hayes, but the agreement was that the occupation troops in the South would be removed.

Stove Workers Maintain Rolls Over Decade

Long Beach, Calif.—Despite the running tide in corporate mergers and "runaway" shops, the Stove, Furnace & Allied Appliance Workers have managed to avert membership losses in this decade, the 34th convention was told here by Pres. James M. Roberts.

Roberts said plant expansion in the industry and aggressive organizing in shops located in "right-to-work" states had taken up the slack.

He said expanding production of electronically-controlled cooking and heating devices would be the future target of organizing for the 77-year-old union.

Roberts, re-elected to his fifth three-year term by the conclave, strongly endorsed the presidential candidacy of Vice Pres. Humphrey. He described the vice president as a "dedicated American" whose record in labor and social legislation is "enviable."

"He deserves and has earned the right to be nominated and elected President of the United States," Roberts said in his convention message.

Roberts reported that the union had been challenged repeatedly by Teamster and Mine Workers District 50 raids since 1965. But he said the Stove Workers had added three new locals despite the attacks and would continue vigorous counterattacks although limited by a tight financial and manpower picture.

He noted the strike weapon—whether used or not—had been instrumental in getting fair and legitimate agreements in the trade. In many cases, he said, "strike sanctions were almost a must" in winning settlements.

Besides Roberts, the convention re-elected all incumbent officers including Sec.-Treas. Edwin F. Kaiser and Executive Vice Pres. Fred D. Keller.

Msgr. Boland Dies; Pioneer In Labor Rights

Buffalo, N. Y.—Msgr. John P. Boland, who gained fame as a pioneer "labor priest," died after a fire enveloped him in flames in his study at St. Thomas Aquinas parish house.

Msgr. Boland, 80, was the first chairman of the New York Labor Relations Board. He founded the Buffalo Diocesan Labor College in 1938.

He was regional director of the National Labor Relations Board for the Buffalo area from 1934 to 1937, and during that time was responsible for two major decisions.

The first developed the principle that it is an employer's duty to bargain with unions representing his employes. The second provided that a union representing a majority of workers was entitled to be exclusive bargaining representative for all employes.

The author of many articles on labor relations, Msgr. Boland was a member of the State Board of Mediation at the time of his death.

In 1942 former Gov. Herbert H. Lehman said in a public tribute: "No man in state history has done more for the cause of sympathetic and understanding relations between management and labor" than Msgr. Boland.

Msgr. Boland had been pastor emeritus at St. Thomas Aquinas Church. He was the son of a union grain shoveler on the Buffalo waterfront.

MERGER IS THE TOPIC as officers of the Bookbinders huddle with Vice Pres. Jack Wallace of the Lithographers & Photoengravers, left, at the Bookbinders convention in Philadelphia. Locked in conversation with Wallace are Bookbinders Pres. John Connolly, center, and Sec.-Treas. Wesley A. Taylor. Delegates adopted a resolution urging officers to "do all within their power to bring about a merger" with the Lithographers & Photoengravers.

Amendments Threaten To Dilute Poultry Bill

Three changes made by the Senate Agriculture Committee in the House-passed poultry inspection bill "would seriously undermine and weaken vital consumer protection programs," the AFL-CIO warned.

In a letter to all senators urging them to oppose the amendments, AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller explained:

"They would even jeopardize the existing meat and poultry inspection program and they would make the proposed poultry inspection program worse than ineffective."

Congress passed a law requiring interstate poultry inspection in 1957. The current legislation would give states two years to set up inspection systems to come up to federal standards on poultry sold within their borders.

Biemiller said one change made by the Senate committee would require "an impossible burden of proof for condemnation of unfit poultry products."

A second amendment, he continued, would "undermine" both the present poultry inspection program and an existing meat inspection law by permitting state-inspected plants to ship poultry in interstate commerce.

A third change, he said, widens an "unfortunate exemption" in the House-passed bill "to allow millions of pounds of poultry to go into intra-state and interstate commerce without any inspection for wholesomeness and sanitation."

Without these three provisions, the bill approved by the Senate committee will "effectively" protect consumers, Biemiller declared. With them it represents "a big step backward," he concluded.

Meanwhile, as the AFL-CIO News went to press, the Senate schedule on the bill was uncertain, and there was a possibility the committee might reconsider its action.

Labor, consumer groups and the Administration rallied against the amendments. Betty Furness, presidential assistant for consumer affairs, said the committee bill, as it stood, threatens "the whole federal food inspection system."

The move to allow state inspected poultry to move in interstate commerce, she warned, would open the way to lower standards.

BLS Handbook In New Edition

The Handbook of Labor Statistics 1968 is off the presses. The 350-page edition contains 152 tables on historic and current developments in manpower, compensation, productivity, prices, cost of living, industrial relations and other related areas.

The desk reference book, issued by the Labor Dept.'s Bureau of Labor Statistics, is intended for labor leaders, researchers, teachers, businessmen, students, teachers and the general public.

The handbook is available for $2.50 from the Supt. of Documents, U. S. Government Printing Office, Washington, D. C. 20402. It also can be obtained from BLS regional offices in New York, Boston, Atlanta, Chicago, Kansas City, San Francisco, Dallas and Philadelphia.

With Lithographers & Engravers:

Bookbinders Adopt Proposal for Merger

Philadelphia—The Bookbinders' biennial convention here took a major step toward merger with the Lithographers & Photoengravers.

Delegates approved by a substantial margin a resolution binding the brotherhood to do all within its power to bring about the merger as soon as possible.

The convention also resolved that the international union would not co-sign any local contracts unless they provide a workweek of less than 37.5 hours.

Shortening the workweek together with the eventual merging of the printing trades unions were viewed as measures to meet the encroachment of automation in the graphic arts industries.

Although the merger resolution was adopted by a large vote, it was not before considerable opposition was expressed from the floor. Dissenting members of the merger committee expressed the brotherhood's previous policy of working toward a general merger of all the graphic arts trades in one big move.

Before discussion of the resolution came to the floor guest speaker Jack Wallace, vice president of the Lithographers & Photoengravers, told the delegates:

"I do not disagree with the philosophy the Bookbinders have espoused in the past, that it would be nice if all graphic arts unions would merge at once. However, I view adherence to that philosophy a virtual guarantee that no such merger will take place.

"It may be felt that merger with one graphic arts union might create a division with others, but I do not see this as a rational fear."

The resolution on shortening the workweek will put pressure on negotiators for about half the locals to bring the work week down below 37.5 hours. Locals which now have 36.25 and 35-hour weeks represent more than 60 percent of the membership.

A companion resolution called for the 35-hour week in federal shops.

The bookbinders also made a move to support the 10 AFL-CIO unions and the Teamsters on strike or locked out from the Los Angeles Herald Examiner. The union endorsed a complete boycott of Hearst communications media and asked for a congressional investigation of the seven-month-old strike.

Turning to its own outstanding strike, the five-year-old dispute with the Kingsport Press of Kingsport, Tenn., the convention heard a report from Earl Derrick, president of the Kingsport local.

He said the local has made considerable progress in signing up some of the strikebreakers who have been keeping the company in operation. The local is also continuing informational picket lines around the plant.

The Bookbinders were also asked to support efforts to organize public employes.

Atty. Richard Markowitz, counsel for the Philadelphia locals pointed out that there is a growing awareness of the right of public employes to join labor unions. Not only teachers, he said, but street cleaners, janitors, maintenance people and clerks are being given the right to organize.

Markowitz said that the trend favors the right of public employes to organize although there are still pockets of reaction against it.

The convention voted salary increases of $1,000 a year over the next two years to Pres. John Connolly and Sec.-Treas. Wesley A. Taylor.

Wage Earners Receive Short End Of Booming Corporate Profits

Money has been flowing into the cash boxes of corporations at a considerably faster rate than into the pay checks of America's workers.

The result, an AFL-CIO researcher notes, is "a growing imbalance" in the nation's economy.

Ray MacDonald, writing in the July issue of the AFL-CIO American Federationist, points out that the bookkeeping "profit" figures are only a part of a corporation's "cash flow"—the money which is available to a firm to spend or pay out in dividends after all its costs and taxes are paid.

Special "fast depreciation" tax laws passed to aid business have added untaxed billions to the amount a corporation has available to spend or invest.

In the period since 1960, MacDonald says, "increased profit margins plus soaring sales brought skyrocketing profits and cash flow."

Profits, of course, are necessary to this country's economic health and growth. But, the article warns, "profits, much like an engine, may also provide too much power to the rear wheels and burn off money wage gains. This is the imbalance which confronts the nation today."

Between 1960 and the first quarter of 1968, the cash flow to corporations moved up nearly 85 percent. In contrast, total after-tax personal income rose only 63 percent—and this reflects increased employment as well as income gains of individuals.

The comparable percentage increase in after-tax earnings of the non-supervisory worker was less than 27 percent.

In terms of buying power, the ordinary worker is only 9.6 percent better off today than in 1960—and no better off than three years ago.

The article notes that "during the last three years, attempts by workers to increase their buying power have been largely washed away by more rapid price increases. As workers sought to catch up with rising living costs and the gains of the economic advance, business raised prices at a much faster pace than in the early 1960s. The major gains in income have continued to go to profits, dividends, interest payments and executive salaries."

This lag in wages "has increased the income gap between different groups in our society," the Federationist article comments.

But apart from the principle of equity, it poses a threat to the future of the nation's economy by undermining the necessary expansion in consumer markets.

The article stresses that "unless sales increase along with industry's ability to produce, goods will pile up in warehouses and on loading docks. Such a chain of consequences can eventually bring a downturn in the economy, cutbacks in production schedules and layoffs."

Stockholders have been riding a big boom—the value of their investment has generally been recouped in a mere five to six years.

But the fuel which keeps the economy going is consumer income. And, the article stresses, "the major source of consumer income is the wages and salaries of working people."

Its conclusion: "A better balance in the national economy must be achieved between wages and salaries on the one hand and business profits, cash flow and dividends on the other."

Or putting it another way, pay raises are necessary to the economy so that the goods America produces can find a market.

Mary Logan Joins Social Security Staff

Miss Mary Logan has joined the AFL-CIO Dept. of Social Security as an assistant director.

She formerly was assistant director of the National Medical Association Foundation specializing in prepaid group medical practices for urban poor people.

Miss Logan also has worked as an administrative assistant with the Dept. of Health in Puerto Rico, a consultant to Litton Industries and as an environmental health writer.

Unprecedented Action:

Stage Union Bids Humphrey Its Best

Kansas City, Mo.—Vice Pres. Hubert H. Humphrey, kept by illness from the 49th convention of the Theatrical Stage Employes here, nevertheless received the union's unprecedented "best wishes for success in his campaign" for the presidency.

Minnesota Sen. Walter F. Mondale represented the vice president at the meeting. He urged the election of Humphrey as the man who could continue the country's progress.

Although the union has never endorsed by resolution a presidential candidate, IATSE Pres. Richard F. Walsh received a roaring vote of approval when he asked permission of the delegates to dispatch a telegram to Humphrey wishing his return to health.

High on the discussion list of problems facing the industry was that of "runaway" filming by companies going to foreign countries to produce motion pictures and thereby causing a serious loss of employment for American workers and craftsmen.

The IATSE executive board last Apr. 4 granted Walsh emergency powers "to take whatever steps may be necessary to combat foreign film production by American producers." An initial appropriation of $100,000 was made to acquaint the public with the facts about "runaway production" and to launch a campaign to save American-made motion pictures.

On internal matters, the convention turned down resolutions proposing a "one-man, one-vote" change in delegate representation which would have diminished the representation of the smaller locals. Also rejected was a move to attempt to arrange for a common expiration date for the contracts of all local unions.

AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler, addressing the convention, expressed concern that "there is an emotion developing in the country that is negative in its character."

"We are going to have to put across our story in a positive vein," Schnitzler declared, listing achievements such as medicare, the education acts, increases in social security and civil rights legislation.

He concluded his remarks with a personal enndorsement of Humphrey. "He fought for union rights everywhere, when some of our best friends ducked the issue," Schnitzler declared, and described how, when labor was under attack during the Landrum-Griffin debates, Humphrey took the Senate floor and spoke for more than an hour about what is good about the trade union movement.

"In my opinion, never have the man and the times been better suited to each other," Schnitzler declared.

COPE Dir. Al Barkan, speaking earlier in the convention, emphasized the same theme, lauding Humphrey for consistently voting "right" 60 times as a senator, according to an AFL-CIO scoreboard, while making not a single "wrong" vote.

Union members must not be sidetracked from the essential issues, Barkan said. He listed a number of election contests in which "phony" issues of race, riots and beatniks were raised to induce labor to desert proven friends in Congress and bring about their defeat.

Declared Barkan: "For the next four months, nothing, absolutely nothing is more important to your union, your members, than the outcome of the '68 election."

Jack Valenti, president of the Motion Picture Association, early in the convention discussed proposals to increase production of feature films in the United States and the problems of training programs for new employes in the industry.

In the final session of the convention Walsh was re-elected president of IATSE and John A. Shuff was returned as secretary-treasurer. Nine vice presidents also were elected.

Sugar Workers Sue To End Exclusion

New Orleans—A union representing Louisiana sugar workers has filed a test suit in U.S. District Court here challenging the right of the National Labor Relations Board or any other federal agency to deny them the protections offered other workers in organizing and bargaining collectively.

The suit, filed by Agricultural & Allied Workers Local 300 of the Meat Cutters, asks that a three-judge panel be assigned to hear the complaint of 325 tractor drivers that the NLRB violated the equal protection clause of the U.S. constitution when it ruled that "agricultural laborers" are excluded from the labor act.

Early in April, Local 300 asked that the South Coast Corp. recognize the union as bargaining agent for the drivers, who work on sugar plantations for the corporation. When management refused, the union appealed to the NLRB, which declined to act, according to H. L. Mitchell of the union.

Group Pleads For Fertilizer Center Funds

A trade union delegation came from Muscle Shoals, Ala., to the offices of key senators and congressmen to make a case for appropriations needed to prevent further cutbacks at TVA's National Fertilizer Development Center—where nearly 400 union members have been laid off in recent months.

The center has been the source of most advances in fertilizer technology for more than 30 years and is largely self-supporting. But funds for essential new plant facilities have been squeezed out of this year's budget.

The delegation, including Pres. Barney Weeks of the Alabama State AFL-CIO, received backing from the Senate Appropriations Committee, which has approved $3 million to avoid further cutbacks. The House had failed to vote any money for the program.

With Weeks on the mission to Congress were Wylie E. Chaffin of the Tri-Cities Central Labor Union, Sec.-Treas. Charlie J. Wilson of the Alabama State Council of Machinists, and Clayton Suddith, president of Iron Workers Local 477, also representing the state building trades unions.

The group sought both support in the Senate for the appropriations and backing in the House to accept money added by the Senate for the fertilizer center.

The unions have been leading the fight for funding of the program.

Land Sale Swindlers Curbed by Housing Bill

Prospective buyers of "retirement paradise" property henceforth will be able to tell if it lives up to advertised claims or is something more nearly resembling a swamp.

Sellers of such property must provide detailed information on its nature to prospective buyers under a little-publicized section of the housing bill which was awaiting final action by Congress.

The bill's truth-in-land-sales provision culminates a four-year battle for such a measure led by Sen. Harrison A. Williams, Jr. (D-N.J.), with strong support from labor.

Williams headed a Senate Banking subcommittee hearing in 1964 that uncovered wide evidence of exploitation of consumers, including many retired persons, through false land advertising.

At that time, the AFL-CIO testified that an "urgent need exists to protect the public against such practices and curb, by regulation, land speculators bilking unwary consumers of hard-earned money through such misrepresentation."

In turn, the AFL-CIO strongly supported the new provision in the housing bill, which previously passed the Senate but not the House and was retained in the conference committee report.

Until now there has been no means by which a prospective land buyer could get accurate, unbiased information except where he is buying land in the state in which he lives and if this state requires such information.

Under the bill, a developer of land sold in interstate commerce must file with the secretary of housing and urban development information as to ownership of the land, title, physical nature, roads and utilities, and other matters.

All pertinent information on the land would then be included in a property report, approved by the secretary, which would have to be furnished the buyer.

Failure to comply with the law's provisions could bring the offender five years in jail, a $5,000 fine, or both. Also, aggrieved land purchasers could sue the developer for damages in a state or federal court.

Further, the secretary may seek an injunction in a federal court against any developer where it can be shown that he is violating, or about to violate, the law.

The law would cover undeveloped land which is subdivided into 50 or more lots and which is to be sold or leased as part of a common promotional plan. Cemetery lots, lots larger than five acres and land sold for certain types of construction are exempt.

Senate Group OKs Separate Maritime Unit

A bill to transform the Maritime Administration into an independent federal agency as a means of bolstering the sagging U.S. merchant fleet was unanimously approved by the Senate Commerce Committee.

The legislation, headed for the Senate floor, is the same bill that passed the House last year with strong bipartisan support. The vote then was 324 to 44.

The measure is a prime legislative objective of the AFL-CIO Maritime Trades Dept. It was supported by the 1965 AFL-CIO convention and has since been reaffirmed by the AFL-CIO Executive Council.

In 1966, the Administration sought to have the Maritime Administration, now under the Commerce Dept., made part of the new Transportation Dept. The move, opposed by the MTD, failed.

Proponents of the independent agency bill contend that the U.S. fleet was "built up" during the period 1936-1950 under an independent maritime commission, while its decline dates from its 1950 absorption into the Commerce Dept.

Landmark Housing Measure Heads Toward Final Passage by Congress

gram over the next three years.

The amount of mortgages could not exceed $15,000 normally, and $17,500 in high cost areas. These limits would be increased to $17,500 and $20,000 for families of five or more persons.

A family could qualify for the home ownership program as long as its income was not more than 35 percent above the income ceilings for families in public housing. These ceilings vary widely from city to city.

The practical effect of this provision would be to restrict the program to families earning in the range of $3,500 to $7,500 a year.

The legislation provides for 375,000 new public housing units over the next three years at $400 million, a $1.4 billion authorization for urban renewal, $140 million for rent supplements and $1 billion for model cities.

There are other new programs in the legislation:

One would assist nonprofit groups and cooperatives in building housing that could be rented at reasonably low rates. The federal government would subsidize 40-year mortgage interest rates above 1 percent.

A second new program requires land developers to furnish vital information on their property to be passed along to prospective buyers. There are penalties for misrepresentation and for not filing. (Story this page).

A third new program creates a federal-private system to insure homes and businesses against damage from riots and floods. The federal government would contribute $250 million for each.

Also new is a program to provide federal guarantees for the financing of so-called "new towns."

The bill also includes provisions for financing rehabilitation, rural and college housing, mass transit plans, mortgage insurance for nonprofit hospitals and water and sewer projects.

Coast Building Trades Leader Set to Retire

San Francisco—Bryan P. Deavers, president of the California State Building & Construction Trades Council since 1956, will not seek another term at the council's 44th convention, due to start July 31 at Los Angeles.

Deavers is 68. His successor will be chosen Aug. 2 by delegates, the council said. Convention speakers will include Pres. C. J. Haggerty of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept., and Mayors Joseph L. Alioto of San Francisco and Sam Yorty, Los Angeles.

Rejects 'Racist' Vote:

Humphrey Spurns 'Deal' with Wallace

By John M. Barry

Vice Pres. Hubert H. Humphrey made it unmistakeably clear that he would have no part of a "deal" with former Alabama Gov. George C. Wallace even if that means losing the presidential election.

Humphrey, resuming his campaign for the Democratic nomination after a bout with the flu, declared at a New York press conference:

"I would rather not be President, I would rather not be nominated as the presidential candidate than depend on a racist vote to get the nomination or the election."

The Vice President issued his declaration amid mounting concern among both Democrats and Republicans that Wallace's third-party candidacy could draw enough electoral college votes to prevent either of the major party candidates from achieving a majority. This would throw the choice of President into the House of Representatives, where each state would cast a single vote controlled by the dominant party in its House delegation.

This is precisely the goal Wallace's strategy is aimed toward. The former Alabama governor, who stands little chance of winning an Electoral College majority himself, would then be in a position to seek what he calls "a covenant" to throw the support of his electors to either of the other candidates in exchange for concessions on legislation, federal appointments, etc.

In other developments:

- The Glass & Ceramic Workers joined the list of unions giving direct and formal endorsement to Humphrey's candidacy. Pres. Ralph Reiser, announcing the action of the union's executive board, cited the Vice President's 23 years of service in elective office and said: "In that time, he has never lost touch with the working people, minority groups, the poor and dispossessed. He never stopped building a better country for all."
- Humphrey, in response to an invitation from Rep. Hale Boggs (D-La.), chairman of the Democratic convention Platform Committee, outlined seven "themes" he suggested the party platform must stress:

1. "Peace, national security and arms control.
2. "Civil peace and social justice—firm order in our cities with programs to insure a decent life for all our citizens. . . .
3. "A 'Marshall Plan' to enhance the quality of life in our great metropolitan areas. . . .
4. "Programs and policies to achieve the goals of full employment, higher incomes and rising living standards. . . .
5. "The strengthening of our free enterprise system to insure continued economic growth without inflation.
6. "An open presidency in an open society, designed to insure citizen participation at all levels of government. . . .
7. "The adaptation of the institutions which maintain and strengthen our society to the discoveries of science and technology."

and other Republicans which would have slashed model cities funds in half.

The money is part of the appropriations bill for independent agencies. The measure includes other vital funds such as $1.25 billion for urban renewal, $38.8 million for urban planning, $165 million for water and sewer grants, $65 million for rent supplements and $9 million to implement the "open housing" section of the new Civil Rights Act.

The bill now goes to a Senate-House conference. The House, in May, approved only $500 million for model cities and nothing for urban renewal or the "open housing" section. However, it indicated it might approve the funds once they were authorized. Model cities and urban renewal funds are both authorized in the new housing bill.

The Senate moved to exempt nearly 800,000 government jobs from the congressional mandate for reductions in federal employment.

The aim of the mandate, written into the tax increase enacted in June, was to limit hiring in the executive to not more than three out of four vacancies until total jobs are reduced to the level of June 30, 1966.

The Senate, in approving appropriations for the Transportation Dept. voted to exempt present and prospective Federal Aviation Administration air controllers from the mandate. The Senate Post Office Committee voted an exemption for postal workers.

Gun Bill Passed

The House, by a 304 to 118 vote, passed a bill to prohibit mail order sales of rifles and shotguns, similar to the existing ban on such shipments of hand guns. Mail-order sales were banned on ammunition for pistols but not for long guns.

House passage sent the measure to the Senate, where the Judiciary Committee approved a similar bill by a 9-2 vote.

Excluded from the gun legislation to date is the Administration's proposal for registration and licensing of guns. But proponents indicate they will fight for these provisions when the bill reaches the Senate floor.

Lawmakers reportedly have received more than a million pieces of mail on gun legislation in recent weeks. Sen. Clifford P. Case (R-N. J.) said he alone has received 80,000 messages, most of them demanding Administration proposals.

House-Senate conference committees agreed on final versions of pipeline safety and highway construction bills, and in both cases the measures were considerably weakened from Administration proposals.

In other developments:

- The House approved a $1.99 billion foreign aid authorization, compared to the $2.9 billion sought by the President. The Senate Foreign Relations Committee reported out a bill sustaining the slash. Final debate on foreign aid on the Senate floor is not expected until September.
- The House Labor Committee reported out Administration bills to strengthen workers' pension protection, provide greater safety in construction and direct the secretary of labor to make a study of the problems of seasonality in construction. The latter measure has been reported by the Senate Labor Committee but the other two measures are still in the hearing stage in the Senate.
- The Senate Judiciary Committee put off for at least a week, possibly until September, any action on the President's Supreme Court appointments—Justice Abe Fortas to succeed Chief Justice Earl Warren and Homer Thornberry to the high court vacancy created by Warren's announced retirement.

Paul Jennings Takes Post on Thomas Fund

New York—Pres. Paul Jennings of the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers has been named vice chairman of the Norman Thomas Endowment at the New School for Social Research here.

In announcing the appointment, New School Pres. John R. Everett, said the endowment seeks to raise $1.2 million to establish a professorship and ten graduate fellowships as a tribute to Thomas' "spirit of free and courageous inquiry."

In accepting the post to coordinate labor participation in the endowment, Jennings said Thomas "deserves special recognition as a great leader and ally of American labor" for his efforts on behalf of unions.

Among other officials of AFL-CIO unions on the sponsoring committee are Presidents Kenneth J. Brown, Lithographers; William Pollock, Textile Workers Union of America; A. Philip Randolph, Sleeping Car Porters; Jerry Wurf, State, County & Municipal Employes; Louis Stulberg, Ladies' Garment Workers, and David Dubinsky, ILGWU honorary president.

House Urged to Adopt Strong Food Stamp Bill

House members have been urged by the AFL-CIO to support a substitute food stamp bill to be offered by Rep. Leonor K. Sullivan (D-Mo.) early next week.

The House Agriculture Committee voted out a $245 million food stamp authorization for 1969, only $20 million above last year, and put a ban on food stamps going to strikers or college students.

However, there is mounting support for Mrs. Sullivan's substitute which would provide an "open end" authorization for food stamps for four years and remove the ban.

In a letter to House members, AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller said, "The proposed $20 million increase is inadequate to meet requests before the secretary of agriculture" from local governments desiring to participate in the program.

Noting that food stamp recipients must be certified "needy" by local welfare agencies, Biemiller said stamps may be needed because of a hurricane, a flood, earthquake, or because of lack of employment opportunities.

"Certainly," he added, "they ought not to be denied families because the breadwinner . . . is exercising his lawful right to ask a higher price for his labor than management is willing to pay."

The food stamp legislation was slated to come up in the House just ahead of a bill to extend basic farm price supports.

Histadrut Unit Sets Kennedy Scholarships

New York—Contributions of $10,000 have been received for the Robert F. Kennedy memorial scholarship fund set up by the American Trade Union Council for Histadrut.

The scholarships will benefit underprivileged youth in Israel, said Moe Falikman, council chairman.

Labor unions in the New York area so far have contributed $5,000 and the New York League for Histadrut donated another $5,000. Histadrut is the Israel Federation of Labor.

For each $2,500 in the endowment fund, one scholarship will be granted an Israeli student for vocational or academic high school education. The scholarships will be given solely on merit to Jewish, Christian or Moslem youngsters.

Falikman said that the American Trade Union Council for Histadrut has launched a nationwide campaign to raise funds for the Kennedy scholarship fund.

Historic Gains Won by Steelworkers

Labor Stresses Urgent Need Of 'Massive' Aid for Cities

400,000 Covered:

Steel Pact Benefits Exceed $1 Billion

By Eugene A. Kelly

Pittsburgh—The Steelworkers won the biggest contract settlement ever negotiated in the basic steel industry by nailing down ahead of schedule a package of wage and working-condition benefits valued at "considerably in excess" of $1 billion for 400,000 workers.

The settlement, achieved without a strike or government intervention, headed off an Aug. 1 contract expiration deadline.

Negotiators for the union and 11 basic steel companies reached agreement in principle June 30 after nearly three months of intensive talks. After ratification by a 3-1 vote of USWA top officers and local union presidents, the conferees started writing the contract language for formal signing, expected Aug. 3.

The contract package includes successive yearly raises of 20, 12 and 12 cents an hour; additional 1-cent raises in increments between job classifications; an "earnings protection" program for employes displaced by technological changes; machinery for improving incentives; a new vacation bonus program, and improvements in pensions, supplemental benefits, holidays, insurance and shift differentials.

The package, Pres. I. W. Abel said in announcing settlement, adds up to the largest ever negotiated in the industry. Neither he nor man-

Aerospace Unions Win Key Issues

Los Angeles — A milestone three-year contract gave 50,000 Machinists Union members wage and fringe gains from 97 cents to $1.03 an hour over the term and averted strikes at two giant aerospace companies.

The pact provides such innovations as dental care, outpatient psychiatric care and group auto insurance plans. Annual wage hikes will be 6, 3 and 3 percent respectively over the term.

Machinists ratified by better than 75 percent at most locations of Lockheed Aircraft and McDonnell-Douglas from Hawaii to Florida.

Auto Workers' members at McDonnell-Douglas also overwhelmingly approved the contract.

However, Machinists at Lockheed's Marietta, Ga., plant, where the Big C5 cargo plane is made, rejected the pact by 52 percent and will meet Aug. 4 to act either on improved local issues or a strike. Five-day contract termination notice was to be sent to the company July 31.

All other Lockheed sites approved the new contract.

Some McDonnell-Douglas locations, notably Vandenberg AFB and Sacramento, turned down the agreement but the unit vote rule resulted in overall acceptance.

Besides the general wage increase, skilled workers get an additional first-year pay jump ranging from 3 to 25 cents an hour. Skill adjustments were key union targets in negotiations.

The union-won package will benefit an estimated 94.000 bargaining unit people at both companies.

It will likely set patterns for 160,000 aerospace workers—

Labor Hails Housing Bill As 'Landmark'

Passage by Congress of "the best single housing bill in history" represents another domestic legislative victory for the Johnson-Humphrey Administration, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany declared.

The legislation, he added "rightly takes its place" with other legislative "landmarks" of the Administration—medicare, health, civil rights, education, minimum wage and anti-poverty measures.

"It is a record that will be before the American people in November and it is a record which we are certain they will approve and support." Meany said.

Meany issued a statement on the housing bill after it passed the Senate by a voice vote and the House, 226 to 135, and went to the White House for Pres. Johnson's signature.

LABOR'S PROGRAM for a massive public investment to solve the nation's urban crisis is spelled out before the Republican Platform Committee in Miami Beach by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany. The federation's statement ranged across the broad spectrum of domestic and international affairs.

No Platform Fight Seen:

Conflicting Claims Mark GOP Contest

By John M. Barry

Miami Beach—Republicans prepared to open their 1968 nominating convention amid conflicting claims by the leading contenders for the GOP presidential nomination, but with a platform designed to satisfy all segments of the party.

As the 1,333 delegates and their alternates descended on Miami Beach in advance of the Aug. 5 opening of the convention, supporters of Richard M. Nixon jubilantly announced that the former vice president now counted more than 700 firm votes for his candidacy. The announcement, issued by Herbert Klein, Nixon's press secretary, was the first outright claim by the Nixon camp that he had more than the 667 votes needed to win the nomination.

Klein stopped short of predicting a first-ballot victory for Nixon,

Meany Asks GOP Back Program

Miami Beach—Organized labor called on the Republican National Convention to draft a party platform committed to a program of "massive public investment" to overcome the "intolerable" conditions of the ghettos and solve the nation's urban crisis.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, presenting labor's case to the GOP platform subcommittee on economic affairs, urged at the head of that program a provision for "one million public service jobs now" and warned that "there is no time to waste."

"The history of this country," Meany observed, "is replete with evidence that continued disregard for deep and justified grievances leads to the violence of despair."

He gave special urgency to the need for solutions to the problems besetting America's inner cities. But this detailed statement ranged across the broad spectrum of national and international affairs, covering 46 different areas and reflecting, he said, labor's role as "the people's lobby." The same presentation also will be made to the Democratic platform committee in advance of the Democratic convention set to open in Chicago Aug. 26.

Meany expressed the belief that party platforms are "serious business" and that they should "set forth as clearly and specifically as possible what the party and its presidential nominee propose to do if the reins of government are placed in their hands."

Labor, he said, hopes that the

Senate OKs Strong Poultry Bill, Curbs Mar Food Stamp Measure

By Duane Emme

The Senate by a 73 to 0 vote passed a strong poultry inspection bill after stripping it of provisions that would have decimated the nation's federal poultry and meat inspection programs.

The House expanded the food stamp program for the poor but included in it a ban on stamps going to the families of workers who are on strike and to students.

The two developments were included among a number of actions as Congress rushed to recess for the national political conventions. It will return after Labor Day.

The bill that passed the Senate gives the states two years to set up strictly-enforced inspection programs for the 13 percent of poultry and poultry products that does not cross state lines, about 1.6 billion pounds a year.

Poultry sold in interstate commerce is already covered by federal inspection and the Senate bill includes strengthening amendments to the ten-year-old federal program.

However, before passing the bill the Senate knocked out an amendment tacked on in the Senate Agri-

NEWLY ELECTED Retail Clerks' Pres. James T. Housewright, right, receives congratulations from James A. Suffridge, who has retired after heading the union for 24 years. Housewright was elected in balloting conducted among the union's 247 locals in June.

Housewright Named Head Of RCIA

James T. Housewright is the new president of the Retail Clerks, named by the union's executive board to fill the unexpired term of James A. Suffridge, who has retired.

Suffridge, who headed RCIA for 24 years, announced his intention to retire last December. Although his term would not have expired until Sept. 1, he tendered his resignation on July 29.

Upon his resignation as president, Suffridge assumed the office of president emeritus of the union and began a four-year term as chairman of the executive board.

Meanwhile, the union announced that official results of balloting conducted among the union's locals in June show that Housewright defeated John T. Haletsky, 111,785 to 69,076, in the election to choose Suffridge's successor.

Other results of the election showed that the entire Housewright slate of candidates for ten vice presidencies also was elected. RCIA Sec.-Treas. William W. Maguire was reelected without opposition.

Vice presidents elected were Samuel J. Meyers, Earl D. McDavid, Peter L. Hall, David A. Wade, Ivan M. Morriss, Donald E. Carter, William A. McGrath, Thomas G. Whaley, Ronald L. Meeker and Thomas M. Russow. All but Whaley, Meeker and Russow are incumbents.

The new terms of officers begin Sept. 1. However, the board elected Whaley to fill the vice presidency vacancy created by the elevation of Housewright to the presidency.

In another development, an RCIA group calling itself a Committee for a Democratic Election announced that it would ask Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz for a second election to be conducted by the federal government.

Despite Surtax:

Profits Surge 10.2% For 457 Big Firms

Corporation profits "picked up sharply" during the second quarter of 1968 despite the 10 percent federal surtax, according to a Wall Street Journal survey of industry earnings.

The Journal survey of 457 companies showed them netting profits of just over $4.5 billion in the April-May-June quarter, a jump of 10.2 percent compared to the same period in 1967. In the same quarter a year ago, profits were down 6.4 percent.

The strong gain in corporate earnings "came as a surprise" to many executives, the Journal reported. They expected earnings to rise, but not as much as the 11.1 percent over-the-year increase recorded in the first quarter of 1968.

The Journal observed that the surging profits trend of the second quarter was held down by the 10 percent surtax, which was retroactive to Jan. 1 for corporations. This also made exact comparisons between last year and this year difficult because some firms applied the tax hike to the second quarter profits while others spread it over the past six months.

The biggest profits gain in the second quarter was the stunning 131 percent rise scored by the nine companies in the rubber industry. But this gain was due in part to a strike which cut profits in the second quarter of 1967, the Journal explained.

Eighteen steel manufacturers showed a hefty 55 percent profits gain in the second quarter. This was linked to an inventory build-up by steel customers hedging against a steel strike.

The auto industry, with 11 firms surveyed, showed a profits rise of 10 percent. Within this group, Chrysler reported a gain of 75 percent while General Motors reported a 3.6 percent increase. Ford and American Motors hadn't reported their profits as yet.

Profit declines of 26 percent and 18 percent were reported by 7 railway equipment firms and 4 airlines, respectively. Rail officials report a fall off in new orders for rail equipment while airline carriers are adding new planes, with equipment and labor costs outrunning the gain in passenger income.

izes $5.3 billion in federal expenditures as a starter on the President's goal of 6 million adequate dwellings for low and moderate income families over the next decade.

The legislation, coupled with the open housing bill passed by Congress earlier this year, "is certain to make a major contribution to bettering life in our cities," Meany said.

Noting that the housing bill contains a "significant" section welcoming private industry and private financing of large-scale housing developments, Meany said:

"We hope the private sector will immediately avail itself of this opportunity for delay would mean additional suffering for urban dwellers who desperately need new housing."

Mortgage Rates Lead Consumer Price Rise

Home mortgage interest increases headed a parade of consumer price costs that boosted living expenses sharply in June—a rise in the Consumer Price Index that "dampened" a simultaneous rise in the purchasing power of the nation's workers, the Labor Dept. reported.

The department's Bureau of Labor Statistics released two reports on prices and earnings—one showing a rise of five-tenths of 1 percent in the June CPI to 120.9 percent—4.2 percent in a year—the other reporting record levels of gross and spendable weekly earnings.

The CPI increase for June was the largest in 32 months, BLS said. Almost half the increase was laid to the high cost of consumer services—home mortgage rates, property taxes, home insurance charges, home decoration and repair costs, rents, domestic help.

The BLS report on earnings and purchasing power said take-home pay, adjusted for price increases, averaged $79.03 a week for the worker with three dependents, $71.70 for the unmarried worker—a monthly gain of 55 cents for each, BLS Assistant Commissioner Arnold Chase told newsmen.

The CPI rise means cost-of-living pay hikes for some 45,000 workers covered by union contracts in manufacturing and transportation. The raises will range from 2 to 4 cents an hour.

BLS reported that a recent increase—from 6 to 6.75 percent—in the maximum interest rate on home loans guaranteed by the Veterans Administration, and substantial hikes in other mortgage rates were major factors in interest rises totaling nearly 4 percent.

Most other consumer items also rose, particularly clothing, shoes, gasoline and cigarettes. Apparel costs rose for the tenth consecutive month, the cost of restaurant meals for the 54th consecutive month.

Food and medical care prices also rose. The latter went up 1.2 percent, the smallest increase since the federal medicare law became effective. That led Chase to foresee "some surcease" in medical care cost rises.

The wholesale price index for July reached 109.1, an increase of four-tenths of one percent. Higher prices for livestock, meats, poultry, fresh fruits, milk and eggs were responsible for most of the advance in the agriculture-based indexes, BLS said.

Labor Blocks Pay Floor Cut In California

Los Angeles—AFL-CIO protests have saved the $1.35 hourly minimum and restored other wage and hour safeguards for thousands of young working Californians in a crucial battle before the state Industrial Welfare Commission.

The commission voted 3 to 2 to reverse itself and dissolve a temporary order which had watered down conditions in 11 of 14 industrial groupings, some heavily dependent on the under-21 labor pool.

In a tandem action, the commission moved to bring a virtual bill of rights to household domestic workers. It ordered creation of a panel to write protective standards on minimum wages, hours and conditions for the long-neglected domestic.

The California Labor Federation vigorously protested the temporary order on minors in a brief filed with the commission. At public hearings here and in San Francisco, labor spokesmen bitterly attacked the "emergency" order as both punitive to female students and discriminatory of minors in general.

The order first was approved 4 to 1, with only commission chairman J. J. Rodriquez, Secretary-Treasurer of Butchers Local 562 of Los Angeles, dissenting.

But Ruth Compagnon, secretary-treasurer of Los Angeles Waitresses Local 639, and public member Dorothy Colt of Los Angeles joined Rodriquez this time to reverse the earlier action.

The interim order, by revising the definition of "student" raised the "minor" age ceiling from 21 to 25 for girls—thus depriving many of receiving the $1.35 hourly minimum for women. Minors get $1.05 per hour minimum. It also scrapped time-and-a-half overtime pay for minors working more than 40 hours in a six day week.

Four students joined labor in testifying for a change in the order. Spokesmen for the Los Angeles and San Diego Young Women's Christian Assn. branches also urged the commission to rescind.

9 Months of Frustrating Talks End in 4-Plant Campbell Strike

Nine months of frustrated bargaining effort led 7,000 employes of Campbell Soup Co. to strike in protest against the big food firm's "take it or leave it" negotiating techniques.

Members of three unions at four soup plants walked out from July 25-29 and 600 other unionists have voted to take strike action when vacation shutdowns end next week.

On strike against what the unions call Campbell's refusal to bargain in good faith are 3,400 members of the Meat Cutters and Machinists at Camden, N.J., Campbell headquarters; 1,100 Meat Cutters at Paris, Tex.; 1,300 members of the same union at Napoleon, O., and 1,200 Teamsters at Sacramento, Calif.

Ready to go out are vacationing workers at a poultry plant in Chestertown, Md., and an equipment-making plant at Moorestown, N.J. A seventh plant—the only one of Campbell's soup manufactories still producing—is expected to be affected when the Midwest tomato crop is ready for harvesting. Workers there, at Chicago, are represented by the Retail, Wholesale & Dept. Store Union.

Unions representing Campbell employes joined last February to coordinate their negotiations after years of settlements imposed by divide-and-conquer tactics, according to the joint union coordinator, Stephen Harris of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept.

The AFL-CIO Executive Council received a report on Campbell negotiations in May and assured the affiliated unions "of our complete support in their efforts to win an equitable agreement."

"In the event they are forced to strike," the council said May 14, "we will support a consumer Do Not Buy campaign against Campbell products" with the following brand names: Campbell soups and foods, Bounty, Franco-American, Pepperidge Farm, Swanson Frozen Foods and V-8 Products.

Negotiations started at Paris, Tex., last October, and at other Campbell locations afterwards. At each plant, management made one offer to increase wages, and ordered it into effect when employes rejected it. That triggered the strike.

The unions said they also seek substantial wage improvements, a cost of living escalator clause, noncontributory insurance, better pension and vacation terms, a ninth paid holiday, and the withdrawal of three retrogressive clauses sought by Campbell management. Two of the clauses would undercut insurance protection and the third would weaken call-in pay provisions, they said.

The unions joined in a statement saying "the men and women who work for Campbell Soup are on strike for deserved economic improvements and for real collective bargaining.

"Campbell employes know it has long been the custom of management to dictate terms on a paternalistic basis, reinforced by the company's command to 'take it or leave it.'

"That practice will have to stop. This year and in the future, the unions at Campbell Soup want real collective bargaining . . . fair wage levels and decent benefits. The company's divide-and-conquer policy must give way to good faith bargaining."

Fulbright Wins Over 3 in Primary

Little Rock—Sen. J. W. Fulbright (D-Ark.) won renomination in the Arkansas primary against three Democratic opponents with 53 percent of the vote.

Losers were Jim Johnson, an outspoken segregationist and strong backer of Alabama's Gov. George Wallace; Bobby K. Hayes, a Calico Rock lumberman; and Foster Johnson, a music publisher here.

Fulbright now faces a tough encounter in the Nov. 5 general election from Republican Charles Bernard, an Earle businessman-banker, who was unopposed in the primary.

State Rep. Marion Crank of Foreman led a six-way race for the Democratic gubernatorial race but faces a runoff, Aug. 13, against either Mrs. Jim Johnson or Ted Boswell, a Bryant attorney. Their race was in doubt.

Republican Governor Winthrop Rockefeller won renomination overwhelmingly over a single opponent.

Settlement Averts Strike:

'Largest Ever' Gains Scored In Basic Steel Agreement

agement would pinpoint the estimated hourly cost but Abel said it was "probably within a range" of 90 cents to $1 an hour over the full contract term.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany extended his "heartiest congratulations" and "warm personal regards" to Abel and the union, saying "you have once again proven that free collective bargaining, backed by the solid support of union members, can provide economic justice for workers and their families."

Dir. William E. Simkin of the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service congratulated both sides for an "outstanding achievement" in bargaining without any government intervention.

The steel pact, plus settlements reached earlier in aerospace, "make this a good week for collective bargaining," Simkin said.

The day after the steel settlement, the nation's two largest steel firms reported "swollen" profits on sharply increased sales for the first six months of 1968—$128.5 million for U.S. Steel, up from $84.5 million in 1967's first half, $93.5 million for Bethlehem Steel, compared with $66 million for the year-ago period.

At the same time Bethlehem announced 5 percent across-the-board price increases, and U.S. Steel gave notice of selective increases. Pres. Johnson urged other steel firms not to follow Bethlehem's lead in order to avoid "dire economic consequences." The Bethlehem increase "far exceeds any reasonable calculation" of the cost of the new contract settlement, he told a White House press conference.

Other companies incolved in the settlement with the USWA are Allegheny-Ludlum Steel, Armco Steel, CF&I Steel Corp., formerly Colorado Fuel & Iron; Inland Steel, Jones & Laughlin Steel, National Steel, Pittsburgh Steel, Republic Steel, Youngstown Sheet & Tube Co.

The union released these highlights of the settlement:

Wages: effective Aug. 1, 1968, a general wage increase of 20 cents an hour and a raise of one-half cent an hour in the increment between each of 33 job classifications; effective August 1, 1969, another 12 cents in wages and three-tenths of one cent in increments; effective Aug. 1, 1970, an additional 12 cents in wages and two-tenths of a cent in increments.

Incentives: a joint incentive group was established to "deal with critical incentive problems in steel-producing operations, including incentive coverage." The group will report by Aug. 1, 1969, with any disputed items subject to settlement by a special arbitration panel, and backpay of 10 cents an hour to be given employes not previously covered by the incentive plan.

Extended vacations: during a five-year period starting Jan. 1, 1969, each employe in the top half of the company-wide seniority list will become eligible for a 13-week extended vacation, including his regular vacation. Each employe in the lower half of the list will be eligible for his regular vacation plus three weeks.

Vacation bonus: employes will receive a $30 vacation bonus for each week of regular vacation in 1969, 1970 and 1971, except for those receiving extended vacations in those years.

SUB benefits: the basic weekly formula will be raised from 24 times average straight-time hourly earnings to 26 times, with the maximum increased from $37.50 to $52.50 a week while an employe draws state jobless benefits, and from $60 to $80 a week thereafter.

Earnings Protection: a program financed by 2 cents per manhour worked will go into effect after a study to be "instituted promptly and completed by June 30, 1969. Primary emphasis will be to protect earnings of employes affected" by technological changes.

Pensions: effective Aug. 1, 1969, minimum benefits will be increased from $5 a month to $6 per year of service to a maximum of 35 years, with the present social security deduction to be eliminated. A new survivor benefit will be payable on the 1969 date to a surviving spouse who qualifies, with an increase also of $10 a month to those retiring before July 31, 1968.

The contract improves insurance and major medical coverage. It increases shift pay differentials by 10 and 15 cents an hour. Seniority rights in transfers, promotions and new facilities manning are expanded.

The new pacts provide pay for bereavement leave, one additional holiday for a total of eight, witness pay added to jury-duty pay, and improvements in apprentice training provisions.

AGREEMENT ON BIGGEST benefit increase ever negotiated in the steel industry was announced in Pittsburgh by Pres. I. W. Abel of the Steelworkers, left, and R. Conrad Cooper, chief industry negotiator. Abel put the value of the new three-year pact at "considerably in excess" of $1 billion for 400,000 workers.

Improved Pact Ends Metropolitan Strike

Striking members of the Insurance Workers voted in a nationwide referendum to accept a revised contract offer and a return-to-work agreement at 500 district offices of Metropolitan Life Insurance Co.

The contract package contains "some improvements," the union said, over an offer recommended in May by union negotiators but rejected later by Met agents. It called for pay increases averaging $13.75 a week over a 32-month period; improved fringe benefits, and a maintenance of membership clause.

The return-to-work agreement was a compromise aimed at settling a dispute over the future status of 38 agents the company wanted to "discipline." It was agreed that company charges against 9 of the 38 will be submitted to an arbiter for impartial review; the other 29 charges will not be pressed.

The strike started May 20 after locals representing 6,500 members rejected the first Met offer. Negotiations were resumed at the request of the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service but broke down again when Metropolitan demanded the right to discipline "an undisclosed number of strikers for undisclosed reasons."

The compromise was worked out after an appeal by FM&CS Dir. William E. Simkin for another effort to settle the dispute.

The vote to return to work ended a consumer "don't buy" campaign launched against Metropolitan. IWIU Vice Pres. Robert L. Ponsi attributed the satisfactory settlement to the determination and militancy of the membership and the support of other AFL-CIO unions.

Aerospace Unions Win Major Contract Gains

most members of the Machinists and UAW—whose contracts will be negotiated later this year.

Settlement was reached less than 48 hours before possible strikes. No mediation was involved.

Union negotiators joined in hailing the new aerospace pact as "representing the equity and justice we all have recognized are due aerospace workers for skills, productivity and contribution to national welfare on a par with workers in any basic industry."

One of the warmest emotional issues was dental care. This will start Jan. 1, 1969 for Machinists members at McDonnell-Douglas and 12 months later for the UAW. The company provided four cents an hour toward funding.

At Lockheed, a voluntary auto insurance program will enable lower premiums through group purchase and minimize policy cancellations at the whim of the carrier.

Basic monthly pensions were increased about $1 per year of service, to an average $5.75. It goes to $6.25 at McDonnell-Douglas in 18 months.

Other fringe improvements at the latter include wages-related disability income, disability benefits during layoff if none available elsewhere, elimination of workmen's compensation offset on disability pensions and active medical coverage of retirees to age 65.

The auto industry's prescription drug plan starts in the third year of the McDonnell-Douglas agreement.

The contracts provide no cost-of-living adjustment the first year. A 3 to 8 cent spread is provided second and third years.

Machinists, who have been battling the growing use of contract workers at Lockheed, won restrictions on so-called "job shoppers." Management agreed it would not, for one thing, contract with other employers to supply personnel for tool making work.

Union Summer Schools Stress Political Action

Political action heads the subject list at 150 week-long union schools being conducted this year on campuses across the country.

More than 15,000 trade unionists are participating in the schools, according to Walter G. Davis, director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Education.

"The primary emphasis this year is being placed on issues relating to the 1968 political campaign," Davis said. "Union members are also studying how they can become more effective politically.

"Trade unions have a history in political action going back to their successful campaigns for free public education and elimination of debtors' prisons," he added. "The issues today are no less important. The AFL-CIO and its affiliated unions believe the key to a better society is education. An informed membership becomes an active membership."

Davis said this year's summer schools are also conducting classes in how to run better union meetings, how to process grievances and how to make a speech.

Many of the schools are featuring leaders from labor, government and the universities as instructors.

Davis said the AFL-CIO Dept. of Education is also conducting "a major feasibility study of a permanent Institute of Labor Studies."

The study was ordered by the AFL-CIO Executive Council and was approved by the 1967 AFL-CIO convention.

An Institute of Labor Studies, the convention noted, could be utilized "to upgrade the skills of the officers and staff of the American labor movement and to prepare them adequately to meet their leadership responsibilities."

The study includes details on the scope, cost, location and other aspects of developing the institute.

A major change in labor education has developed with the trade union movement's acceptance on most college campuses.

Many unions hold weekend education conferences throughout the year, as well as week-long institutes in Washington keyed to legislative functions, he pointed out.

D. C. Stereo Union Wins $36 Raise

Stereotypers Local 19 won wage increases of $36 a week over a three-year contract period and an additional $9 a week in vacation, sick leave and hospital benefits after a strike of less than 72 hours that closed down three Washington, D.C., daily papers.

Some 75 union members ratified an offer for wage increases of $12 each year over the old contract scale of $156.50 a week.

About 4,000 members of other unions respected strike picket lines when the stereotypers walked out July 24 after their contract expired.

Aluminum Workers Ratify New Contract

St. Louis—Striking Aluminum Workers ratified a new economic agreement with the Aluminum Co. of America and Reynolds Metals Co. but four locals remained on strike over local issues and one postponed a return to work until craft contracts are settled.

Members at nine plants returned to work or awaited callbacks after terms of a three-year contract covering wages, pensions and insurance improvements were approved in a union vote by a narrow margin—51 percent in favor, 49 percent opposed, the AWIU said.

Negotiations resumed July 31 on local issues that kept members on the picket line at Alcoa plants in Lebanon, Pa., and Lafayette, Ind., and Reynolds plants at Massena, N.Y., and Corpus Christi, Tex.

Members at Reynolds' Lister Hill plant at Sheffield, Ala., delayed returning to work until plant craft unions have settled their own separate contracts.

Some 18,000 members struck June 1 to improve previous company offers based on a so-called industry "pattern." About 6,000 are still out, the union reported after the membership vote.

The economic package includes wage increases of 22 cents an hour this year, 8 cents more next year and an additional 10 cents in the final year of a three-year contract; increment adjustments of approximately 1.5 cents an hour more; and improvements in pensions, medical insurance, vacations, holidays and supplemental unemployment benefits.

Reynolds and Alcoa agreed to reimburse employes for Medicare Part B premiums of $4 a month starting next Jan. 1. They settled for a pension payment of $6.50 a month times years of service up to 40, and a vacation bonus of $30 a week starting Jan. 1, 1970.

Settlements were reached at Alcoa plants in Evansville, Ind., Davenport, Ia., Wenatchee, Wash., Massena, N. Y., and Cressona and Lancaster, Pa., and at Reynolds plants in St. Louis, Richmond, Va., and Sheffield, Ala. (one of two plants.)

The Road Out of Poverty

THE WAR ON POVERTY must be carried on along many fronts and it must basically be directed toward:

● Job opportunities at decent wages for the millions of the poor who are able to work and seek employment.

It should be noted that half of America's poverty is related to the fact that there are not enough jobs at decent pay. About half of the poor families in the United States already have a member who is in the labor force; and 25 percent are headed by persons with full-time year-round employment. The key to the solution of this major aspect of the poverty problem is the creation of enough job opportunities at decent wages to meet the need of all Americans willing and able to work.

● Adequate Social Security benefits.

Even with the 1967 increase in Social Security benefits and the enactment of Medicare, Social Security payments are still far too low. While this benefit increase raised many Social Security beneficiaries above the poverty level, millions of Americans who are dependent on Social Security payments still remain below the poverty line.

● Adequate income maintenance through a revised system of public assistance for those impoverished millions who are not self-sustaining due to absence from the home of the family breadwinner, unemployment, disability or other causes.

Our public assistance programs reach only about 25 percent of the poor and the help they provide is completely inadequate. Programs of public assistance must be extended to include all of those who are in need; a realistic national minimum standard for public assistance payments must be established below which no state may fall; federally supported welfare programs must be administered consistent with human dignity and the principle of public welfare as a right.

The road out of poverty requires full opportunities for education, housing, job training, adequate social services and effective enforcement of civil rights. All these programs, and more, are needed in the war on poverty. However, the programs that will eventually eliminate poverty must emphasize jobs and income maintenance.

THE FIRST THREE and a half years of operation of the anti-poverty program directed by the Office of Economic Opportunity has opened up for thousands of the poor opportunities for education, job training, jobs, social, legal and health services and thereby enabled them to escape from the misery and frustration of poverty. It has given hope and the promise of a better life to many thousands of other poor people.

The OEO, while giving leadership to the national anti-poverty effort, has also performed the important service of making the nation, as a whole, aware of the extent of the poverty that still exists. This national awareness of the fact that 30 million Americans are still trapped in the mire of poverty should mean renewed commitment to the job of eliminating it from our midst.

Our government made a commitment to our nation's poor when it enacted the Economic Opportunity Act of 1964. This commitment must be kept. We must continue to expand the poverty program so that it can, in fact, become the highroad out of poverty for millions of Americans.

Labor-Government Study Finds:

Most People Enjoy Retirement Despite Health, Money Cares

WHEN IT'S TIME to retire, what will it be like?

Some answers to this question were disclosed in a study made by the Los Angeles County AFL-CIO and the Administration on Aging under terms of the Older Americans Act of 1965.

Personal interviews were held with 1,250 retirees from local unions affiliated with ten internationals. The average age was 69.8 years and most had retired about 1962 after 29.8 years as union members.

Social security was a source of income for 95.3 percent and 70.1 percent received money from negotiated union pensions.

Some of the retirees had savings, but little, and their average monthly income was $300.75. Their yearly income was $3,609.00.

"When taking a closer look at income and expense data," the report said, "approximately 65 percent had average yearly incomes of less than $4,000 a year."

When it came to expenses, the great bulk of those interviewed showed that they only "got by." Their average monthly expenses were $291.55 and yearly, $3,489.60.

Sixty percent of the retirees questioned said they were enjoying their retirement. Just over 31 percent said they were enjoying their retirement "somewhat." Only 8 percent declared they were not enjoying their retirement.

About one-third said that health was their major problem in retirement and another third said it was finances. Loneliness hurt 2.6 percent and 5.3 percent said they had "nothing to do." Almost 30 percent said they had no problems.

Why did they retire? A total of 33.2 percent said it was by choice, 31.9 percent said it was mandatory and 30.7 percent gave poor health as the reason.

The great majority of the retirees were not working and there were a number of reasons. Physical conditions were cited by 42.2 percent as the reason for not working, 30.2 percent didn't want to work and 14.3 percent said no jobs were available.

Over 62 percent of the retirees owned their own homes and 37 percent rented.

Health was carefully surveyed in the study. In their replies 48 percent claimed good health, 33 percent average health and 17.5 percent poor health.

ONLY 15 PERCENT, HOWEVER, said their activities were greatly affected by "poor health." A bigger percentage of women than men complained of bad health.

One of the few editorial comments made in this report is that those questioned showed a "serious misunderstanding" of the provisions of Medicare. No doubt this was due in large part to the fact that the program had not been in effect for any length of time when the survey was conducted.

And only 22 percent of the interviewees had personal experience with the workings of this new system.

Many who did use Medicare said that one illness either would have exhausted their entire savings in order to be able to be reimbursed by the insurance carrier, or close to that.

However, in Los Angeles County, long delays in waiting for Medicare repayment were probably not as great as in many other places. The replies show that 41 percent of this sample collected within 30 days; 11.2 percent had to wait over 90 days to have their claims processed.

Asked how their doctors' fees compared after Medicare with those paid before the law went into effect, 32.2 percent said charges were higher, 27.6 percent said "the same," but over 40 percent simply didn't know.

The survey points out, however, that had the question been asked differently, probably more than 53 percent would have paid higher doctor bills. This came about because a very high proportion of those who were seen were still covered by union negotiated or various insurance plans over and above Medicare.

Between 6 and 7 percent of those who gave answers stated that their doctor fees were rejected as "unreasonable."

John Edelman, president of the National Council of Senior Citizens, praised the Los Angeles labor body for "having pioneered in this area and for having done such a revealing and technically competent job." (PAI).

Labor's Analysis:

Equal Rights, Prosperity for All Testing the American System

The following is excerpted from the statement presented by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany to the Platform Committee of the Republican National Convention in Miami Beach, Fla.

FIRST OF ALL, we want to make it clear that we in the AFL-CIO have the utmost faith in the United States, in the American political system, and in the ability of that system to adapt to any and all challenges.

We are unashamedly devoted to the American system, not in a narrow, nationalistic sense of devotion to a piece of real estate, but in the broader sense of devotion to the ideas and ideals of democratic self-government—ideas and ideals which we hope will some day extend to all the peoples of the world.

Much of our statement is critical, in the sense that it calls for broader and more vigorous government action in many areas. Let no one infer from this that we are blind to the progress America has made, or that we have lost confidence in the future.

Basically our point is this: American society has done very well indeed to serve the needs and the interests of most Americans. This has been, and still is, a land of opportunity. The millions of immigrants who, over the years, have created the America of today have, on the whole, few complaints. The streets were not paved with gold but they and their descendants have for the most part prospered. In short, America has been good to most—but, unfortunately, not to all—of her people.

What we are offering here is, in considerable part, a program to reach those who have been left behind for reasons not of their own making.

They also deserve the same chance open to others.

A society that offers almost limitless opportunities to most of its members, and almost no opportunity to the rest, is a society that needs changing.

Who are we talking about?

There is a widespread tendency today to equate poverty with race. Because Negroes have been the leading figures in the protests and the marches and yes, the disorders, there is a widespread impression that poverty and deprivation are only a Negro problem.

This is simply not true. A disproportionate number of poor people are Negroes, but the majority of poor people are white—including many thousands of white southerners.

What we are saying, in essence, is that this great country can do better than it has done until now to make those honored words, "life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness" have meaning, not just for most Americans but for all Americans.

For a long time we, too, assumed that social reform and swift economic progress would have more or less uniform effects across the board, with the greatest proportionate benefits at the neediest levels.

We were among the first to acknowledge that the assumption was wrong—that things didn't happen that way. The educated, the skilled and the well-situated, nearly all of whom are white, achieved a measure of affluence and opportunity unequalled in the history of the world. The uneducated, the unskilled and the poorly-situated, many of whom are non-white, were left behind. The gap between them and the majority widened.

THE BRIGHT PROMISE of the war on poverty, of vastly strengthened public education, of equal rights and equal opportunity backed by law faded in the cold light of reality. Making matters worse was the refusal of Congress to enact or adequately fund those programs especially vital to the disadvantaged—jobs for the hard-core unemployed, decent housing to replace slums, head-start and catch-up schooling for the culturally deprived, effective distribution of surplus foods, humane social welfare services.

So a point has been reached at which the American system is working better than ever for the majority and is working very poorly, or not at all, for the minority. That is the essence of the crisis, clear enough for anyone to see. And just as clear, to us, is the solution —making the American system work just as well for the minority as for everyone else.

This is the thrust of our proposals. This is what we believe they would achieve—not in a day or a year, not completely, perhaps, in a decade, but in time to preserve the American system from the dangerous divisions and disorders which now exist.

But there is no time to waste. The history of this country is replete with evidence that continued disregard for deep and justified grievances leads to the violence of despair.

We in the AFL-CIO have no doubt where the overwhelming majority of Americans stand. We know that despite the noisy minority of extremists, the people of this country are dedicated to the priniciples of equality and justice. But the will of the majority can be expressed only through a President and a Congress that not only share this dedication but are determined to act on it with the boldness and imagination the times demand.

We want to emphasize again that we do not appear here as prophets of doom and gloom. We are deeply concerned about the problems we have described; because efforts to meet them have been laggard, they have grown to alarming proportions. But at the same time we have unshakeable confidence in the ability of American democracy to cope with these and all other challenges the nation may face.

And so we also look beyond these difficulties, grave as they are, toward a future of boundless promise—a future whose groundwork has already been laid.

Farm Bureau Chief Opponent:

Lobby Stalls Campaign to Gain Labor Rights for Farm Workers

DESPITE A "TREMENDOUS EFFORT" by church and labor groups, "powerful lobbying voices" have blocked congressional action that would put farm workers under the National Labor Relations Act, the AFL-CIO's chief organizer charged.

The stall on legislation that would give farm workers "some level of first-class economic citizenship is a reflection on the Congress . . . and its unwillingness to recognize the 1968 needs of farm workers," declared William L. Kircher, director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Organization. Kircher appeared on the nationwide radio interview, Labor News Conference, broadcast Tuesdays at 7:35 p.m., EDT, on the Mutual Radio Network.

The union spokesman said the National Committee for Agricultural Democracy, "a coalition of Catholics, Protestants and Jews," has started a "very aggressive" two-year drive to persuade Congress to give farm workers the same right to organize unions that most other workers have had for more than 30 years.

He named the American Farm Bureau, "recognized for many years as one of the most powerful voices—lobbying voices—in the Congress," as the chief opponent of the proposal.

KIRCHER SAID the steady growth of the farm workers union, restricted by the legal exclusion that makes strikes and boycotts the only methods of winning employer recognition, is strong evidence that farm workers want unionization and are determined to achieve it. He noted that the United Farm Workers Organizing Committee now has contracts with 12 growers.

"Measured in terms of what has not been done in the past 30 or 40 years, we have done a great deal," he said, but he stressed that "measured in terms of what needs to be done, we have not done very much."

Reporters interviewing Kircher were Roy McGhee, congressional correspondent for United Press International, and Murray Seeger, Washington correspondent for the Los Angeles Times.

THE DICTIONARY of American Politics remarks that party platforms contain many "weasel" words and are not to be regarded as being as important as candidates' campaign statements. Nevertheless, despite this cynical appraisal, party platforms of the past and those of today are not to be taken lightly.

The 1968 Republican and Democratic platforms will reflect very differing views on many basic national problems of vital importance to labor. They will range from Viet Nam, "law and order", the war on poverty and civil rights to anti-labor efforts to destroy the National Labor Relations Board and cripple unions. Obviously, what the two parties say about these matters is not the least important element in the conventions that will be held in August.

The importance for labor of the party platforms is emphasized by the fact that AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany always presents the Federation's point of view before the party platform committees. What he says sets the tone for most of organized labor's positions on highly important issues, both from the national and labor viewpoints.

Party platforms go back a long way. Although far from formalized in the early days as they are now, they have played essential roles in the evolution of the philosophical positions of today's major parties. The history of the country is deeply woven in their structure.

Today's Democratic Party traces its way back to the Republican Party of Jefferson and Democratic-Republican Party of Jackson, whose platform stood for frontier democracy, equality and the abolition of special privileges. Slavery split the party wide open between its northern and southern wings and, even today, the overtones of that period can still be felt in the differences between the Dixiecrats and the northern Democrats.

The Republican Party and its platforms go back to the Hamiltonian Whigs with their emphasis on property and business interests, protective tariffs and conservative attitudes toward social and economic problems.

THESE DIFFERENCES within each party have largely shown themselves in the platforms that they adopt and in the struggles that have gone on to mold and frame the philosophy on which party candidates run.

In 1924, for instance, the Democratic convention was torn over the question of Prohibition. In 1948, the party again was rent by one of the most dramatic platform fights, this time over civil rights and Negro representation in the party. It was a struggle led by a then largely unknown—Hubert H. Humphrey, then mayor of Minneapolis, a candidate for the Senate and a member of his state's delegation on the platform committee.

There are few political observers who attended that convention who can forget how what appeared a hopeless cause became a brilliant victory for civil rights, due to Humphrey's stubborn fight on the platform committee and his eloquent and moving plea before a bitterly divided convention which eventually supported him.

Such platform battles have been comparatively few within the Republican Party. Nevertheless, there was a Republican floor fight in 1964 between the followers of conservative Barry Goldwater and the more liberal followers of Gov. Nelson Rockefeller of New York and Gov. William Scranton of Pennsylvania.

Whatever may be said about the "weasel" words that frequently crop up in party platforms and the disregard which candidates frequently pay them, the fact remains that party platforms have been and still are vital factors in the structure of a political party and can be the occasion for bitter controversy.

The year 1968 may well be a year when party platforms once again play a vital role in the posture and evolution of the major parties.

POWERFUL LOBBYING voices have blocked congressional action to put farm workers under the National Labor Relations Act, William L. Kircher, center, director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Organization, charged on Labor News Conference. Interviewing him were Roy McGhee, left, of United Press International and Murray Seeger of the Los Angeles Times. The AFL-CIO produced public affairs program is aired Tuesdays at 7:35 p.m., EDT, on Mutual Radio.

Potters Union Cites Gains in Membership

Vancouver, B.C.—Delegates to the 74th convention of the Operative Potters here were told by Pres. E. L. Wheatley that the union is scoring membership gains despite obstacles.

Organizing efforts over the past year have added to the union's rolls in Texas, California, Indiana, West Virginia, Ohio and Quebec, he pointed out. The membership gain was 7 percent for the year.

These gains were made, Wheatley said, even though the union's staff was occupied with contract talks during the first part of 1968 and imports of pottery continued to force layoffs at some U.S. and Canadian plants.

Wheatley presided over his final convention. He previously announced that he will not seek re-election when his four-year term expires later this year. His successor will be chosen in an election referendum.

In his keynote, Wheatley urged the union to devote more of its resources to educating its leaders so that they will be better equipped to meeting the challenges of changing technology.

Political Action Stressed

Calling for "a full effort" of political action by every member of the union in this election year, Wheatley told the convention's 183 delegates:

"We must support liberal candidates at the ballot box. Your obligation to your union does not end when you pay your dues."

In another area, Wheatley urged union members to continue appeals to Congress and federal agencies for some form of relief from hardships to U.S. workers being caused by imported pottery made under cheap labor conditions.

Joseph Finley, the union's general counsel, stressed the importance of locals of the union "acting in good faith" on grievance and arbitration problems.

Delegates defeated a resolution to hold the union's convention every two years instead of annually. Anaheim, Calif. was selected as the site for the 1969 convention.

Teachers' Lesson: Bargaining Pays

Ann Arbor, Mich—Organized teachers win more benefits than those who passively accept school board offers, according to a study by the Institute of Labor and Industrial Relations operated by the University of Michigan and Wayne State University.

Institute Co-director Charles M. Rehmus and UM graduate student Evan Wilner said they found that "hard collective bargaining, accompanied by the threat of strikes," has paid substantial dividends of from 10 to 20 percent to organized teachers.

The institute examined salary levels between 1961 and 1965, before the Michigan Public Employment Relations Act went into effect, and the three years since. It found that in 12 large school districts, bargaining for the 1966-67 school year brought raises averaging some 10-20 percent higher.

For the 1967-68 year, the available evidence "indicates that bargaining results were equally favorable" for teachers, the institute reported.

"WE MUST SUPPORT liberal candidates at the ballot box" or suffer the consequences of reactionary legislation, Pres. E. L. Wheatley warned delegates to the 74th convention of the Operative Potters convention in Vancouver, B.C. Wheatley has announced plans to retire at the end of his term this year.

Barbers Revise Laws, Stress New Standards

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The Barbers Union took a giant step toward standardization at its 23rd convention here.

The union revised its constitution so locals could conform to the international and the delegates in speeches and resolutions called for standardization of rules and regulations covering the profession.

Some 849 delegates at the meeting of the Journeymen Barbers, Hairdressers, Cosmetologists and Proprietors' Intl. Union also elected incumbent Pres. Joseph N. DePaola who defeated Richard Plumb of Ft. Wayne, Ind., 685 to 146; Sec.-Treas. E. M. Sanders received 709 votes to 99 for William Knapp, also of Indiana.

DePaola recommended and the convention voted to set up a general council of the union which would embody every state association. He also noted the union's educational legislative committee would offer a suggestion that standard methods of communicating with state barber boards be set up.

There are times when the state associations begin to fight the very people that they have appointed instead of communicating with these people and trying to get the kind of rules, regulations, help and support that they are dedicated and appointed to do, DePaola stated.

Standards Adopted

Other forms of standardization adopted at the meeting, came in credit union, apprenticeship and training programs as well as in techniques for hair treatment and facials.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany told the convention that while the nation's system of democratic government isn't perfect—"a better system hasn't been devised yet."

Workers under our system, he continued, "have made more progress than have the workers of any country on earth, and that is a statement that can be documented."

"The answer to our problems," Meany said, "is not to burn, but to build, to build an America which is truly a land of opportunity for all the people of America."

Resolutions passed at the convention declared that the union would continue its efforts to establish a model barber law—to "provide for the preservation of identity for each state board of barber examiners and that each shall prepare and administer its own examination."

Another said each state association should initiate an educational program, "so that the uninformed and unorganized may better understand the need for state barber and beautician laws."

Another resolution allowed the Guest Artists Association to run surveys to collect information on prices charges nationally on hairstyling, razor cutting, hair coloring and hair straightening. Included in the survey will be a check with shop owners on the cost of products.

The delegates asked for the proclamation of a national barber week and the raising of funds to buy a Rockefeller Foundation collection of old paintings, ancient razors and other artifacts of the profession reaching back several thousand years. They were collected by the late Charles Dezemler, who was a barber.

Detroit Mayor Orders City Grape Boycott

Detroit—The city of Detroit will buy no more California table grapes until growers recognize the "legitimate aspiration" of agricultural workers, it was announced here.

Mayor Jerome P. Cavanagh told newsmen he has instructed the city's purchasing director to stop purchases that run to three tons a year for city institutions. He said he took the action "as a tangible indication of our support for the legitimate aspirations" of farm workers, and in the hope that consumers and storekeepers will take similar action.

The announcement highlighted a statewide boycott effort by the Michigan Committee to Aid the Farm Workers. Joining the mayor in urging support for the boycott were the Most Rev. Walter J. Schoenherr, Catholic auxiliary bishop; Bishop Archie Crowley of the Episcopal diocese; Pres. Robert Tindal of the Detroit NAACP, and Wayne County AFL-CIO Pres. Russell Leach.

The AFL-CIO is supporting a nationwide boycott against the Giumarra Co. and allied growers who have refused to recognize the striking United Farm Workers. New York and other cities have canceled standing orders for their products.

Anthony Lang Dies; CSA Representative

Cleveland, O.—Anthony J. Lang, Community Service Activities representative for the Cleveland AFL-CIO, died here at 64 after a long illness. Lang served 18 years as labor liaison man with the Community Chest after service with the former AFL and the Marble, Slate & Stone Polishers.

Answer to Conglomerates:

Glass Union Weighs Proposal for Merger

Hollywood, Fla.—Union merger and coordinated bargaining—to meet the challenge of the conglomerate corporation—are two real and immediate possibilities for the United Glass & Ceramic Workers. At its 18th constitutional convention here, Pres. Ralph Reiser in a speech, and delegates, via resolutions, called for the moves to better labor's position against the mergers and cooperatives of huge businesses.

The new giant conglomerates are corporations with multi-market and multi-industry charactistics.

The more than 280 delegates also endorsed Hubert H. Humphrey for the presidency.

Reiser said unions are presently up against "the tremendous economic and political power" of the conglomerate. "They are impersonal giants," he said, "empires of finance and manipulation whose powers even today are beyond calculation."

It is entirely possible, he added, that coordinated bargaining will have to become "even more sophisticated" to meet the huge businesses, and "it may be that we will have to think in terms of common bargaining and of union mergers to give the whole a strength greater than the sum of its parts.

The Glass and Ceramic Workers have discussed merger with several organizations including the Glass Bottle Blowers' Association. The Operative Potters, and the Cement, Lime and Gypsum Workers may be included in future discussions.

Bargaining Ahead

Reiser also noted that contracts expire within the next 12 months in plants accounting for 85 percent of the union's 40,000 membership. It will ask for substantial wage increases: a cost-of-living allowance; wage parity for Canadians; improvements in pensions; disability income protection; and increased health care protection.

The delegates, through the merger resolution, favored "continuing efforts by our international executive board to work out a merger or affiliation with other international unions in related industries," with agreements submitted to a special or regular convention for ratification.

Coordinated collective bargaining, the delegates said, "offers an opportunity for some degree of equity with the economic leverage exercised by big companies, some of which are getting bigger." The resolution directed the union to continue seeking new mechanisms through which affiliates can coordinate collective bargaining goals.

Unity Sought

"All affiliates should review their own procedures for the purpose of achieving maximum unity with each other in dealing with multiplant corporations," the resolution stated.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany spoke to the convention on labor's efforts on behalf of jobs, health, equal opportunity and wide-ranging social legislation.

"We are delighted when people refer to us as the poor people's lobby," he said, "because that is exactly what we are."

Labor is going to help the nation move forward, Meany pointed out by pressing its efforts "to make a better America" at every legislative level: the community, the state legislatures and in Congress.

The Glass & Ceramic Workers' resolution endorsing Vice Pres. Humphrey said that in 16 years in the Senate "Hubert Humphrey didn't cast one wrong vote on official AFL-CIO COPE voting records. His over-all mark: 60 right votes; no wrong votes."

AFTE Adopts Plan to Widen Union's Scope

Philadelphia — Expanding the union role of the Technical Engineers to recruit professionals and the widening of organizing objectives were pressed further by delegates meeting here for the 38th AFTE convention.

A series of resolutions were adopted to strenghten the position of federal employes and to set up pay standards for professional groups.

Delegates also voted to reinforce organizing procedures for AFTE field representatives and organizers by giving them greater latitude to move into new areas in the engineering industry.

The convention had earlier defeated a move toward a merger with other white collar unions and favored instead the expansion of its own union role.

William L. Kircher, director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Organization, stressed the importance of organizing professionals.

Despite adversities, Kircher said, "I think that engineers—both the professional and technical categories—are going to organize."

Engineers, he note, will organize along the same lines as other unions—by using the power of collective bargaining to bring about economic progress for members.

It is the responsibility of professional unions and other labor organizations to keep pace with changing times and to make the functions of unions more meaningful to its members, Kircher added.

An amendment to the AFTE constitution was passed by delegates calling for a ban on all forms of discrimination for membership in the union.

The convention also took action to support one of its smallest units—five technicians on strike against St. Francis Hospital in New Castle, Pa., for seven months in an effort to gain union recognition.

The convention re-elected Pres. James Woodside and Sec.-Treas. John H. Dunne.

Meany Details Labor's Program to GOP

Calls for Platform Committed To Attack on Nation's Problems

platforms of both parties "will concentrate on practical solutions to the grave problems that now confront the nation and the world."

He acknowledged that much of the AFL-CIO's presentation was critical, "in the sense that it calls for broader and more vigorous government action in many areas." But, he continued, "let no one infer from this that we are blind to the progress America has made, or that we have lost confidence in the future."

The basic point, he suggested, is that while America "has been good" to most of its people, some have been left behind "for reasons not of their own making."

"What we are saying in essence, is that this great country can do better than it has done until now to make those honored words, 'life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness' have meaning not just for most Americans, but for all Americans."

Touching on international affairs, he observed that the war in Viet Nam is in the forefront of the nation's concern.

Viet Policy 'Consistent'

"The position of the AFL-CIO has been consistent from the first," he asserted. "We support the American effort to defend the freedom of the South Vietnamese people to run their country as they choose, without outside interference by force. And our membership, according to every poll we have taken backs this position overwhelmingly."

The objective of the United States in Viet Nam and around the globe, he continued, "is an atmosphere of stability and peace, so that this country can effectively use its wealth and know-how to help raise the standard of life for the less fortunate. But the basic prerequisites are stability and peace. That is the crux of the problem."

The situation in the Middle East is potentially just as dangerous as Viet Nam, the AFL-CIO president noted. "We firmly believe that Israel—the one bastion of democracy in that part of the world—must be preserved," Meany declared.

Turning to the "pressing domestic problems that directly involve us all," Meany noted that it took a summer of rioting and civil disorder touching 164 cities to compel "a reluctant nation to recognize what is generally known as the urban crisis."

He recalled that this recognition came much earlier to organized labor, and cited the program set forth by the 1965 AFL-CIO convention, a large part of which was included in the detailed presentation to the platform subscommittee.

The program for a million public service jobs—not "leaf-raking" but "useful jobs on useful projects for the hard-core unemployed"—is just one of labor's proposals from 1965 that still awaits action in 1968, Meany observed.

"We do not say this in a spirit of recrimination," he went on. "For a long time we, too, assumed that social reform and swift economic progress would have more or less uniform effects across the board, with the greatest proportionate benefits at the neediest levels.

"We were among the first to acknowledge that the assumption was wrong—that things didn't happen that way. The educated, the skilled and the well-situated, nearly all of whom are white, achieved a measure of affluence and opportunity unequalled in the history of the world. The uneducated, the unskilled and the poorly-situated, many of whom are non-white, were left behind. The gap between them and the majority widened.

"The bright promise of the war on poverty, of vastly strengthened public education, of equal rights and equal opportunity backed by law faded in the cold light of reality. Making matters worse was the refusal of Congress to enact or adequately fund those programs especially vital to the disadvantaged—jobs for the hard-core unemployed, decent housing to replace slums, Head Start and catch-up schooling for the culturally deprived, effective distribution of surplus foods, humane social welfare services.

"So a point has been reached at which the American system is working better than ever for the majority and is working very poorly, or not at all, for the minority. That is the essence of the crisis, clear enough for anyone to see. And just as clear, to us, is the solution—making the American system work just as well for the minority as for everyone else."

Questions on Cost

The 16 members of the platform subcommittee, following Meany's formal presentation, focused many of their questions on the cost of meeting the proposal for a million public service jobs and the remainder of labor's program to attack the problems of the cities.

Meany, in his responses, stressed the view set forth in his statement that the cost of the program actually represents "an investment in the future of America."

"This is a question which we in the AFL-CIO have been hearing for many years." He said, "We have responded, time after time, in economic terms citing the practical, dollars-and-cents benefits that flow to both business and government from measures that help the disadvantaged and promote the general welfare—from measures that are truly investments in this nation."

"Everything that is done to help the disadvantaged, to improve the general standard of life, to enrich the American environment pays for itself in the end. That is why we have an $800 billion economy today. We cannot abandon this concept of investing in America's future; we must, indeed, expand it."

In the field of basic labor legislation Meany charged that many of the Taft-Hartley and Landrum-Griffin amendments to the National Labor Relations Act "contravene" the very public policy that Congress spelled out when it enacted the law in 1935—that workers should be encouraged to organize into unions of their own choosing and to engage in collective bargaining.

His detailed statement set forth labor's position favoring repeal of Section 14(b) of the act which permits states to outlaw union shop agreements, the granting of on-site picketing rights to construction unions, stronger remedies including mandatory injunctions against employer unfair practices, broadening of the act to protect farm workers and others not presently covered, speedier NLRB procedures, and modification of employer "free speech" provisions to ban coercive or race-baiting, anti-union propaganda.

"We say it is self-evident that free collective bargaining has served the nation well," Meany declared. "But the freedom to bargain—even the right to bargain—is circumscribed or frustrated by the law designed to assure it. The issue is not the power of unions but the rights of workers."

Nixon, Rockefeller Claims Conflict

acknowledging that a number of delegates were tied to favorite-son commitments at least until the second ballot.

The Nixon optimism was bolstered, however, by the results of the latest Gallup Poll. It showed Nixon with a narrow lead over his principal Democratic opponent, Vice Pres. Hubert H. Humphrey, and with a margin of five percentage points over Sen. Eugene J. McCarthy, whereas New York Gov. Nelson Rockefeller was tied with Humphrey and led McCarthy by only one point.

The dismay of the Rockefeller forces over the Gallup poll results quickly turned to elation with the release later in the week of the Harris survey with diametrically opposite findings.

The Harris poll showed the New York governor with a six-point lead over either of the principal Democrats, while Nixon trailed Humphrey by five points and McCarthy by eight.

Rockefeller also had his own poll results, a private survey conducted by the Crossley Organization. They indicated he would carry all nine of the industrial states listed by Republican National Chairman Ray C. Bliss as vital to a GOP victory in November, whereas Nixon would carry only five. The states are California, Illinois, Maryland, Massachusetts, Michigan, New Jersey, New York, Ohio and Pennsylvania. Together they account for 226 electoral college votes, just 44 shy of the 270 needed for election.

The states the Crossley poll showed Nixon would carry are California, Illinois, New Jersey, New York and Ohio.

Standing by as Nixon and Rockefeller contested for the nomination—and not quite on the sidelines—was California Gov. Ronald Reagan. While not a declared candidate, Reagan so far has retained an independent stance, controlling California's 86 delegate votes as a favorite son, plus a number of additional votes. Should Nixon and Rockefeller deadlock through several convention ballots, Reagan would be available.

On the Democratic side, meanwhile, campaign aides of Hubert H. Humphrey reported that the vice persident had added 110 votes to his delegate strength as the result of party conventions in Kentucky, Virginia and Utah. This was enough, they suggested, to "fortify" the likelihood of a first-ballot victory for Humphrey at the Democratic convention scheduled to open in Chicago, Aug. 26.

Humphrey also came out against the unit rule, which in certain states binds all delegates to a vote for the candidate favored by the majority of the delegation. The vice president, declaring his belief in an "open convention," said he was willing to abide by the results of the convention "with each delegate being free to vote his preference."

In another Democratic development, Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (Mass.) declared himself unequivocally out of consideration for the party's nomination for vice president. Calling his decision "purely personal" in the aftermath of the assassination of his brother, Sen. Robert F. Kennedy, the last of the four Kennedy sons said that running for vice president "for me, this year, is impossible."

The Rockefeller-Nixon contest for the Republican nomination presented the classic "liberal vs. conservative" competition that has divided the GOP in previous conventions. Yet, there was none of the bitterness and animosity that marked the 1964 convention when the Goldwater forces exercised an iron-handed rule over the platform and the nominating procedures.

This time, the convention format, guided by party chairman Bliss, has something for everyone. Sen. Everett M. Dirksen, who has yet to announce his choice for the presidential nomination, heads the resolutions or platform committee.

He has made it plain that he wants a platform that has room for any candidate to run on and aggravates neither of the two party wings.

The permanent chairman of the convention is Rep. Gerald R. Ford (Mich.), the House minority leader who also represents the conservative view within the party. On the liberal or moderate side, the convention will have Gov. Daniel J. Evans (Wash.) as keynoter, and Sen. Edward W. Brooke (Mass.) as temporary chairman.

Early in the platform committee's deliberations it became evident that the war in Viet Nam and the troubles besetting the nation's cities would be the basis for key planks.

Rockefeller supporters, notably Gov. Raymond Shafer (Pa.), urged the platform committee to take a position more in keeping with the New York governor's proposals for de-escalation of military action.

Presentations also were made in specialized areas by other labor groups.

Pres. John F. Griner of the Government Employes and John A. McCart, director of the AFL-CIO Government Employes Council, called for a federal law to give full force to the executive order granting government workers the right to organize and be represented by unions.

RLEA Statement

Edward J. Hickey, general counsel for the Railway Labor Executives Association, gave the RLEA's backing to a proposal by the Association of American Railroads for a platform plank to give the railroads equal treatment under tax and other laws with competing forms of transportation.

Both the AFL-CIO Maritime Trades Dept., represented by Administrator William Moody, Jr., and the AFL-CIO Maritime Committee, represented by Executive Dir. Hoyt S. Haddock, called for federal policies to restore U.S. shipbuilding and the American merchant marines' cargo carrying role in world shipping.

ITF Asks Release Of Israeli Jetliner

Weisbaden, Germany—The Algerian goverment has been asked by the Intl. Transport Workers Federation to "promptly" release the crew, passengers and plane of an Israeli airline hijacked over the Mediterranean.

A resolution adopted unanimously by delegates to the ITF Congress here warned that "otherwise" ITF members will be instructed not to land in any country "which shall tolerate such piracy," and not to furnish its airlines with any ground services.

The resolution, adopted by the AFL-CIO and sponsored by U.S. unions, condemned the growing frequency of aircraft hijackings as "gross violations" of international law and "intolerable" threats to air safety.

In Letter to Urban League:

Meany Opposes Separatism, Reaffirms Equal Rights Goal

New Orleans—Labor is opposed to separatism in American society, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany told the National Urban League as it opened its national conference here.

"We are dedicated to the achievement of a society which is built upon the firm bedrock of equality of opportunity," Meany said in a letter to Whitney M. Young, Jr., executive director of the league.

"We are opposed to separatism of any kind, to segregation in any disguise, to discrimination against anyone, white or black, Christian or Jew, rich or poor," Meany attested.

The majority of Negroes surveyed by the National Advisory Commission on Civil Disorders still desire integration and conciliation with whites, although a substantial minority seems to have lost faith in the American system and prefers the establishment of a separate "black state," a new study disclosed.

The aims of labor and the league are the same—"the common pursuit of dignity for all mankind," Meany said.

"Never in its 56-year history has the National Urban League met at a time when the nation more deeply needed its knowledge, its will and its historic common sense than it does today."

He cited the cooperation between labor and the league in striving for common achievements.

"We have managed to break down each successive legal and emotional barrier but we are still short of our common goals and we still face dangerous adversaries."

He pointed to bitter poverty, needless unemployment and inadequate schools. These are things "that fail to prepare our children for the challenges of manhood," Meany asserted.

"Rotting housing, infested by vermin and inviting disease; yes, even crippling malnutrition in a bountiful land—these too are enemies.

"The fact that the majority of Americans now recognize and are horrified by these conditions is in itself a mark of the success of the National Urban League and its friends."

But making the country aware of the extent of the problems is not enough, Meany asserted. "Working together, we must make America determined to eradicate the conditions that have created the urban crisis."

Meany, however, warned of opposition from reactionaries who fight any changes—no matter how worthy.

"They will be aided by those who can only see the cost of a project, not its value; those who fail to understand that what we propose is an investment in America—an investment that will be more than amply repaid, both in dollars-and-cents and in the well-being of America's citizens.

"Perhaps the toughest opposition of all comes from those who would abandon the democratic, law-abiding search for justice in favor of the tools of tyranny—riots, fire, looting," he said.

These forces, he warned, "would substitute anarchy and its inevitable hand-maiden, dictatorship, and thus sacrifice the most important asset of an American—his personal freedom."

Young, in his keynote address at the conference, said the League specifically rejects violence because too many people believe they can shout, sing or shoot their way into power and the result is only that black people are being killed and black communities destroyed.

On separatism, he said:

"When the Urban League builds into the ghettos of America the community and economic institutions needed to bring about change, it helps prepare the way for the realization of a truly open society, for real integration can only take place among equals."

Young explained that the League is now stressing a plan to strengthen political and economic institutions and develop community pride and solidarity in black communities.

He called on members of the black middle class to aid their brothers in the slums, but "we are not calling for separatism."

Meany continued his letter by citing the cooperation between labor and the Urban League in recruiting, training and placing in skilled jobs scores of disadvantaged youths.

The League's program, called LEAP—the Labor Education Advancement Program—has provided a strong link in labor's determined drive to break through the racial barriers that have existed in some skilled trades "far too long," Meany said.

"While the AFL-CIO is encouraged with the results, we are not satisfied. More must be done and we are determined to do it."

He also pointed to other programs working with the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. which are aiding minority group youths in 35 major cities.

"The results are gratifying; the program is expanding and this venture in cooperation is setting a valuable example for the manpower programs, both public and private," he said.

'. . . And Away We Go'

Wider 'Open Door' Plan Urged for Apprentices

Birmingham, Ala.—Pres. Peter T. Schoemann of the Plumbers called on labor, management and government to widen their "open door" policy on the hiring of apprentices by actively recruiting Negroes and other minority group members.

Affirmative action, and not a mere "open door" policy or "color blind" equality is "certainly the policy of the AFL-CIO," Schoemann told 1,800 delegates from 10 states at the 20th Southern States Apprenticeship Conference here. It is also, he said. the policy of the federation's Building & Construction Trades Dept. as spelled out in two recent actions.

Schoemann is an AFL-CIO vice president and a member of its Executive Council.

Another conference speaker, Under Sec. of Labor James J. Reynolds, declared the apprenticeship system "must be maintained and expanded if the United States is to remain" a major industrial power.

"We need apprenticeship," Reynolds said, "to provide the step-by-step skills that produce a journeyman with the versatility to perform any type of work required on the job.

"We do not need a dilution of skills to make apprenticeship 'easy' or 'painless' for the ill-qualified, or those who lack the motivation or perseverance to see the apprenticeship through" to the finish, Reynolds asserted.

Schoemann reminded the conference that the AFL-CIO and its building trades unions have cooperated in setting up 33 separate programs to recruit and tutor minority applicants for apprenticeship "with more to come." The programs, he said, are not confined to any one area, and 10 are in Southern Conference territory.

Schoemann called on those who support apprenticeship programs to launch an active recruiting drive among minority group members for apprentice training programs "and sometimes even special tutoring or coaching programs."

Good apprentice training, he said, is "not the product of a clever deal or bargain between a group of selfish employers and a local union of selfish journeymen" but "the product of the hard work and dedicated efforts of labor, management and the Labor Dept.'s Bureau of Apprenticeship & Training.

He called for a "change in basic attitudes"—a significant change on the part of a large number of people.

"We are living," Schoemann said, "in an historic period when attitudes are changing all about us. Why not some changes regarding apprenticeship?"

Citing as an example the "restrictive admission policies we find in some places," Schoemann declared "my view is that human nature will always be human nature, but our apprenticeship customs and institutions ought to be founded on what is best in human nature, rather than what is worst."

Calling for a "spirit of self-criticism," the union head said apprenticeship needs more social conscience, more affirmative action, more sanity and common sense in its selection procedures, and needs to be financially self-sustaining.

Dir. Donald Slaiman of the AFL-CIO Civil Rights Dept. noted that unfair criticism of organized labor—especially in construction trades—in the field of civil rights could be stilled by implementing recommendations of the BCTD.

He said these recommendations go beyond non-discrimination by informing the public on apprenticeship training, largely in minority group communities, and to cooperate with local efforts to recruit and prepare minority group youths to qualify for apprentice openings.

Senate OKs Strong Poultry Bill, Curbs Mar Food Stamp Measure

culture Committee by Sen. Spessard L. Holland (D-Fla.) that would have permitted poultry and meat approved under state plans to be shipped in interstate commerce.

The 52 to 19 vote rejecting the Holland amendment came after Sen. Joseph M. Montoya warned that it would bring "adulterated intrastate meat and poultry flowing to every dinner table in the nation."

Montoya also led a successful drive for changes in the bill to broaden its provision for condemnation of unfit poultry and require that small plants must meet certain standards to be exempt from the legislation's full coverage The bill now goes to a conference committee.

The House, by a 227 to 172 vote, approved a proposal by Rep. Leonor K. Sullivan (D-Mo.) to extend the food stamp plan through fiscal 1972 with an "open end" authorization for the four years.

The Sullivan bill was a substitute for House Agriculture Committee legislation which provided only a one-year food stamp program, for fiscal 1969, with an authorization of $245 million, only $20 million above last year.

But the House also tacked on to the Sullivan substitute, by a 150-134 teller (non-record) vote, a ban on food stamps for strikers and college students. The move, by Rep. Charles M. Teague (R-Calif.), was made over Mrs. Sullivan's protests.

The AFL-CIO has stressed that the test for eligibility for food stamps is that recipients must be certified "needy" by local welfare agencies—that stamps should not arbitrarily be denied workers who exercise their "lawful right" to strike.

The House food stamp bill now goes to a conference committee. The Senate previously passed the single year $245 million authorization without the imposed ban on stamps to strikers and students.

In other developments:

- The House passed a $5 billion two-year program of federal aid to higher education that went to conference with a Senate measure calling for $13 billion over four years.
- The Senate passed a $1.95 billion foreign aid authorization bill and sent it to conference with a $1.99 billion House measure for a working out of differences. It means that in fiscal 1969, for the first time in 20 years, the U.S. foreign aid program will be less than $2 billion. Johnson had asked for a $2.9 billion appropriation.
- The House and Senate passed a temporary 1 percent hike in the interest ceiling (from 6 to 7 percent) on government guaranteed loans for college students. Full extension of the program, which ran out June 30, is included in the higher education bill.
- The Senate Appropriations Committee voted out $18.4 billion in funds for the Labor Dept., Health, Education & Welfare Dept., and related agencies. It restored cuts the House had made in labor-sought funds for the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service, the Wage & Hour Division and special education programs for poor children.
- The Senate approved legislation exempting some 750,000 postal workers' jobs from a previous congressional mandate for reductions in federal employment. House approval of the exemption appeared imminent and certain at AFL-CIO News presstime.

Trades Set on 5 New Apprentice Projects

Five new projects to help 140 members of minorities pass apprenticeship tests in the building trades through "cram" courses have been approved in agreements with AFL-CIO building trades councils and social action agencies, the Labor Dept. announced.

Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz said pacts have been signed in Pueblo and Colorado Springs, Col.; Miami, Fla.; Trenton, N.J., and Philadelphia, with $203,000 earmarked for administration costs.

Training programs now total 37.

Nixon-Agnew Ticket Seeks 'Moderate' Image for GOP

COAST-TO-COAST, Vice Pres. Humphrey receives a warm welcome from labor in his campaign for the presidency. At left, he is greeted in San Francisco by State AFL-CIO Pres. Albin J. Gruhn and Exec. Sec.-Treas. Thomas L. Pitts, who heads the California Labor for Humphrey organization. At right, in New York, Humphrey is welcomed by Pres. Louis Stulberg of the Ladies' Garment Workers. Stulberg is chairman of the newly-formed New York State United Labor for Humphrey Committee, which includes Transport Workers Pres. Matthew Guinan as secretary-treasurer and top officials of international unions, locals and central labor councils as founding members.

Unity Theme Sets Candidate Choice

By John M. Barry

Miami Beach—A vigorous drive to recapture the White House was launched by the Republican Party here as it pulled itself together behind former Vice Pres. Richard M. Nixon, its candidate for President.

The man who nominated Nixon, Maryland Gov. Spiro T. Agnew, was picked by the candidate to be his vice presidential running mate. The choice bypassed a number of more prominent Republicans who might have added greater strength to the ticket in large city areas. But a key factor clearly was Agnew's "moderate" image and his acceptability to all factions and regions of the GOP.

Nixon had told southern delegations, for example, that he would not offend them in selecting a vice presidential candidate.

The votes of these southern delegates coupled with those from the "Nixon country" of the Midwest, provided the solid base on which the former vice president built his first ballot victory. He had little strength in the populous industrial states winning a majority of delegate votes in only two of the top seven—Illinois and Texas.

Nixon was chosen as the GOP nominee on the first convention ballot, overwhelming the challenges of New York Gov. Nelson A. Rockefeller and California Gov. Ronald Reagan. With 667 delegate votes needed for the nomination, Nixon received 692 against 277 for Rockefeller and 182 for Reagan before any changes in delegation votes.

Despite the spirited contest for delegates' votes among the three leading contenders, the convention had at least a semblance of harmony. It was free of the deep ideological bitterness that sundered the GOP and brought on the Goldwater debacle of 1964.

The contenders represented the three wings of the GOP—its lib-

Congress Leaves Big Workload

By Duane Emme

Congress closed shop for a month of political conventions, campaigning and vacationing—but was pointedly reminded by the White House that a heavy backlog of unfinished business awaits its return after Labor Day.

In a final burst of action before the recess, Congress sent to the President two major labor-supported bills—on poultry inspection and gas pipeline safety regulation.

But Presidential Assistant Joseph Califano told newsmen that there are some 40 other important bills Pres. Johnson expects Congress to pass this year.

The list included such major items as vocational education; aid to higher education; gun control legislation; extension of the food stamp program; consumer, conservation and recreation bills; an occupational health and safety measure; assistance for child care centers, and foreign aid authorization.

Califano said Johnson also ex-

Labor Proposals Ignored:

Broad, General GOP Platform Designed to Muffle Party Rifts

Miami Beach—The Republican Party sought to establish a tone of moderation as its national convention adopted a platform deliberately broad enough to allow room for party members of every stripe.

But the GOP platform had little to offer the trade union movement. Its section on labor ignored the specific recommendations by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany to safeguard the right of workers to organize. Instead, it leveled an oblique attack on the National Labor Relations Board. It went on also to condemn "government-coerced strike settlements" that "accelerate inflation" and called for new measures to crack down on "crippling work stoppages."

The platform, put together following four days of hearings by a 102-member committee headed by Sen. Everett M. Dirksen (Ill.) provoked only one reservation from the floor.

Mich. Gov. George Romney drew a standing ovation when he delivered a sharp attack on union wage settlements, charging that the platform did not go far enough in condemning what he called "abuses of raw economic power."

But Romney did not offer an amendment and, in fact, endorsed the overall platform enthusiastically.

The 1,333 delegates then shouted their approval just as Dirksen had planned.

This was in sharp contrast to the case in 1964. The convention that year—controlled heavily by the forces of the party's eventual presidential nominee, Barry Goldwater—rammed through a platform tailored to Goldwater's conservative record. The action four years ago climaxed a stormy three-hour session in which the outnumbered party moderates were roared down as they offered amendments aimed at condemning right-wing extremism and establishing a detailed civil rights plank.

The tone that marked adoption of the 1968 platform was in line with the attempt to smother all internal differences that prevailed throughout the convention. The document is about three times as long as the 3,500 words Dirksen had said he would strive for. It sets forth Republican programs for the nation in areas ranging from Viet Nam and national defense to the urban crisis and the national debt. But they are couched in terms so general as to allow a liberal to expand on them in one direction, a conservative in another.

The platform contains nothing like the detailed proposals urged by Meany to solve the massive problems facing the nation in such areas as poverty and jobs, tax reform, education, civil rights and urban decay.

For all its generality, the traditional GOP slogans show through as the platform attacks "an endless expansion of federal programs" and calls for greater reliance on private enterprise, spurred by tax incentives to solve such problems as manpower training and air pollution.

Another thread of GOP unity runs through the platform in its harsh, at times savage, criticism of the Johnson Administration. This is particularly evident in the section on Viet Nam.

The Viet Nam section is a major plank and was the subject of extended debate within the resolutions committee. The final language was worked out behind the scenes by supporters of both Gov. Nelson Rockefeller

Romney Raps 'Union Power,' Pay Increases

Miami Beach—Michigan Gov. George Romney, in a vehemently anti-union speech to the Republican National Convention, bitterly attacked what he called "excessive collective bargaining power in the hands of excessively powerful union and employer groups."

Speaking as the convention was about to adopt its 1968 platform, Romney said he supported the platform enthusiastically and would

Humphrey Endorses Union's Grape Boycott

Vice Pres. Hubert H. Humphrey gave a strong personal endorsement to the boycott of California grapes launched by striking farm workers and supported by the nation's labor movement.

He also pledged "to redouble my efforts" to get Congress to pass legislation extending collective bargaining rights under the National Labor Relations Act to agricultural workers.

"To exclude them from any protective legislation just does not make sense," Humphrey said in a letter to Cesar Chavez, director of the AFL-CIO United Farm Workers Organizing Committee.

Humphrey met with Chavez and other leaders of the farm workers in California and he spelled out his support of their objectives in a letter which termed the farm workers' effort to bring employers to the bargaining table "national problems" which "deserve national attention."

The Vice President noted that he has repeatedly spoken out on behalf of the right of farm workers and he invited Chavez to use his endorsement of the boycott or any other portion of the letter "in any way you feel will best serve 'La Causa'"—the "cause"

ARGENTINE LABOR LEADER Juan Jose Taccone is congratulated by Covey T. Oliver, right, U.S. Assistant Sec. of State for Inter-American Affairs, at the dedication of the first group of apartment buildings is a $13 million housing project in Buenos Aires, Argentina. Financing of the project, sponsored by four Argentine trade unions, was arranged through the AFL-CIO and AIFLD.

Argentina Labor Hails AIFLD Housing Assist

Buenos Aires—One of Argentina's most prominent trade union leaders has praised the AFL-CIO's role in housing programs for Latin America workers as a great contribution to the solidarity between organized labor in North and South America.

Juan Jose Taccone, secretary general of the big Buenos Aires local of the Light & Power Workers union, lauded the AFL-CIO and the American Institute for Free Development for making it possible for Argentine workers to acquire their own modern homes.

He spoke during the dedication in Buenos Aires of the first group of two and three-bedroom apartments in the $13 million housing program sponsored by AIFLD for four trade unions representing light and power, municipal, railroad and communication and postal workers in Argentina.

Under the program, AIFLD helped the unions obtain the 6.5%, 25-year loan from two U.S. insurance companies—Connecticut General and Connecticut Mutual—to construct homes for 1,667 families of union members during the next two years. The loan is guaranteed by the Agency for International Development (AID) under the Alliance for Progress, and the union families have each saved up 10% of the loan as the required down payment.

Because interest rates to workers in Latin America are so prohibitive, most families have little hope of ever buying their own homes. Through the AIFLD housing program with the AID guarantee, organized labor in those countries is being given the oportunity, for the first time, to acquire homes under a system similar to the FHA and GI-insured loan program in the United States.

Taccone said the first 561 apartments in Argentina under the AIFLD program were the result of the "union to union relationship that contributes to the solidarity that transcends the frontiers of countries."

AFL-CIO Represented

Among those from the U.S. trade union movement in attendance at the ceremony were: Andrew C. McLellan, AFL-CIO inter-American representative; William C. Doherty Jr., executive director of AIFLD; Robert Mayer, AFL-CIO counsel; Jesse Friedman, AIFLD regional director; Charles R. Wheeler Jr., AIFLD director for Argentina, and Gene Meakins, AIFLD education director for Argentina.

Doherty, addressing the group in Spanish, pointed out that AIFLD is dedicated to a constructive role in its relationship with the Latin American trade union movements.

"There are two types of people," he said, "those who love and build and those who hate and destroy. With this project we are inaugurating today we are certain that we are among the first group."

Another speaker, Covey T. Oliver, coordinator of the Alliance for Progress as U.S. Assistant Sec. of State for Inter-American Affairs, emphasized that the homes were not gifts—that the wage earners would pay back the loan over 25 years. Oliver noted that AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany had often pointed out that the concern of the millions of members of the U.S. labor movement for the dignity of the working man was not limited by the borders of the United States.

"This project," Oliver continued, "is an example of the action of the government, the people and the private institutions of my country in cooperation with the government, the people with the private institutions of Argentina."

Farm Workers Drive Backed By Humphrey

to which the farm worker leaders have dedicated their lives.

"I want to wish you success with your national boycott effort," Humphrey wrote Chavez. "As more people know that the boycott is almost your only effective organizing device, more and more will support it."

Humphrey also pledged assistance to the farm workers in efforts to prevent loopholes and lax enforcement in immigration laws from furnishing growers with a cheap—and often strikebreaking—alien labor force.

"This must be changed," Humphrey said, through tightened enforcement and, if necessary, changes in national administrative policy.

He agreed with the UFWOC position, Humphrey stressed, that "no reasonable degree of fairness in recognizing the rights of farm workers, on a comparable basis with other American workers, can occur without substantive change in enforcement of immigration procedures to accompany the extension of the NLRA to farm workers."

Baltimore Stops Buying Grapes from California

Baltimore—The city of Baltimore won't buy any more California grapes until growers agree to recognize the right of their striking farm workers to organize and bargain collectively.

Acting Mayor William D. Schaefer issued the "Don't Buy" directive to the city purchasing department.

Schaefer said he believes support for the striking grape pickers will "add emphasis to the farm workers' cause, for they have been subject to recurring injustices since the 1930s." He called also on institutional food buyers, along with the public at large, to stop buying non-union grapes from California.

The action, effective at once, adds Baltimore to the list of cities which have taken similar action. Others include New York and Detroit. All three cities customarily buy several tons of grapes a year for welfare institutions under their management.

Schaefer said in a statement that farm workers are "struggling against tremendous odds in attempting to organize in an area which has repeatedly frustrated their cause by anti-union licensing laws."

"I believe we can give them our greatest support by refusing to buy California grapes. If other cities and private citizens do likewise, they can bring moral and economic force to bear on the question until the workers' grievances are settled justly," he said.

The United Farm Workers Organizing Committee, AFL-CIO, has called on consumers everywhere to support a nationwide boycott against grapes grown by employers who for more than three years have frustrated the union rights of their organized employes.

UFWOC has gained bargaining rights and a standard union contract in 12 localities but has been unable to win any recognition from the Giumarra Co. and allied growers in California. The union struck in 1966 in the San Joaquin valley and later added growers in the Coachella valley when they began importing holders of green-card visas from across the border.

In May the AFL-CIO Executive Council called on every affiliated union and every officer and union member to join actively in the national boycott against struck California grape growers.

Since then, city and state labor councils and union leaders have organized "Don't Buy" campaigns in scores of localities. The union itself has sent farm workers families to tell the story of their fight in cities as widely separated as Norman, Okla., Toronto, Ont., Pittsburgh, Buffalo and Cleveland.

At Cleveland Convention:

ITU Officers Urge Training Time Cut

Cleveland—Proposals to reduce the Typographical Union's apprentice training period from six years to four, and to increase pension benefits for retirees were among 150 propositions submitted for delegate action as the ITU opened its 110th convention here.

Pres. John J. Pilch, presiding for the first time since his recent election as successor to the late Elmer Brown, reported that the union has kept pace with changes in the graphic arts industry but must strengthen the successful policies of the past to meet the challenge of new tools and techniques, new methods and managements now confronting printers and mailers.

The "insatiable craving" for more speed and more production, Pilch said in his keynote speech, "requires more attention on our part to the necessity of mastering the new skills necessary to protect our jobs and to open up new job opportunities."

"Four years or less should be ample time to become a journeyman," Pilch reported in noting that the union has approximately 600 fewer apprentices in training than in recent years.

The ITU Executive Council, in submitting several proposed changes in the apprentice laws to meet current conditions, recognizes that the proposed cut in the training period will "elicit some objection and much discussion," Pilch said, but "we must attract more young men and women into our industry."

Some candidates pass up ITU industry jobs "because the beginning apprenticeship wage just does not meet the need, and the six-year apprenticeship period appears to be an eternity," he said.

The delegates saw an ITU-produced film on the strike of 2,000 union members against Hearst's Los Angeles Herald-Examiner, and heard reports that the national AFL-CIO-launched fund for the strikers and their families has passed the $60,000 mark and still is growing.

Reports on merger talks were made at opening sessions by Pres. John Connolly of the Bookbinders, Executive Vice Pres. William J. Farson of the Newspaper Guild and Sec.-Treas. Frank G. Creamer of the Stereotypers.

Farson said "this is the era of the conglomerate" company. Unions in the newspaper industry, he observed, "can ill afford the luxury of continued, needless competition and wasteful duplication of effort. The good old ways, like the good old days, are not adequate to the challenge of tomorrow."

Farson reported that an area-wide boycott by Los Angeles labor has cost the Herald-Examiner at least 60 percent of its pre-strike circulation and cut its advertising linage to 68 percent of its 1967 level by May 31, 1968. He predicted "this is the kind of solidarity that will bring us final success" in winning new contracts from publisher George Hearst, Jr.

Pres. Johnson sent a message saying most Americans "enjoy the benefits of organized labor's ceaseless quest for justice." He added: "We must move on" in reshaping blighted cities, training productive workers and aiding those in need. He asked that both labor and management "help us maintain a healthy economy by exercising wage and price restraint."

Scheduled convention speakers include Pres. Anthony J. DeAndrade of the Printing Pressmen, Administrator Hugh C. Murphy of the Labor Dept. Bureau of Apprenticeship & Training, Dir. Ralph D. Wright of the Intl. Labor Office, Washington, D.C.; Miles P. Patrone of the American Newspaper Publishers Association and Pres. W. Wayne Hogan of the union employers section, Printing Industry of America.

ITU officers submitted reports showing that more than 2,000 contracts, the greatest number in history, are in effect in the U.S. and Canada. Wages and conditions have reached new peaks and union revenues exceed expenses by more than 6 percent, they told the convention.

The officers said the ITU's negotiated pension plan, authorized by the 1966 convention, covers more than 20,000 members with contributions of $1.2 million contributed by more than 600 employers.

Average earnings of 91,586 active members in 1968 were $8,585 a member or $151.67 a week, Sec.-Treas. William R. Cloud reported.

Kolberg Appointed Manpower Aide

Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz named William H. Kolberg, 42, as associate manpower administrator in charge of training research programs under the Manpower Development & Training Act.

A career employe of government, Kolberg will succeed Dr. Curtis C. Aller, returning in September to San Francisco State College as professor of economics.

Kolberg has been Labor Dept. deputy assistant secretary for administration. In his new post he will help provide guidelines to unions and others in manpower utilization, Wirtz said.

Unions Ratify Job Seniority Pact in South

Members of 52 local unions in the South have voted to ratify a contract amendment insuring equality in job seniority for Negro employes of the Intl. Paper Co., the Labor Dept. announced.

The changes were approved by better than a 2-1 vote of union members at 10 primary pulp and paper mills of the firm's Southern Kraft Division in six states. The unions are affiliated with the Papermakers & Paperworkers, the Pulp, Sulphite & Paper Mill Workers and the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers.

Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz said that, while changes in contract seniority have been achieved at other plants, "the overriding importance of this pact is that it was reached through the vital process of collective bargaining."

The amended agreements provide that plant transfer and advancement qualifications will be no higher for Negro employes than they were for whites hired at the same time, and that rates paid Negroes applying for promotion will generally be no lower than their current rates, regardless of the contract rate for the job into which they transfer.

The Southern Kraft mills involved are at Mobile, Ala., Camden and Pine Bluff, Ark., Panama City, Fla., Springhill and Bastrop, La. (three mills), Moss Point and Natchez, Miss., and Georgetown, S.C.

Campbell Soup Dispute:

Strikers Reassure Farmers on Crops

Union members on strike against the Campbell Soup Co., have assured farmers dependent on company purchases that they are willing to accept a common expiration date for union contracts that will not interfere with the harvesting of tomatoes.

Tomato growers in New Jersey, Pennsylvania and other states have said they face the loss of crops grown for the Campbell firm if the strike continues past the harvest season.

Three unions with 7,500 members have been out since late July at Campbell plants in Camden, N.J., Napoleon, O., Paris, Tex., and Sacramento, Calif., for a common contract expiration date and better wages and benefits.

Strike Expanded

Workers at a fifth plant, in Moorestown, N.J., joined the walkout July 29 and the Chestertown Md., poultry plant is scheduled to strike at the close of a vacation shutdown Aug. 12.

Meanwhile Gov. Richard J. Hughes (D-N.J.) invited the unions and management to meet with him at Trenton to discuss the issues involved in the dispute.

The letter to tomato growers is being distributed by the Meat Cutters, the Machinists and the Teamsters. The Meat Cutters and Machinists represent 3,400 Campbell employes at Camden; the Teamsters, 1,200 at Sacramento; the Meat Cutters alone, 2,900 at Napoleon, Paris and Chestertown; the Machinists alone, 80 at Moorestown.

The union letter pointed out that the strike is not intended to damage the growers but was voted as a last resort when all settlement efforts failed.

"We have told Campbell Soup that we are willing to be flexible about working out a common expiration date for our contracts outside of the harvest season," the unions said.

"So far, Campbell Soup still refuses to bargain with all of us together. It insists on dealing with us only one at a time," the statement reported. It concluded:

'Fair Settlement' Sought

"We are willing to do anything reasonable to reach a fair settlement. We want to go back to processing . . . foods. We hope the company will negotiate an honorable agreement with us for the sake of the farmers, the employes and the public."

Campbell Soup Co., biggest U.S. producer of canned soups, enters into exclusive contracts with growers for their entire tomato crop but pays only for those that meet company specifications, the unions said. It inspects growing crops, regulates the use of insecticides and sets the price in advance.

The unions joined last February to coordinate their negotiations after years of fragmented settlements imposed by divide-and-conquer tactics and take-it-or-leave-it proposals. The bargaining, and the strike, are being coordinated by the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept.

"This year and in the future," a department spokesman said, "the unions at Campbell Soup want real collective bargaining . . . fair wage levels and decent benefits. The company's divide-and-conquer policy must give way to good faith bargaining."

Sex Bias Banned In Help-Want Ads

"Help Wanted, Male" and "Help Wanted, Female" headings in classified advertising sections are the target of the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission's new guideline against sex discrimination.

The guideline goes into effect Dec. 1 to give newspapers enough time to reorganize want ad sections. A number of newspapers already publish classified ads in occupational categories rather than in the male and female files.

Placement of advertisements under the male and female files will violate the law after Dec. 1 unless sex is a bona fide occupational qualification, the commission said.

ANOTHER FIVE YEARS of service on the National Labor Relations Board starts for NLRB member Howard Jenkins, Jr., right, at ceremony in which Supreme Court Justice Thurgood Marshall, left, and NLRB Chairman Frank W. McCulloch participate. Jenkins, a Republican and former law school professor, was named to a new term by Pres. Johnson. He is the first Negro member of the five-man board, which enforces the labor relations act.

Nation's Jobless Rate Inches Down in July

By John R. Oravec

Unemployment eased a bit in July, the Labor Dept. reported.

Workers without jobs totaled 3.2 million, down 400,000 from the June level when unemployment spurted upward with nearly 3 million youths flooding the job pool as schools closed.

The July unemployment rate was 3.7 percent of the country's work force. This compares with 3.8 percent in June and 3.5 percent in April and May.

About 200,000 people in the 20-24 age bracket, who entered the labor force in June, secured jobs last month. The unemployment rate for these young adults returned to the April-May average of 5.5 percent.

But the job situation for teenagers showed no improvement in July. It remained at the 13.6 percent unemployment level after rising 1 percent from May to June.

According to the department's Bureau of Labor Statistics, the teenage labor force—the 16 to 19-year-olds—increased about 2.9 million between May and July, the same as 1967. Teenage employment rose 2.2 million this year, about 100,000 less than the year before.

Overall, seasonally-adjusted unemployment has increased 240,000 since April when the jobless total reached its lowest level in a decade.

The rise in unemployment in the last few months, the Labor Dept. said, has been concentrated among less-skilled workers in construction, agriculture and service industries.

Unemployment rates for nonfarm laborers rose from 6.5 percent in April and May to 7.5 percent in June and to 8.5 percent in July. The rate for service workers was at 4 and 4.5 percent in spring but has exceeded 5 percent for the last two months.

Unemployment for non-white workers declined to 6.9 percent in July from 7.2 percent a month earlier. It was 7.3 percent in July 1967. The non-white teenage rate was 24.3 percent last month. Unemployment for whites in each group remained about half the non-white rate.

Non-agricultural employment increased by 160,000 in July, seasonally adjusted, to a record high of 68.2 million. Approximately 30 percent of this gain was in the transportation equipment industry as model changeovers by automakers began later in July than usual.

Hours Steady

The factory workweek held at 40.9 hours in July after seasonal adjustment, the same level as in May and June. But for rank and file workers on private payrolls, the workweek averaged 38 hours, up by one-tenth hour from June.

And although hourly wages for the rank and file workers were unchanged, the slight gain in the workweek pushed average weekly earnings in July to $109.16, a rise of 57 cents from June.

Over the year, average weekly earnings rose $6.13 or 5.9 percent, the Labor Dept. said.

In July, the civilian labor force was 81 million, about 1.5 million more than in the year-ago month.

Ruth Flannery Dies; Labor Editor's Wife

Los Angeles—Ruth Flannery, wife of Harry W. Flannery, who served as an editor of the AFL News Reporter and later as AFL-CIO radio coordinator, died here.

Mrs. Flannery, 70, was buried in Holy Cross Cemetery here. She is also survived by a daughter, Patricia Yoder, and a grandson.

California Trades Score Reagan Role

Los Angeles—Representatives of California's 400,000 construction craftsmen voted an extra two cents per capita political contribution at their 44th state convention to make 1968 a profitable year at the polls for labor.

Nearly 500 delegates blamed regressive aspects of the Reagan state administration—including a 10 percent cutback in the state building program—for high unemployment and depression in the building industry.

Outgoing State Building Trades Council Pres. Bryan P. Deavers charged Reagan policies "tended to set a lack of confidence attitude on the part of the private sector."

The forthcoming elections highlighted convention discussions. Delegates voiced regret at the primary defeat of Republican Sen. Thomas H. Kuchel.

They voted full support for Alan Cranston, Democratic nominee for the U.S. Senate against Kuchel's conqueror, rightwinger Max Rafferty.

A major event was dedication of the C. J. Haggerty Auditorium at the Los Angeles Building Trades Council headquarters, honoring the founder of the local council, later head of the State AFL-CIO, and now president of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept.

10 Locals at Start

Haggerty launched the Los Angeles unit in 1933 with 10 locals. It now boasts 105 locals, representing employes of 14,000 contractors.

A council resolution by Sec. John Cinquemani and Pres. Clyde Ringwood hailed Haggerty's leadership in winning progressive labor legislation.

Haggerty told the state conclave a new policy statement by building trades unions points to "positive, affirmative programs" to bring minority youth into the industry. He said such gains were not given recognition by civil rights critics of labor.

Enactment of the model cities program by Congress to rebuild 70 urban slum areas gave impetus to the trade union program.

Haggerty said labor adopted its own policy July 16, after management refused to join, and set up special job categories and streamlined recruitment machinery for the unskilled.

He said 12,000 minority youths in 37 cities have been "sought out, interviewed, tutored and given every possible opportunity to enter one of our apprenticeship programs" in the new approach.

James Lee of Van Nuys, Calif. Painters Local 1595, longtime legislative representative of the state council, succeeded Deavers as president.

Presses Ready to Roll in Detroit As Longest News Shutdown Ends

Detroit—The city's two daily newspapers prepared to publish their first editions since Nov. 15, 1967, as the last of the striking and locked-out unions ratified a contract settlement.

A cheer went up at a meeting of the Detroit Mailers local when a nearly 5-1 "yes" vote was announced in favor of accepting a tentative agreement reached earlier with the Detroit News and Detroit Free Press.

Ratification paved the way for scheduled resumption of publication of the News on Aug. 9 and the Free Press on Aug. 10.

The strike-lockout resulted in the longest newspaper shutdown in U.S. history.

Settlement of the blackout was assured when the publishers and Mailers got their talks off the ground with four consecutive days of hard, realistic negotiations.

Since the strike began, the Mailers had voted to affiliate with the Typographical Union, and the local was writing its first contract as an ITU affiliate.

The settlement was jointly announced by Richard Brown, an ITU representative, and Roger Bordenkircher, executive secretary of the Detroit Newspaper Publishers' Association. Mailers' Local Pres. Ralph Smith also participated in talks.

The Mailers were the last of seven primary newspaper unions to come to terms with the publishers. The agreement in its dispute was reached Aug. 1, seven days after Guild Local 22 ratified a new contract.

The Teamsters signed a contract with the two publishers on June 18.

Other unions that have since settled are Typographical Local 18, Printing Pressmen's Local 13, Lithographers & Photoengravers Local 12, and Local 10 of the Paper & Plate Handlers (affiliated with the Pressmen).

The Mailers received the same basic money package as the other unions, $33 over the term of a 34.5 month contract. The newspapers also negotiated with other unions but these pacts follow patterns set in other industries.

The News was the only paper struck. The Free Press shut down voluntarily Nov. 17, 1967, under the terms of an agreement between the papers that a strike against one is a strike against both.

The employer spokesman said the final settlement proved that "collective bargaining is not dead" in the city's newspaper industry. Earlier, however, veteran mediator Nathan Feinsinger of the University of Wisconsin had charged that collective bargaining broke down on Detroit papers.

During the strike both newspapers called for non-union supervisory personnel to volunteer to learn to put out a strikebreaking newspaper. The News published several issues of such a paper but did not distribute them publicly.

Even as the strike-lockout ended, Edwin K. Wheeler, general manager of the News, told a reporter he had met with his non-striking employes and instructed them to prepare to publish without unions if there ever is another strike.

HEW Unit to Serve Spanish-Speaking

A new unit to serve as a clearinghouse for programs and services of concern to the nation's Spanish-speaking citizens has been established in the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare.

HEW Sec. Wilbur J. Cohen described the Office of Spanish Surnamed Americans as "another step in our campaign to insure equal opportunity for all of our people."

The office also will act as HEW liaison to the U.S. Inter-Agency Committee on Mexican - American Affairs, and the U.S.-Mexico Commission for Border Development & Friendship.

Profits and Inflation

A COMBINATION of economic cliches and mythology has long blacked out intelligent discussion of economic problems in this country. Copybook maxims that were dubious 100 years ago are trotted out to explain developments in our complex economy of today.

The labor economists have marshalled the facts and figures to disprove time and again the shopworn analysis that higher wages are responsible for inflation. To little avail.

Now comes an article in the Wall Street Journal which says forthrightly:

"Any attempt to fix the blame for today's inflation, however, shouldn't be limited simply to a consideration of labor costs. The blame, it can be argued, belongs in many places. A major culprit may be corporate profits."

The article goes on to make the case. In the past 20 years, it declares, there have been three distinct periods in which factory prices climbed substantially over a long period.

"In each instance labor costs per unit of factory output were declining when the price climb began and these costs continued to decline for a considerable period after the price rise was under way.

"In each case, corporate profits began to increase sharply well before the price climb started."

The article quotes the president of a major New York investment counseling service along these lines:

"Instead of labor costs pushing prices up, what we see instead is a sort of profit-push. Profits are already well on their way up before prices begin to rise, and prices are well on their way up before wages begin to rise faster than output."

TRACING THE POSTWAR HISTORY of profits, prices and wages, the Journal article comes to the present period and says:

"The third substantial upturn in factory prices began in 1965 and is still going on. Again, the record shows, profits began rising long before prices. And unit labor costs actually were declining slightly at the time the price rise got under way."

Raising the question of whether the country "must always face a Hobson's choice of flat profits or painful inflation," the article quotes Geoffrey H. Moore, director of research for the National Bureau of Economic Research:

"A rise in profits that relates to basic growth in the economy—for example, through a larger, more efficient labor force—would not seem to condemn us to any inflationary spiral. The trouble is the big profit increases usually reflect a good deal more than just basic economic growth."

There you have it. The insatiable drive for bigger and bigger profits has been a prime factor in the three sustained price rises in the postwar years. It is a prime factor in the current price spiral.

In the current jargon the Wall Street Journal is "telling it like it really is" and like it really is amounts to workers trying desperately to catch up with runaway prices triggered by a profits push that is neither economically or socially defensible and in fact undermines the national goal of price stability.

. . . And Still Counting

Millions Lack Schooling:

'Fair Chance' at Jobs, Training Seen Linked to Adult Education

The following is excerpted from "Basic Education—A Fair Chance for the Disadvantaged" by Walter G. Davis which appeared in the July 1968 issue of the AFL-CIO American Federationist.

OF ALL THE DISADVANTAGED groups in the nation who deserve "a fair chance," perhaps those who need it most are the illiterate. To be more precise, they are the functionally illiterate—those whose ability to read, write and to do simple arithmetic is below the level necessary to profit from training for a job or to function adequately in day-to-day living.

Using the standard of less than eight years of schooling, the U.S. Office of Education estimates there are about 24 million Americans who can be considered educationally disadvantaged.

Of this total, there are 16.3 million in the 18 to 64-year old group with less than an 8th grade education. This is the "target group" for adult basic education programs aimed at giving disadvantaged people "a fair chance."

The problem is an urgent one. The complexity of modern living and the rapid pace of change leave these people further and further behind.

In years past, there were many jobs which required very little in the way of educational qualifications. Mechanization and automation have wiped out most of the jobs in which physical labor was more important than learning.

And so those who are least equipped to compete for today's jobs and who are least able to solve their own problems are becoming more and more isolated.

This presents a great challenge to our society. Vice Pres. Hubert H. Humphrey, a long time advocate of the development of a social system which truly closes the gap between what exists and the ideal, forcefully points to the challenge.

Who are these most disadvantaged? A rough profile of the functionally illiterate may be drawn from the 406,000 persons enrolled in Adult Basic Education classes during the 1966-67 school year. The following characteristics were taken from a Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare survey of 94,000 people who turned in completed questionnaires:

- Some 56.6 percent were white; 35.3 percent Negro; 0.8 percent American Indian; 5.5 percent Mexican-American; and 11.1 percent Puerto Rican.
- Individual average incomes of students were 53.9 percent under $3,000 per year; 17.8 percent between $3,000 and $6,000; and 5.4 percent over $6,000.
- About 58.1 percent are presently married and 48.4 percent are either heads of families and wage earners or are the main wage earners of the family.
- Student family incomes ranged from 37.6 percent under $3,000 per year to 5.4 percent over $6,000.
- Some 54.4 percent of the students were employed, 42.6 percent of them fulltime and 11.8 percent parttime. A total of 39.9 percent was unemployed, 14 percent of whom were seeking employment while 25.9 percent were not.
- Only 29 percent were enrolled in the program to help them get a job or get a better job while 63 percent said they enrolled for general self-improvement.
- Of the younger enrollees, those between 18 and 24, 68.1 percent were white and 24.7 percent were Negro.

A SIGNIFICANT POINT disclosed by this target population is an expression of the need for general self-improvement. They want to belong.

Who are they? Many are the inhabitants of the ghetto who are now demanding a say in decisions on how their community is run. They want to participate in the development of programs designed to help them in the mainstream of American life.

They are the young adults who are dropping out of school. They are the adults who dropped out or were forced out of school during the depression years and whose basic skills proved more inadequate in a period of rapid change.

They also are the elderly who were in school during the early decades of this century when reading and writing were nice but not essential.

The requirements specified for employment in today's job market have become more rigorous. As men and women remain idle or work parttime at low wages, the waste of labor resources continues to adversely affect the nation's economy. But while the problem of illiteracy may represent a drag in economic terms, it is first and foremost a problem of helping individuals develop themselves.

Legacy of Vargas:

Government Controls of Labor Shackle Free Unions in Brazil

The following is excerpted from a report by Edward Kramer, vice president of the Intl. Ladies Garment Workers Union, who recently returned from a U.S. government-sponsored union-to-union mission to Brazil.

MUSSOLINI MAY BE DEAD, but the Fascist concept of the trade union as an integral part of the corporate state is very much alive in Brazil. Government control of unions, introduced by Pres. Getulio Vargas in 1937, is still the Brazilian law of the land. Subsequent modifications of the labor laws have resulted in ever greater governmental controls.

The great paradox is that Vargas is enshrined by the Brazilian labor movement as its legendary hero and founder. His portrait is displayed in a place of honor in nearly every union headquarters. He is spoken of with reverence as "the first man to do something for the workers." That he imitated Mussolini in the rigid control of workers and congratulated Hitler on the fall of France was politely acknowledged and treated as an unpleasant irrelevancy.

It is clear that the "father image" created by Vargas has been carefully nurtured by succeeding Brazilian administrations.

A union is prohibited from functioning until and unless it represents one-third of all the workers in an industry or occupation in any one geographic area and it has been legally recognized by the Ministry of Labor.

Jurisdictional integrity and labor unity are compulsory under Brazilian law. Only one union is permitted to operate in any industry or occupation in any one area.

When a trade union is recognized by the government, it not only represents its own members but all of the workers in its jurisdiction. From each worker (union and non-union) a tax equal to one day's wages is deducted by the employer and transmitted to the government-owned Bank of Brazil, which takes 6 percent off the top for administration expense. The bank then distributes the remainder: 60 percent to the local union; 15 percent to the state federation; 5 percent to the national confederation; and 20 percent to the Ministry of Labor.

The union is permitted to recruit members within its own jurisdiction who pay voluntary monthly dues in addition to the union tax.

THE ENTIRE GAMUT of labor-management relations is supervised by three-man Labor Courts. This ranges from individual grievances to so-called collective bargaining.

A literal reading of the laws might lead to the belief that this is a balanced tribunal with one neutral member appointed by the government, one by the union and one by the employers.

Actually this is a stacked deck. The government-appointed representative can intervene and reject any candidate elected by labor. The end result is a tribunal that by its very nature is a creature of the state with all of its members on the government payroll pending good behavior.

It would be more appropriate if this agency were known as the ministry over labor. Like a pyramid standing on its head, absolute and authoritarian control over the Brazilian workers is concentrated in the Minister of Labor.

In an interview with the current incumbent (a polished, sophisticated and urbane army colonel), he made it quite clear that he was the real head of the Brazilian labor movement. He asserted that free collective bargaining in Brazil was impossible because of "those pelegos".

Freely translated, a pelego is a union official who by law cannot receive a union salary greater than his wage as a worker; and has sold out his principles by simultaneously holding a second job that multiplies his normal income many times.

Were it not for the fact that the second jobs were invariably state or federal appointments, the concern of the labor minister would have been laudable and understandable.

With the right to strike banned and collective bargaining nullified by the control of the Labor Courts, the Brazilian unions have very little to offer the workers.

To attract applicants, some unions provide lawyers to represent workers before the Labor Courts and furnish some minimal medical and dental services that are duplicated by the government for non-union workers. This is not a sufficient inducement to join.

The union cannot even offer workers political leadership as they are banned by law from engaging in political activity.

While jurisdictional integrity is mandated, meaningful trade union solidarity is banned. It is illegal for one union with resources to financially assist a sister union in times of need.

Unless the Brazilian government voluntarily institutes democratic reforms in labor laws and wage controls, inevitably it must face the consequences of social upheaval.

COPE Memo Reports:

Senate's Abuse of High Court Plays Into Hands of Birchers

THE BIGGEST BENEFICIARY of the Senate hearings into Pres. Johnson's Supreme Court nominations is the John Birch Society, says Memo from COPE.

More than the personalities involved, that's the real story in the hearings: that the JBS 10-year campaign to discredit the Supreme Court has been elevated to respectability in the halls and hearing rooms of the Senate.

What the Birchers themselves have tried to carry off has been substantially advanced for them by Senators James Eastland and Strom Thurmond, the publication of the AFL-CIO Committee on Political Education declares.

True, Earl Warren hasn't been impeached. But, then, his impeachment never really was the target of the Birchers and their satellite extremist groups.

Warren, rather, was used as the focus of the Birch Society's attempt to discredit the entire court. This was made clear in the founding meeting of the Birch Society in December, 1958, when JBS chieftain Robert Welch told 12 businessmen assembled in Indianapolis the anti-Warren campaign would bare the court's "unchecked seizure of power at the expense of our legislative bodies."

So, the John Birch Society campaign has made it to the big time. When it was first unveiled 10 years ago, it seemed ludicrous. Today, it is painfully serious.

IT IS UNLIKELY, for example, that without the 10 years of steady attacks on the court, Thurmond would have played the role of a bully-ragging Grand Inquisitor to the first nominee for Chief Justice ever summoned to his own confirmation hearing. Thurmond could only know Justice Fortas would be obliged to decline answers to many of his questions. So he used the hearings as a forum, for a headline-grabbing attack on the court and a whole series of its decisions, many of them handed down long before Fortas came to the court.

Behind the whole business are Eastland's and Thurmond's objections to Warren court decisions on a wide range of racial and civil liberties issues. Few were raising hob with the Supreme Court before its 1954 school desegregation decision and subsequent civil rights rulings.

Few, for that matter, were ultra-critical of the court before the Birch Society got into the act in 1958. Ten years after it did, pillorying the court has become a great American game, and two of its chief practitioners are Eastland and Thurmond.

To be kept in mind through the present hassle is the fact the Warren court has been a bastion protecting civil rights and liberties. To swallow the phony charges that Supreme Court decisions are responsible for civil disorders or high crime rates is to be hooked by racists and rightists and to abandon the field to the Eastlands, Thurmonds and Birchers.

LIKE BANQUO'S GHOST, the oil shale issue will not rest. Latest "scandal" in what is going to happen to the immensely rich oil-soaked shale lands in Colorado and other western states is an article that has just appeared in Harper's magazine. It was written for Life and rejected by that magazine because—Life denies it—the big oil companies wouldn't have liked it.

It was written by Chris Welles, a former Life staffer, who did it for that magazine. When it was turned down, Welles sold it to Harper's and got fired by Life in return. It is called "Oil Shale: Hidden Scandal or Inflated Myth?" with a sub-head reading: "How A Strange Alliance of Giant Oil Companies and Conservationists Managed to Keep Incalculable National Treasure Buried in the Colorado Hills."

The Wall Street Journal, in a news report on the article, went a step further in its head which read: "Oil Industry Sabotages Oil Shale Development." It went into detail about the charges and denials and all the rest of the fuss about how the article came to be written and how Welles came to be fired.

What Welles pretty much concludes is that despite all the romanticism that surrounds oil shale as a national resource valued in the billions, "unquestionably the major barrier to shale development has been the oil industry's historic opposition."

Why this opposition?

The gist of the Welles article is that powerful oil companies are determined to get their hands on the oil shale and to hold back development of those lands until the time comes when they can develop them for their own interests without permitting them to challenge today's prices and profits in liquid petroleum.

The article further tells of speculation in oil shale lands; of land patented for $2.50 an acre and later sold for $2,000 an acre; of development projects that were stalled by the big oil companies and even of dark hints that a newspaper crusader was threatened with death after publication of almost 50 articles on "The Multi-Billion Dollar Grab of Oil Shale Lands."

The AFL-CIO itself and the Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers have repeatedly testified before congressional committees, pointing out that billions of dollars in potential values are involved and the tremendous danger that these lands will fall into the hands of monopoly interests.

In a real sense, however, the oil shale issue has been pretty well swept under the bed so far as the general public is concerned. No solid national policy has been laid down, a vacuum which is all to the advantage of the oil corporations, which can wait until a business-oriented, conservative Congress comes along and they can get the kind of legislation they want.

The AFL-CIO has asked both Republican and Democratic parties to take a strong stand in the public interest this year:

"An oil shale development policy is needed to establish an orderly, multiple use program on federal oil shale lands. Such a policy and program will develop an economically competitive extractive and processing technology dealing with oil shale and other intermixed minerals, conserve the environment, obtain enormous new supplies of low-cost petroleum products for American consumers, safeguard the resource against monopolization and use revenues from any leasing program to assist in financing needed federal public sector programs."

It is essential that the American people know down to the last comma what the stakes are for the public interest. The AFL-CIO proposal for development of a national policy in the public interest represents a crucial step in that direction.

LABOR CONTRIBUTIONS to aid victims of a tornado that struck Jonesboro, Ark., in June are presented by Arkansas AFL-CIO Pres. J. Bill Becker, center, and Pres. Dick R. Bridger of the Northeast Arkansas Central Trades Council to Mrs. Deane D. Wallace of the American Red Cross. These checks, totaling $2,158.40, came from members of 24 local unions in the state.

Highlights of '68 Republican Platform

On this page the AFL-CIO News reproduces excerpts of key portions of the platform adopted by the Republican National Convention in Miami Beach. The subject headings are those used by the AFL-CIO in its presentation to the GOP Platform Committee and do not appear in the platform.

Economic Issues and Jobs

● New Republican leadership can and will restore fiscal integrity and sound monetary policies, encourage sustained economic vitality and avoid such economic distortions as wage and price controls.

By responsibly applying federal expenditure controls to priority needs, we can in time live both within our means and up to our aspirations. Such funds as become available with the termination of the Viet Nam war and upon recovery from its impact on our national defense will be applied in a balanced way to critical domestic needs and to reduce the heavy tax burden.

The imperative need for tax reform and simplification will have our priority attention. We will also improve the management of the national debt, reduce its heavy interest burden, and seek amendments to the law to make reasonable price stability an explicit objective of government policy.

● The balance of payments crisis must be ended, and the international position of the dollar strengthened. We propose to do this by restraint in federal spending and realistic monetary policies, by adjusting overseas commitments, by stimulating exports, by encouraging more foreign travel to the United States and, as specific conditions require, by extending tax treatment to our own exports and imports comparable to such treatment applied by foreign countries. Ending inflation is the first step toward solving the payments crisis.

● The nation must look to an expanding free enterprise system to provide jobs. Republican policies and programs will encourage this expansion.

To qualify for jobs with permanance and promise, many disadvantaged citizens need special assistance and job training. We will enact the Republican-proposed Human Investment Act, offering tax credits to employers, to encourage such training and upgrading.

A complete overhaul of the nation's job programs is urgent. There are some 70 federally funded job training programs, with some cities having as many as 30 operating side by side. Some of these programs are ineffective and should be eliminated. We will simplify the federal effort and also encourage states and localities to establish single-headed manpower systems, to correlate all such federal activities and gear them to local conditions and needs. To help the unemployed find work we will also inaugurate a national job opportunity data bank to match the individuals with the jobs.

Civil Rights

● We pledge energetic, positive leadership to enforce statutory and constitutional protections to eliminate discrimination.

● This nation must not blink the harsh fact—or the special demands it places upon us—that the incidence of poverty is consistently greater among Negroes, Mexican-Americans, Indians and other minority groupings than in the population generally.

An essential element of economic betterment is the opportunity for self-determination—to develop or acquire and manage one's own business enterprise. This opportunity is bleak for most residents of impoverished areas. We favor efforts to enable residents of such areas to become owners and managers of businesses and, through such agencies as a domestic development bank, to exercise economic leadership in their communities.

Urban Crisis

● For today and tomorrow, there must be—and we pledge—a vigorous effort, nationwide, to transform the blighted areas of cities into centers of opportunity and progress, culture and talent. We pledge:

—Presidential leadership which will buttress state and local government;

—Vigorous federal support to innovate state programs, using new policy techniques such as urban development corporations, to help rebuild our cities;

—Concern for the unique problem of citizens long disadvantaged in our total society by race, color, national origin, creed, or sex;

—A greater involvement of vast private enterprise resources in the improvement of urban life, induced by tax and other incentives;

—New technological and administrative approaches through flexible federal programs enabling and encouraging communities to solve their own problems;

—A complete overhaul and restructuring of the competing and overlapping jumble of federal programs to enable state and local governments to focus on priority objectives.

● We will encourage priority attention by private enterprise and all levels of government to sound planning and the rapid development of improved mass transportation systems.

● We pledge vigorous and even-handed administration of justice and enforcement of the law. We must re-establish the principle that men are accountable for what they do, that criminals are responsible for their crimes, that while the youth's environment may help to explain the man's crime, it does not excuse that crime.

We call on public officials at the federal, state and local levels to enforce our laws with firmness and fairness. We recognize that respect for law and order flows naturally from a just society; while demanding protection of the public peace and safety, we pledge a relentless attack on economic and social injustice in every form.

Social and Public Needs

● We will vigorously implement the Republican-conceived home ownership program for lower income families and also the Republican-sponsored rent certificate program. Economic incentives will be developed to attract private industry and capital to the low-cost housing market.

Local communities will be encouraged to adopt uniform, modern building codes, research in cost-cutting technology through private enterprise will be accelerated, and innovative state and local programs will be supported. We will also stimulate the investment of "sweat equity" by home owners.

● We continue to favor tax credits for those burdened with the costs of higher education, and also tax deductions to encourage savings for this purpose.

● Greater vocational education in high school and post-high school years are required for a new technological and service-oriented economy. For youths unable to obtain such training, we propose an industry youth program, coupled with a flexible approach to minimum wage laws for young entry-level workers during training.

● We pledge a unified federal food distribution program, as well as active cooperation with the states and innovative private enterprise, to help provide the hungry poor sufficient food for a balanced diet.

● A new Republican administration will strive for fairness for all consumers, including additional information and protection programs as necessary, state and local consumer education, vigorous enforcement of the numerous protection laws already enacted, and active encouragement of the many consumer-protection initiatives and organizations of private enterprise.

Labor and Management

● Organized labor has contributed greatly to the economic strength of our country and the well-being of its members. The Republican Party vigorously endorses its key role in our national life.

We support an equitable minimum wage for American workers—one providing fair wages without unduly increasing unemployment among those on the lowest rung of the economic ladder—and will improve the Fair Labor Standards Act.

The 40-hour week adopted 30 years ago needs reexamination to determine whether or not a shorter workweek, without loss of wages, would produce more jobs, increase productivity and stabilize prices.

We strongly believe that the protection of individual liberty is the cornerstone of sound labor policy.

Today, basic rights of some workers, guaranteed by law, are inadequately guarded against abuse. We will assure these rights through vigorous enforcement of present laws, including the Taft-Hartley Act and the Landrum-Griffin Act, and the addition of new protections where needed. We will be vigilant to prevent any administrative agency entrusted with labor-law enforcement from defying the letter and spirit of these laws.

We will bar government-coerced strike settlements that cynically disregard the public interest and accelerate inflation. We will again reduce government intervention in labor-management disputes to a minimum, and prevent back-door intervention in the administration of labor laws.

Permanent, long-range solutions of the problems of national emergency disputes, public employe strikes and crippling work stoppages are imperative. We pledge an intensive effort to develop practical, acceptable solutions that conform fully to the public interest.

● We pledge to protect federal employes in the exercise of their right freely and without fear of penalty or reprisal to form, join or assist any employe organization or to refrain from any such activities.

Foreign Policy and Defense

● To resolve our Viet Nam dilemma, we pledge to adopt a strategy relevant to the real problems of the war, concentrating on the security of the population, on developing a greater sense of nationhood, and on strengthening the local forces. It will be a strategy permitting a progressive de-Americanization of the war, both military and civilian.

We will pursue a course that will enable and induce the South Vietnamese to assume increasing responsibility.

We pledge a program for peace in Viet Nam—neither peace at any price nor a camouflaged surrender of legitimate United States or allied interests—but a positive program that will offer a fair and equitable settlement to all, based on the principle of self-determination, our national interests and the cause of long-range world peace.

We will sincerely and vigorously pursue peace negotiations as long as they offer any reasonable prospect for a just peace. We pledge to develop a clear and purposeful negotiating position.

● The fact of a growing menace to Israel is undeniable. Her forces must be kept at a commensurate strength both for her protection and to help keep the peace of the area. The United States, therefore, will provide countervailing help to Israel, such as supersonic fighters, as necessary for these purposes.

● Our relations with Western Europe, so critical to our progress and security, have been needlessly and dangerously impaired. They must be restored, and NATO revitalized and strengthened. We continue to pursue the goal of a Germany reunified in freedom.

● A more selective use of our economic strength has become imperative. We believe foreign aid is a necessary ingredient in the betterment of less developd countries. Our aid, however, must be positioned realistically in our national priorities. Only those nations which urgently require America's help and clearly evince a desire to help themselves will receive such assistance as can be diverted from our own pressing needs.

● Only when Communist nations prove by actual deeds that they genuinely seek world peace and will live in harmony with the rest of the world, will we support expansion of East-West trade.

● For reasons of security, as well as economics, the decline or our merchant marine must be reversed. We therefore pledge a vigorous and realistic ship replacement program to meet the changing pattern of our foreign commerce.

● For greater equity we will further revise selective service policies and reduce the number of years during which a young man can be considered for the draft, thereby providing some certainty to those liable for military service. When military manpower needs can be appreciably reduced, we will place the selective service system on standby and substitute a voluntary force obtained through adequate pay and career incentives.

Social Security and Health

● We will strengthen the social security system and provide automatic cost of living adjustments under social security and the Railroad Retirement Act. An increase in earnings permitted to social security recipients without loss of benefits, provision for post-age 65 contributions to social security with deferment of benefits, and an increase in benefits to widows will also be provided. The age for universal social security coverage will be gradually reduced from 72 to 65 and the former 100 percent income tax deduction will be restored for medical and drug expenses for people over 65.

● Welfare and poverty program will be drastically revised to liberate the poor from the debilitating dependence which erodes self-respect and discourages family unity and responsibility. We will modify the rigid welfare requirements that stifle work motivation and support locally operated children's day-care centers to free the parents to accept work.

Government Administration

● We propose the sharing of federal revenues with state governments, we are particularly determined to revise the grant-in-aid system and substitute bloc grants wherever possible.

● We favor a new Election Reform Act that will apply clear, reasonable restraints to political spending and fund-raising, whether by business, labor or individuals, ensure timely publication of the financial facts in campaigns, and provide a tax deduction for small contributions.

● We pledge enactment of legislation to control indiscriminate availability of firearms, safeguarding the right of responsible citizens to collect, own and use firearms for legitimate purposes, retaining primary responsibility at the state level, with such federal laws as necessary to better enable the states to meet their responsibilities.

● We believe that lower age groups should be accorded the right to vote. We believe that states which have not yet acted should reevaluate their positions with respect to 18-year-old voting, and that each such state should decide this matter for itself.

Slaps GOP Platform:

Wirtz Cites Trend Of '68 Bargaining

This year is on its way to becoming "the year of the least federal intervention" in collective bargaining in the past 15 years, Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz told a press conference.

He cited the fact that national "pattern" settlements have been reached without any form of government compulsion in seven of eight major industries listed last year as bargaining "tests" in 1968.

Wirtz identified the seven industries as railroads, copper, aluminum, can, aerospace, steel and telephone. In the eighth industry—shipping—negotiations are still in progress, he noted.

Wirtz made it clear that he did not mean that mediation procedures were not used in the seven industries—they were—but that none of the agreements was forced by injunction or special legislation.

In making the announcement, Wirtz took a slap at the Republican platform which pledges to reduce "government intervention in labor-management disputes to a minimum" and prevent "backdoor intervention in the administration of labor laws."

He contrasted the recent peaceful steel settlement with the steel contract reached in January, 1960, after a Taft-Hartley injunction and 116 days of government intervention under a Republican administration.

He also noted that the then Vice Pres. Richard M. Nixon was given credit for having proposed the settlement that was accepted by both sides after he participated in conferences for several weeks.

Wirtz said he wondered if Nixon might not have "some difficulty" running on the GOP platform plank.

In answers to questions from newsmen, Wirtz said he "was concerned" that recent wage and price increases might further an inflationary spiral. But, he added, the situation was "not out of hand."

He stressed his opposition to any wage or price controls at this time, pointing out that determination of wages and prices should be left to the "exercise of private responsibility."

Wirtz also said that he was not expecting any increase in unemployment as the result of the settlements in the seven major industries and that the steel wage increases "in no way justify the companies' price increases."

DELEGATES HAIL THE RE-ELECTION of Pres. Joseph N. DePaola of the Barbers at the union's 23rd convention in Bal Harbour, Fla. The convention also re-elected Sec.-Treas. E. M. Sanders, revised the union's constitution and called for standardization of rules and regulations covering the barbers' profession.

Eagleton Defeats Long In Missouri Primary

Lt. Gov. Thomas F. Eagleton, 39, won the Democratic senatorial nomination in Missouri's primary, defeating incumbent Sen. Edward V. Long and True Davis, a former ambassador to Switzerland.

Eagleton, a former Missouri attorney general and St. Louis circuit attorney, now faces a tough encounter in the Nov. 5 election with Rep. Thomas B. Curtis, who won the Republican senatorial nomination over token opposition.

Long has served in the Senate since 1960 when he was appointed to the vacancy left by the death of Sen. Thomas C. Hennings. He won a full term in 1962.

In the contest for Curtis' House seat, James W. Symington, a son of Sen. Stuart Symington (D-Mo.), won the Democratic nomination. He will be opposed by Republican Hugh Scott.

Another outcome in Missouri assured the state of sending its first Negro to Congress. William Clay and Milton Carpenter won the Democratic and GOP nominations, respectively, in the first district. Both are Negroes.

These were highlights of other primaries:

In Kansas, Wichita attorney William I. Robinson and Rep. Robert J. Dole (R-Kan.) won their respective party's nomination to succeed Sen. Frank Carlson (R-Kan.), who is retiring. Dole defeated former Gov. William H. Avery and Robinson beat out four Democratic candidates.

Restaurant owner Rick Harman won the GOP nomination over Lt. Gov. John Crutcher to oppose Democratic Gov. Robert B. Docking in November. Docking had no primary opposition.

Other Results

George Meeker of Garden City and Keith Sebelius of Norton will square off in the general election as Democratic and Republican candidates for Congress in Dole's district.

Former U.S. attorney Newell A. George defeated dentist Jerome Holtzman of Prairie Village for the Democratic nomination to Congress in Kansas' third district to oppose incumbent Republican Larry Winn, Jr.

Michigan's congressional delegation of 12 Republicans and seven Democrats survived intact in a primary election in which only three faced opposition.

Democratic Congressmen Charles C. Diggs, Jr., and John D. Dingell and GOP Rep. James Harvey easily defeated their challengers.

In the only major primary race in Idaho, State Sen. Orval Hansen of Idaho Falls won the GOP nomination for Congress in the second district over two opponents. In November he faces State Rep. Darell Manning of Pocatello, who was unopposed for the Democratic nomination.

Johnson Hails Rollbacks on Steel Prices

Austin, Tex.—Pres. Johnson hailed price rollback announcements by United States Steel Corp. and Bethlehem Steel as a "major victory" for the administration and the American consumer.

A White House statement said U.S. Steel's action in "limiting its price increases" had saved the consumer $500 million in inflation, and predicted that similar rollbacks may be expected to follow announcement of selective price increases by Bethlehem Steel and Inland Steel.

The President "welcomes the substantial improvement from the general inflationary threat that was posed last week," the statement said. Some steel producers announced across-the-board price increases soon after the Steelworkers won contract improvements from 11 big companies. The Bethlehem increase far exceeded any reasonable cost estimate, Johnson said.

Generalities in Republican Platform Designed to Cover Up Party Rifts and former Vice Pres. Richard M. Nixon and represents an amalgamation of the positions of a number of GOP leaders.

It calls for "de-Americanization" of the war and greater reliance on South Vietnamese troops, a position Nixon had taken in a paper submitted to the platform committee. It pledges:

"We will sincerely and vigorously pursue peace negotiations as long as they offer any reasonable prospect for a just peace. We pledge to develop a clear and purposeful negotiating position."

Another major section, dealing with the "crisis of the cities," calls for a "vigorous effort, nationwide, to transform the blighted areas of cities into centers of opportunity and progress, culture and talent."

It proposes a program of "innovative state programs, using new policy techniques such as urban development corporations," and "a greater involvement of vast private enterprise resources in the improvement of urban life, induced by tax and other incentives."

The section pledges "a complete overhaul and restructuring of the competing and overlapping jumble of federal programs to enable state and local governments to focus on priority objectives."

Citing the riots and violence that have plagued the urban ghettos, the platform calls for "measures to alleviate and remove the frustrations that contribute to riots," but declares: "We simultaneously support decisive action to quell civil disorders, relying primarily on state and local governments to deal with these conditions."

A separate plank on crime declares that "lawlessness is crumbling the foundations of American society."

It accuses the Johnson Administration of ignoring "the danger signals of our rising crime rates until very recently" and proposing "hopelessly inadequate" corrective measures. The GOP calls for strengthening of state and local law enforcement, a nationwide campaign against the drug traffic, "total commitment" to a drive against organized crime, including the use of court-supervised wiretapping equipment, and gun controls that do not interfere with legitimate use by "responsible citizens."

On labor matters, the platform first praises organized labor for having "contributed greatly to the economic strength of our country and the well-being of its members" and says the GOP "vigorously endorses its key role in our national life."

The section goes on to declare the belief that "the protection of individual liberty is the cornerstone of sound labor policy" and pledges "vigorous enforcement" of federal labor laws. Without mentioning the National Labor Relations Board by name, it says "we will be vigilant to prevent any administrative agency entrusted with labor law enforcement from defying the letter and spirit of these laws."

Silent on 14(b)

There is no mention at all of Section 14(b) of the Taft-Hartley Act which permits states to outlaw union shop agreements. A labor-backed measure to repeal the law was blocked by a Dirksen-led filibuster from ever coming to a vote in the Senate two years ago.

The platform calls for "responsibility—by government, management and labor—to avoid the imposition of excessive costs or prices and to share with the consumer the benefits of increased productivity."

It assails government coerced" strike settlements that "accelerate inflation" and calls for "permanent, long-range solutions of the problems of national emergency disputes, public employe strikes and crippling work stoppages."

Support is expressed for "an equitable minimum wage for American workers," but this is defined as "one providing fair wages without unduly increasing unemployment among those on the lowest rung of the economic ladder."

The platform urges "re-examination" to determine if a statutory workweek shorter than 40 hours without loss of wages would stimulate jobs and productivity.

It pledges to protect federal workers in their right to form and join unions but is silent on collective bargaining and would deny them a union shop. It makes no mention of any rights of state and local government employes.

In the section on national defense, it calls for reversal of the decline of the U.S. merchant fleet and pledges a "vigorous and realistic ship replacement program."

Romney Raps Unions On Pay Gains, 'Power'

offer no amendments to it. But he said he wishes "it were more complete" in dealing with "problems resulting from our outdated collective bargaining laws."

He charged that union contract settlements are now yielding wage increases "two or three times increases in national productivity" and that "reward based on contribution is being replaced by reward based on raw power."

"Something has obviously happened to the principle of reward based on contribution," he went on, "when a plumber's helper, just out of high school, makes more than a veteran policeman or teacher."

Romney specifically cited the recent wage settlement in the steel industry, charging that its net effect "is higher prices and fewer jobs."

He called agreements such as that in steel "abuses of raw economic power" that "generate evermore inflation".

Romney made much the same argument, in more restrained language, at the 1964 Republican convention in San Francisco. But at that time he also told the platform committee that so-called "right-to-work" laws were not the answer to industrial relations problems and specifically endorsed the right of workers to negotiate the union shop.

This year, like the 1968 platform, he had nothing to say about "right-to-work" laws.

Romney made it plain that he preferred the language of the 1964 platform which pledged "returning the consumer to the driver's seat as the chief regulator and chief beneficiary of a free economy, by resisting excessive concentration of power, whether public or private."

Commenting on Romney's remarks, Sen. Everett M. Dirksen (Ill.) declared there was ample room under the language of the 1968 platform to pursue Romney's objectives and cited particularly the section calling for an updating of anti-trust policy.

Republicans Seek a 'Moderate' Image

Battles Over Ideology Shunned In Nomination of Nixon, Agnew

eral segment supporting Rockefeller, the uncompromising rightwing looking to Reagan, and the pragmatic conservatives rallying behind Nixon. These ideological differences, however, were submerged in the interests of party unity.

This was precisely the goal of Ray C. Bliss, the veteran political strategist who took over as Republican national chairman when the GOP moved to regroup following the 1964 defeat.

Bliss, who headed the convention Committee on Arrangements, saw that all factions of the party were given recognition in the course of the four-day proceedings, parading heroes of the conservatives, liberals and middle-roaders before the applauding delegates.

Umbrella For All

The platform, too, reflected the anxiety to avoid a split of any kind. It was drawn up by a committee headed by Sen. Everett M. Dirksen (Ill.), who frankly acknowledged that it was designed to permit any candidate to run on it, no matter what his philosophy within the GOP. Set forth in broad, general terms, the platform nevertheless is anchored to such old stand-bys of Republican dogma as opposition to federal spending for social programs, tax incentives for business and industry, and alarm over the strength of organized labor.

The labor plank was too general for Michigan Gov. George Romney, who complained it did not go far enough in calling for measures to curb "abuses of raw economic power." But Romney agreed not to upset the smooth, carefully staged arrangements by offering an amendment and he urged the delegates to give the platform enthusiastic support.

The nomination was a personal triumph and an impressive comeback for Nixon, carrying him again to the leadership of his party.

Once before, in 1960, after serving eight years as Vice President under former Pres. Dwight D. Eisenhower, he was chosen as the Republican presidential candidate only to lose narrowly to the late Pres. John F. Kennedy. Two years later, Nixon suffered a galling defeat when he challenged Edmund G. (Pat) Brown for the governorship of California. He vowed then never again to be a candidate for any office and bitterly bade farewell to the press, blaming the news media for his loss.

What brought him back into party affairs, he says, was the leadership vacuum left by the devastating Republican losses in the 1964 election.

In 1966, he barnstormed the country on behalf of GOP congressional candidates, helping the party pick up 47 House seats and establishing himself among grassroots Republican organizations.

He announced his candidacy for President last Feb. 1 and scored a solid string of primary victories, running up vote totals of 70 percent and higher against little or no opposition. This, plus a quiet but diligent drive to line up delegates in non-primary states, put him well out in front in the race for the Republican nomination as the convention opened here.

For his opponents, it was largely a case of arriving too late.

Rockefeller first disappointed his supporters last spring when he announced that he would not seek the nomination. Later when he decided to become a candidate after all, the primaries were all but settled and much of his support was gone. The New York governor then opened an all-out public relations drive to influence the public opinion polls and persuade delegates that only he could win for the Republicans in November. He repeatedly depicted Nixon as a "loser."

A week ago, Rockefeller did shoot to the front of the polls as the leading Republican prospect. But Nixon's delegate strength was firm enough, and his organization strong enough, to hold off the pressures from the Rockefeller camp.

Reagan, the current favorite of the conservative wing of the party, never was in serious contention. Throughout the primary campaign, he insisted he was a non-candidate although he permitted his name to remain on the ballot in a few states. He controlled the California convention delegation, and at its insistence, just two days before the nominations, he became a formal candidate. His main hope was that the delegates would turn to him in the event of a standoff between Nixon and Rockefeller. It didn't happen that way.

The single note of discord was produced by the nearly all-white character of the convention, with only 28 Negro delegates and 54 alternates among the total of 2,666 delegates and alternates. A number of civil rights groups protested the "lily-white" image of the party in formal complaints and in demonstrations outside the convention hall. Reacting on its second day, the convention pushed through a new rule barring racial discrimination in future selection of delegates at all party levels.

A large part of the apparent harmony at the convention lay in the unanimity with which speaker after speaker condemned "the Johnson-Humphrey Administration," leaving no doubt who they think will be the Democratic candidate in November.

Aimed at Victory

All of this was directed toward one goal: a Republican victory in the presidential election and party control of the House of Representatives.

Bliss set the theme of "Republican resurgence" in his opening remarks, citing the 1966 congressional comeback, the capture of a majority of the governor ships, and further gains in state legislatures and city halls.

And with the 1964 split obviously in mind, he called on the convention to "resolve one thing":

"The individuals who are chosen to be our presidential and vice presidential nominees must be given the complete, unswerving, and vigorous support of all Republicans."

The permanent chairman, House Minority Leader Gerald P. Ford (Mich.), assailed the Administration on every count from the war in Viet Nam to spending the country "deeper and deeper into inflation." He predicted that the GOP would elect the 31 congressmen it needs to capture control of the House and would work "with a Republican president" to achieve the platform goals.

Backlog of Bills Waits On Return of Congress

pects the Senate to stay in session until it acts on his Supreme Court nominations—Abe Fortas as chief justice and Federal Judge Homer Thornberry as an associate justice.

The nominations have been the targets of a Republican-led attack and face heavy debate in the Senate, plus the threat of a filibuster that would tie up legislation.

The White House also pointed out that Congress still must pass six appropriations bills, including those that provide funds for the Housing & Urban Development, Health, Education & Welfare and Labor departments.

Funds Sought

Appropriations for the three departments and several independent agencies include requests for money for programs to assist the poor in getting better jobs, more adequate health care and better education.

The bill providing housing funds was in a House-Senate conference committee when Congress recessed. Labor-HEW appropriations measure is set as the first item to be considered by the Senate when it returns.

Senate Majority Leader Mike Mansfield predicted a "tough" post-convention meeting and said the inability of Congress to complete its business in seven months this year underscores the need for congressional "reform."

He proposed that Congress accept the fact that its business is a year-around job, pace itself with a summer break, and make the government's fiscal year coincide with the calendar year to bring "more efficiency" to the appropriations process.

Poultry Bill Passes

The poultry inspection bill, approved by a conference committee and then the House and Senate, gives the states two years to set up strictly-enforced inspection programs for the 1.6 billion pounds of poultry sold within state lines.

It a state fails to set up a program rated as effective as the ten-year-old controls over poultry in interstate commerce, then the Agriculture Dept. will take over inspection of poultry sold within the state.

Farmers processing no more than 250 turkeys or 1,000 chickens a year for intrastate sale are exempt from inspection. Processors of up to 5,000 turkeys or 20,000 chickens for intrastate sale also are exempt from inspection but have to pass Federal sanitary checks.

Major support for the legislation came from the Administration, consumer groups, the AFL-CIO and the Meat Cutters, whose members risk infection and disease in uninspected plants.

The union's top officers, Pres. T. J. Lloyd and Sec.-Treas. Patrick E. Gorman hailed the legislation as "meaningful, effective consumer protective and worker protective legislation."

A natural gas pipeline safety bill sent to the White House after winning final approval in the House and Senate, was also the final product of a conference committee.

It authorizes the Transportation Dept. to set engineering and structural safety standards for most of the nation's 825,000-mile gas pipeline network.

Covered by the bill are 224,000 miles of transmission lines from producing areas to urban distribution points and the 536,000 miles of distribution lines running under city streets.

Some 63,000 miles of "gathering' lines that carry gas from the wellhead to collection points are exempt from coverage. However, the secretary of transportation can order "gathering" lines covered if they run in urban areas.

The department has up to two years to devise its standards. A state can take over enforcement of standards for lines within its borders providing it proves to the department that it has an effective inspection system. Civil penalties for violation of the law provide a maximum $200,000 fine.

Although labor had sought stronger penalties and more extensive coverage, AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller described the legislation as "a step forward and one which we expect future Congresses to improve upon."

Negroes Protest 'Lily-White' Tone Of GOP Parley, Changes Promised

Miami Beach—The Republican National Convention adopted a change in party rules to bar racial discrimination in the selection of delegates at all levels of the GOP.

But the action came too late to satisfy the protest of Negro Republicans from Florida and Louisiana that they had been excluded from representation in selection of all-white delegates from their states.

The total of 2,666 delegates and alternates to the convention include 28 delegates who are Negroes, only four of whom were from southern states, and 54 alternates.

The new rule, which had been submitted to the rules committee by former Pennsylvania Gov. William W. Scranton, states:

"Participation in a Republican primary, caucus, any meeting or convention held for the purpose of selecting delegates to a county, district, state or national convention shall in no way be abridged for reasons of race, religion, color or national origin.

"The Republican state committee or governing committee of each state shall take positive action to achieve the broadest possible participation in party affairs."

Until now, racial discrimination has not been spelled out in the convention rules as a ground on which the seating of a delegation could be challenged.

There were other charges that the convention had a nearly lily-white complexion.

The Civil Rights Leadership Conference, headed by Roy Wilkins, said the total of one Negro delegate "and a few scattered alternates" from nine Deep South states "is a shocking unrepresentation of the millions of Negroes who inhabit that vast area."

Wilkins wrote GOP National Chairman Ray C. Bliss that there is evidence that state and local Republican organizations actively discouraged Negro participation. He expressed the hope that "never again" would a major political party convention find "lily-white delegations from the states of the Deep South."

And a group of striking Negro sanitation workers from St. Petersburg picketed outside the convention hall. Their protest, they said, was directed not only to the fact that the Florida delegation to the convention was all-white, but also against the Republican city administration of St. Petersburg.

Finally, in an incident embarrassing to the entire Republican leadership, Sen. Edward W. Brooke (Mass.) refused to attend a dinner given by Sen. Everett M. Dirksen (Ill.) at the exclusive Bath Club on the opening night of the convention.

The club, Brooke said, bars Negroes and Jews from membership.

Nixon, GOP Policies Pose Clear Choice—Humphrey

Republican Drive Aims At Suburbia

By John M. Barry

The Republican presidential ticket headed by Richard M. Nixon will pound hard on "law and order" in the cities as the major theme of an aggressive and calculated campaign for the votes of white, middle-class suburbia.

This became clear as the impact of Nixon's acceptance speech and his choice of Maryland Gov. Spiro T. Agnew as the party's candidate for Vice President began to register across the nation.

In thanking the delegates for the nomination, the former Vice President touched all the bases of national problems without veering from the broad, non-specific paths drawn in the new Republican platform.

It was Nixon's heavy emphasis on crime and civil disorder that set the tone of the speech and foreshadowed the nature of the campaign to come.

"A nation that can't keep the peace at home," he asserted, "won't be trusted to keep the peace abroad."

He criticized the courts for having "gone too far in weakening the peace forces as against the criminal forces" and called on judges to "recognize that the first civil right of every American is to be free from domestic violence."

Picks Scapegoat

He singled out as his chief scapegoat Atty. Gen. Ramsey Clark, declaring that "if we are to restore order and respect for law in this country, there's one place we're going to begin: We're going to have a new attorney general . . ."

Nixon took due note of the charge that "law and order" is being used by some candidates as a "code word" for racism, and he insisted that "our goal is . . . justice for every American."

His program for bringing social justice to the ghettos that spawn urban rioting and violence, however, hewed closely to the generalities of the platform. He rejected as "failures" federal programs to provide jobs, housing and welfare for the poor and called for tax and credit policies "to enlist in this battle the greatest engine of progress ever developed in the history of man—American private enterprise."

In selecting Agnew as his running mate, Nixon drew largely on the counsel of conservative Republicans, including Sen. John Tower (Tex.) and Sen. Strom Thurmond (S.C.). He failed to consult, or even notify, the GOP liberals.

It was clearly evident that the heavily conservative southern Republican bloc had in fact been given a veto over the selection of a vice presidential candidate—not in so many words but in Nixon's pledge to southern caucuses that his choice would not be someone "objectionable" to the South who

HEARST STRIKERS in Los Angeles cheer four-man "truth team" at start of a nationwide tour to tell the story of the strike-lockout of 2,000 Herald-Examiner employes. In car, left to right, are Stan Progar and Dick Houdek, Newspaper Guild; Jack Dyer, Mailers, and Michael Mulcahy, Web Pressmen, who are scheduled to visit 22 major cities and labor conventions in 16 states. Eleven AFL-CIO unions are sponsoring the trip as part of national boycott against Hearst enterprises—and companies advertising in the paper being turned out by strikebreakers. (Story, Page 2.)

Hits Appeal To Emotion, Repression

Vice Pres. Hubert H. Humphrey, with an apparent commanding lead for the Democratic presidential nomination, welcomed the Republican selection of Richard M. Nixon as presenting the nation with "a clear choice."

Humphrey stressed that the choice is "not only between men, but also policies of government and the role of this nation in the affiairs of the world."

In a series of speeches, statements and television appearances, Humphrey spelled out his program and met head-on the GOP emphasis on "law and order"—a phrase that in politics has come to represent an appeal to white "backlash" votes.

"The law and order we seek," Humphrey said, "cannot be built on rhetoric or repression . . . by an emotional outburst of reaction."

Stressing that Negroes and the poor are the chief victims of crime, the Vice President promised a program of "responsible and massive action" to help control crime in the cities. The goal, he declared, must not be repression for law-abiding Negroes but "a new freedom from fear and the constant threat of violence" in the nation's central cities.

Humphrey also hit sharply at South Carolina Sen. Strom Thurmond's key role in putting together the Republican ticket.

He said he will "always remember" the television scene from the

On Age, Marriage:

Job Limits Lifted For Stewardesses

Airlines were told firmly that they are violating the Civil Rights Act if they fire or ground stewardesses because they marry or pass an arbitrary age limit set by the company.

The historic twin rulings upholding union contentions were issued by the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission, the agency which interprets and seeks compliance with the federal ban on job discrimination based on race, religion, national origin—and sex.

Charges against American Airlines had been brought by Stewardesses Local 550 of the Transport Workers and union officers hailed the EEOC rulings as a "tremendous victory" after years of battling sex discrimination in the airline industry.

Immediately on the heels of the rulings, American Airlines agreed to drop all contract language limiting the job rights of its women flight attendants and came to terms with TWU after 10 months of deadlocked negotiations.

The Air Line Pilots also hailed the decisions as upholding the rights of members in ALPA's stewards and stewardess division. More than 20 grievance cases involving marriage and a number concerning age are pending, the division said. ALPA represents several thousand stewardesses on other major U.S. lines.

The EEOC ruling that American Airlines violated the law came in separate decisions. The commission held that TWU members June Dodd of New York and Christina J. Neal of El Segundo, Calif., lost their jobs for reasons based only on their sex.

1966 Firings

Miss Dodd was fired by the airline May 30, 1966, because she refused to accept a transfer to a non-flying job after reaching age 33. Miss Neal was dismissed June 30, 1966, because of a company rule that stewardesses who marry forfeit their job in a plane crew.

The Dodd ruling brought an agreement that some 65 stewardesses who were fired because of age since July 1, 1965, will be recalled with full seniority to a job at an American Airlines base of their choice. The Neal ruling settled a dispute over whether 250 married stewardesses, recalled earlier this year, are entitled to back-

'68 Contracts Top Pay Gains Of Last Year

Workers under union contracts are winning bigger increases in wages and fringe benefits this year than they did in 1967.

This is the conclusion of a Labor Dept. survey of 2 million workers covered by major settlements negotiated in the first six months of 1968. Major settlements are those affecting 5,000 or more workers.

The survey found that nearly 1.5 million workers won a median-wage-benefits package of 6.8 percent a year in 1968 pacts, compared to a 5.6 percent median in-

Meany Asks Repudiation Of Attack on AIFLD

A survey prepared for a Senate Foreign Relations subcommittee must be repudiated, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany said. He called the survey an attempt to destroy the American Institute for Free Labor Development.

In a letter to the subcommittee's chairman, Sen. Wayne Morse (D-Ore.), Meany charged the document was filled with "inaccuracies, distortions, misrepresentations and contradictions."

In publishing the survey, Meany noted that the subcommittee had made it clear that "the points of view expressed do not necessarily reflect the opinion of the subcommittee or any member thereof."

Nevertheless, Meany pointed out, the survey's contents "have already been given wide circulation in the United States and throughout Latin America," sometimes as an official government view.

As an example of this, he cited a July 27th Moscow propaganda broadcast beamed into Central America which termed the survey proof that the U.S. government, the AFL-CIO and "American monopolies" are trying to "subvert" Latin America.

The survey was made by Robert H. Dockery, a former research assistant in the Pan American Union.

Meany pointed at one of the recommendations that "decisions relating to official United States-Latin American policy and programs should be under the firm control of the Dept. of State and not delegated to a private institution or contracted out."

"If this statement refers to of-

Wallace Claims the Credit For Selection of Agnew

Former Alabama Gov. George C. Wallace, the segregationist third party candidate for President, told newsmen that the Republican Party is now "talking like we do."

Wallace claimed credit for influencing the selection of Maryland Gov. Spiro T. Agnew as the GOP vice presidential candidate and for the stress on "law and order" in Republican convention speeches.

He said at a news conference in Raleigh, N.C., that his own campaign "already has enough influence to make one of the major parties pick a certain nominee for Vice President, and that shows the movement is already successful."

Wallace added: "It's too late, but at least it's progress."

Hearst Striker 'Truth Squad' Tours Nation

Los Angeles—Publisher George R. Hearst, Jr., won't talk to his 2,000 striking and locked out employes here, so the employes will talk about Hearst—coast to coast.

Members of the 11-union Strike-Lockout Council, frustrated after seven months of effort to get Hearst to meet them around the bargaining table, have sent a "truth squad" on a 12-week tour of 16 states to "tell it like it is" to audiences all the way from Los Angeles to New York and back.

State Conventions

The four-man team stopped first at state AFL-CIO conventions in Nevada, Utah and Montana before heading for the Steelworkers convention in Chicago and the Teachers convention in Cleveland Aug. 19-22.

The "truth talkers" were scheduled to bring their message to the convention of the Association for Educators in Journalism and the Hearst Journalism Professors dinner Aug. 25 in Lawrence, Kan.

They were due in New York Sept. 2 for the City Central Labor Council's big Labor Day parade; back to Chicago Sept. 3-5 for the Machinists convention; East again for conventions of the New York State, Connecticut and West Virginia federations. After that: conventions of the Tobacco Workers and the Broadcast Employes in Chicago, the Rubber Workers in Denver, the Missouri AFL-CIO in Kansas City and the Illinois AFL-CIO in Springfield.

October Stops

October targets include the Delaware and New Hamsphire state convention; the Flight Engineers in Miami Beach; the Pulp, Sulphite & Paper Mill Workers in Hollywood, Fla.; the Air Line Dispatchers in Miami Beach, and the Indiana and Kentucky state federations.

The cross-country travelers include Michael Mulcahy of the Printing Pressmen, Stan Progar and Dick Houdek of the Newspaper Guild, and Jack Dyer of the Mailers. Each has 2 to 20 years of Herald-Examiner service, and all have been out since last Dec. 15.

The strikers have launched a nationwide Don't Buy campaign, and AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany notified all affiliates that the employes and their families "urgently need financial assistance." A special strike fund was approved by the federation's Executive Council, which primed it with a $25,000 contribution.

A rally at strike headquarters here gave the "truth team" a cheering sendoff. The four men left in a station wagon with a documentary film of the strike-lockout and thousands of handbills, pamphlets, brochures and picket signs telling the Hearst story.

Local Campaign

As the labor team took off, a major television and radio campaign was launched in Southern California for a six-week run. Strike Coordinator W. R. Robertson said the double thrust was triggered because "Hearst has refused to discuss the issues" and continues putting out a scab product with the help of professional strikebreakers escorted by city police.

"We feel the public should know about 2,000 Americans who lost their jobs because of one man's refusal to bargain in good faith," Robertson declared.

MINI-PARKS like the model, above, will be built with $40,000 check donated by the Clothing Workers to the New York Urban Coalition. ACWA Vice Pres. Howard D. Samuel presents check to Coalition Pres. ITU Shortens Training In Apprentice Program

Cleveland—The Typographical Union voted at its 110th convention to cut two years off the maximum apprentice training period. Delegates also updated the union's bylaws and general laws, and sent five proposed constitutional changes to referendum for a vote by all U.S. and Canadian members Oct. 16.

Delegates approved an officers' proposal that the apprentice laws be changed to provide that the period of apprentice training will not exceed four years, instead of the present six, and that applicants must pass an aptitude test instead of a technical examination. The laws change, which does not require referendum approval, also specifies that proficiency rather than time served shall be the determining factor in upgrading learners. It takes effect Jan. 1, 1969.

Salaries Raised

The constitutional changes, if approved, will also go into effect next Jan. 1. They call for salary increases for the five top ITU officers; a dues increase of $1 per month for members not working at the printers' trade in unorganized territory, and for proprietor members in unorganized towns; exempting 60-year members from dues and assessments; four weeks' vacation, instead of three, for regularly assigned ITU representatives; and a raise from 10 cents a mile to 15 for officers and members using their own cars on union business.

The salary proposal would raise the pay of the ITU's president and secretary-treasurer from the current three times the average weekly wages of the members to 3.5 times. The three vice presidents would be raised from 2.5 to 3 times average wages.

Among major convention actions were these: increasing the ITU fraternal pension benefits from $22 a week to $100 a month; making it mandatory rather than permissive that traveling cards indicate the amount of uncanceled overtime worked by a member when the card is issued; reducing from two days to one the mandatory requirement for overtime cancellation in a financial week, and overhauling the language of the convention laws and the membership sections of the bylaws.

The delegates paid tribute to former Pres. Elmer Brown, who died in office Feb. 27 and was succeeded by First Vice Pres. John J. Pilch.

The convention endorsed the United Farm Workers, their organizing drive and their boycott of California table grapes; voted to continue supporting a strike started nearly seven years ago by Lawrence, Kan., Local 570 against the Kansas Color Press; and called for "generous contributions" by all members and local unions to the strike and lockout fund of the 11 Los Angeles unions fighting for survival at Hearst's daily Herald-Examiner.

Key Constitutional Change:

Postal Clerks Ease Strike Position

Minneapolis, Minn.—The Postal Clerks this week became the first major federal worker union to eliminate its traditional no-strike pledge.

The action came early in the UFPOC's 35th national convention on grounds that present federal law made the strike ban in its 63-year-old constitution "superfluous."

The union, which holds exclusive national bargaining rights for the nation's quarter of a million postal clerks, specified however that its members were not asserting the right to strike.

A record total of more than 1,100 delegates, whose numbers forced unscheduled shift of the proceedings from the Leamington Hotel to the roomier Municipal Convention Center, approved the constitutional change by an overwhelming standing vote after nearly an hour of sometimes heated floor debate. There was little opposition to dropping the no-strike pledge. The dissent was largely from delegates arguing that this would be merely a "half-measure." Their more militant position drew frequent applause, but few votes.

The delegates acted on the combined recommendation of their own National Executive Board and Constitutional Committee.

The rationale of the action was explicitly defined by the resolution as eliminating a constitutional provision made "superfluous" by the enactment of federal restrictions on strikes in the postal service subsequent to the drafting of the union's original constitution in 1906.

National Legislative Dir. Patrick J. Nilan told newsmen after the decision that the action nonetheless reflected "a widespread frustration among postal employes over anti-labor policies of postal management and deterioration of bargaining procedures under Executive Order 10988."

The resolution further calls on the union "to sponsor and support legislation that will provide for binding arbitration or other suitable means of resolving disputes." The organization has been spearheading without notable success a drive in the 90th Congress to achieve union recognition by law.

Specifically the convention decision changes a section of the union constitution which said: "We recognize the fact that legislation and not strike is the last resort in the adjustment of our grievances, and therefore, we oppose strikes in the postal service."

The clause is now replaced by the following sentence: "We recognize the fact that legislation is the last resort in the adjustment of our grievances."

In other action, as the first order of business, the convention also amended the UFPOC constitution to provide more delegates from locals at future conventions.

The change will increase maximum delegate representation of the biggest locals from 20 to 35.

Opening-day speakers included Sen. Ralph W. Yarborough (D-Tex.), ranking Democratic member of the Senate Post Office Committee, and Rep. Dominick V. Daniels (D-N.J.), a senior member of the House Post Office Committee.

Yarborough denounced proposals to convert the postal system into private enterprise or transform it into a TVA-like government corporation.

"The Post Office," he said, "is the business of the American people. It should never be taken from the oversight of the people's representatives in Congress."

The only way mails can be operated like a "self-supporting" business, he pointed out, "would be to raise rates, reduce services, cut back employes and keep wages down."

Daniels promised to continue a fight in Congress for passage of a government-union recognition bill, of which he is a principal sponsor.

He also spoke up in favor of a basic, five-day, Monday-through-Friday workweek in the Post Office with time and a half for all work in excess of eight hours a day, as well as for Saturday and double time for Sunday.

Feller Scores GOP Steamroller, Cites Union's Three-Year Gains

Miami Beach—The Brewery Workers moved into this city on the heels of the Republican National Convention. And if any leftover GOP delegates wandered into the union's opening day session, they would have heard quite a different brand of oratory.

Brewery Pres. Karl F. Feller had something to say about the GOP convention in his address to the delegates.

He termed the Republican convention an example of a "steamroller in action." The GOP delegates, Feller suggested, "made it clearly evident that they did not learn their lesson in 1964" because former Sen. Barry Goldwater "and his ultra-conservatives still live within their hearts."

Vice Pres. Hubert H. Humphrey also had some comments on the GOP choice in an address to the Brewery Workers.

Humphrey, whose presidential candidacy has been endorsed by the union's executive board, talked to the convention delegates by telephone.

"I think we all noticed that the Republican candidate is not new at all," Humphrey said, "that he looked backward and did not paint a picture of an America that moves ahead as much as he painted an image of his party that looks to the oldest Dixiecrat of them all."

Humphrey cited current problems of "poverty, prejudice and peace" and pledged that "if I am privileged to be the President of these United States, I will give everything that I have of myself to bring about an honorable and speedy resolution of the conflict" in Viet Nam.

Feller told the delegates that the union has made substantial gains in both organizing and collective bargaining in the last three years and has scored important breakthroughs in the soft drink industry.

Cooperation Stressed

He told the Brewery Workers' 39th convention that he saw continued progress based on continued cooperation among the union's locals.

Since the last convention in 1965, Feller said, there have been gains in all areas, but particularly in Canada.

He said the 202 delegates from 149 local unions attending the convention represented a "meeting of the minds to discuss the stewardship of our union and the manner in which it has been conducted since the last convention."

Other speakers on the opening day included Sec.-Treas. Joseph Lewis of the AFL-CIO Union Label & Service Trades Dept.; Pres. John W. Schmitt of the Wisconsin AFL-CIO, former officer of Brewery Workers Local 9, Milwaukee, and Pres. Edmund P. Tobin of the Union Labor Life Insurance Co.

Lewis saluted the Brewery union as a charter member of the label trades department and an exhibitor at the AFL-CIO's union-industries show since the first one in 1938.

By unanimous vote the convention pledged its support of the California grape boycott now being conducted by the United Farm Workers, and the Textile Workers Union of America boycott against hosiery and knitgoods products of Kayser-Roth Corp., whose Dayton, Tenn., plant has been struck since May.

Gains $21.60 a Week:

White Collar Pacts Negotiated in Steel

Pittsburgh, Pa.—Substantial improvements for white collar workers have been won by the Steelworkers in contracts just negotiated with the United States Steel Corp. and Republic Steel Corp.

USWA Pres. I. W. Abel said the new three-year agreements will give 9,000 office and technical employes at U.S. Steel and 1,500 Republic office workers increases averaging $21.60 a week in wages and salary increments. They are also assured of advance notice of job changes caused by automated office equipment, and all relevant provisions of the new contracts between the union and 11 big steel firms for more than 400,000 production workers.

Negotiators representing 33 local unions at U.S. Steel and 10 locals at Republic Steel were headed by Dir. John J. Pastin and John Sgro of the union's office and technical department.

Pastin said similar agreements are being sought for another 9,500 white collar units at other major steel firms.

At Republic Steel, where 40 percent of the office employes had been paid on an hourly basis, the new contract places all such employes on straight salary and gives them such additional contract protections as sick leave, improved insurance coverage and a guarantee on hours to be worked.

At both Republic and U.S. Steel, all covered employes get rate and increment hikes of 21 cents an hour retroactive to Aug. 1; another 12.6 cents a year later, and a final 10.4 cents on Aug. 1, 1970.

Wage Study Set

The USWA and management agreed on a review—the first since 1950—of the Cooperative Wage Study manual classifying jobs in electronic data processing areas, including offices and laboratories.

A new tuition assistance plan will help eligible employes to improve their job skills by supplementing their education on their own time, with management paying 50 percent of the cost up to $200 a year.

Another highlight was establishment of a single rate structure for all employes on the payroll Aug. 1. That eliminates starting, training, and intermediate rates formerly followed. In addition, a 20-day grace period on temporary assignments for training purposes has been eliminated.

A new requirement makes it mandatory for management to provide final details of changes affecting job status due to electronic installations at least 90 days in advance, and to notify the local union, at least 30 days or more in advance, of the job status of affected employes.

pay. The EEOC decision made it clear that they are.

The union filed charges in two specific cases based on an EEOC decision of last Feb. 24 that sex is not a bona fide occupational qualification for the position of flight cabin attendant "because the basic duties of the job could be satisfactorily performed by members of both sexes."

EEOC said that Miss Dodd became an American Airlines stewardess Feb. 1, 1956 and had an "excellent work record." On May 27, 1964, management notified her she would have to accept reassignment to a ground job or be terminated at 33. She was offered several such jobs but refused them, and was terminated on her 33rd birthday.

The commission rejected the claim of the Air Transport Association, Inc., and individual airlines that, if all incumbents in a job classification are members of one sex, any conditions of employment relating to that job cannot be based on sex.

Noting the difference in treatment of male employes, the commission said the company's maximum age restriction for stewardesses is based on sex and thereby violates the law.

The company, however, may "lawfully terminate a stewardess who is unable satisfactorily to perform her job because of domestic responsibilities, or for any other reason, just as it terminates other employes" for unsatisfactory performance, it said.

WALL STREET organizing drive gets under way. Pres. John R. Kret of Office & Professional Employes Local 205 speaks to a newsman as the union brings its message to 28,000 clerical workers of brokerage houses.

Office Union Recruits on Wall Street

New York—Billions of dollars are involved in Wall Street transactions each week. But for thousands of people who work there, this means nothing more than an $80 basic pay check.

Many of these are the 28,000 people who work in the back rooms of brokerage houses, and who for months have been working 50 to 60 hours a week in an attempt to catch up on a mountain of paperwork caused by soaring stock market volume.

Some 50 members and representatives of the Office & Professional Employes have been bringing the union message to these workers, passing out pamphlets and leaflets in the nation's financial center.

This was the first step in an organizing drive by the white collar union, which already represents about 1,200 financial workers on Wall Street, mainly on the trading floors on the New York Stock Exchange, the American Stock Exchange and the New York Cotton Exchange.

The objective now is to organize the back room personnel.

15,000 Pamphlets

Members of the OPEIU's United Financial Employes Local 205 were optimistic as they distributed 15,000 copies of the union pamphlet. Pres. John R. Kret of Local 205, said a number of workers asked for additional leaflets so they could pass them out at the office.

The main aim of the white collar union is to raise salaries of the back room workers whose "low wages are camouflaged by great amounts of overtime," said Arthur Lewandowski, OPEIU vice president.

The union also points to other problems of the brokerage house workers: lack of pensions, short vacations and the absence of job security and grievance procedures.

IAM Ends Avco Strike On 37-Month Contract

Nashville, Tenn.—More than 2,800 members of Machinists Local 735 have returned to work with "a fine contract" after successfully beating back an attempt by the Avco Corp. to tie them down to a five-year agreement, the union reports.

The contract will extend for slightly more than 37 months. Future bargaining will coincide with negotiations in the aerospace industry. Major customers for the aircraft parts Avco makes are the aerospace giants.

Union members ratified the agreement by a 1,008 to 713 vote.

Avco workers walked off their jobs June 20 in protest against a last-minute five-year offer by the company. IAM Rep. Billy Pearson reported that the workers "were determined never to accept a long-term contract in these days of rising prices."

The Avco walkout and a strike against a similar management demand three weeks later by IAM members at the Groton, Conn., Electric Boat Division of General Dynamics Corp. prompted a warning to employers across the nation from IAM Pres. Roy Siemiller.

Further management demands for long-term contracts could only result in additional strikes, Siemiller said.

At Electric Boat, union negotiators report the company is now talking in terms of a contract of less than five years. They said they were hopeful of an early end to the walkout which began July 14 at the nuclear submarine boatyard.

The strike-ending agreement at Avco includes raises over the contract term of 67 cents to 77 cents an hour, including guaranteed cost-of-living increases, the union said.

"Added to current wages," he says, "this will mean that the lowest rate in the plant in 1970 will be $3 an hour. Journeymen tool and die makers and machinists will be getting $4.22 an hour."

First-year raises will range from 37 cents an hour for workers in the two top labor grades, 32 cents in Grade 3 and 27 cents in Grades 4 through 11. Second and third-year raises will be 5 percent, or 14 cents an hour, whichever is greater, each year.

Other contract improvements, which the union termed "as important as the wage gains," included:

- Pension improved from payments of $2.25 to $4 per month per year of service.
- Full-payment rather than partial-payment health and hospital care under the contributory insurance coverage.
- Two additional weeks of vacation, the third after 10 years service, the fourth after 20 years.
- An additional holiday—Good Friday.
- Shift differential up 4 cents to 13 cents an hour.
- Bereavement leave for the first time of three days and jury duty pay.
- Military makeup-pay for 10 days of regular National Guard service, plus an extra 10 days for emergency call-ups.

'68 Contracts Top Pay Gains Of Last Year

crease gained by about the same number of workers in 1967.

The median, in this case, means that there were the same number of workers winning increases above and below this percentage.

A breakdown of the 1968 survey, prepared by the Bureau of Labor Statistics shows that 23 percent of workers won wage-benefits increases in the 6.5 to 7 percent range, 19 percent were in the 7 to 7.5 percent range and 19 percent secured increases of 7.5 percent and over.

Six percent were in the 6 to 6.5 percent bracket; 19 percent, 5.5 to 6 percent; and 11 percent in the 5 to 5.5 percent group. Only 3 percent received increases of less than 5 percent.

Considering wage rates alone—without adding the value of other benefits—annual increases won during the entire life of the contract averaged 5.2 percent. This compared with 5 percent for 1967.

Wage gains tended to be highest in the first year of the contract. The median wage increase was 7.5 percent of straight-time average hourly earnings, compared with 5.7 percent for the full 1967 year.

The median first-year wage increase of 7.5 percent of straight-time average hourly earnings when converted to money was 23 cents.

More than 700,000 of the workers covered by major settlements negotiated in the first six months of 1968 are in the copper, railroad and telephone industries.

Other settlements affecting a sizable number of workers were concluded in the apparel, can, aluminum, construction and glass industries.

Cleveland Store Signs: 'Don't Buy Grapes'

Cleveland, O.—Operators of supermarket chains here have agreed to put up signs in all their stores urging customers "Please Don't Buy California Table Grapes. Help the California Grape Workers Better Their Living Conditions."

The agreement, negotiated by the Cleveland AFL-CIO and the Cleveland Committee to Support the Grape Boycott, was announced by Mayor Carl Stokes at a news conference attended by labor and chain store officials and Cesar Chavez, director of the AFL-CIO United Farm Workers Organizing Committee.

Stokes lauded those involved for agreeing on a "novel and responsible solution to a potentially serious dispute." Other cities have agreed to support the boycott but Cleveland is the first, Stokes said, to produce an agreement between unions and merchants.

A seven-page statement of agreement provides that California grapes will be kept separate from others on chain store display cases and members of the Cleveland Food Industry Committee will "prominently display" a 14 by 22-inch sign near them. CFIC Pres. Robert P. Duvin said the pact does not bind independent grocers but he expects most of them to cooperate.

UFWOC has been trying for three years to win recognition from California grape growers who have refused to bargain, even where the union can demonstrate a clear majority of the grape pickers. Only one major grower, DiGiorgio Corp., has signed a contract and its table grapes—sold mainly in Far West states—have been exempted from the nationwide boycott.

L. M. Webb Named Red Cross Liaison

L. M. Webb, for many years a local officer of the former Packinghouse Workers in Omaha, has been appointed an AFL-CIO Community Services Activities liaison representative for the American Red Cross.

Webb will serve on the staff of the eastern area office of the Red Cross, Leo Perlis, Community Services Activities director, said. Webb, who succeeds the late Henry Gunesch, has long been active in community services, Perlis added.

Shameful Tactics

IN HIS SPEECH accepting the Republican presidential nomination Richard M. Nixon allied himself with those attacking the U.S. Supreme Court and seeking to sabotage the appointment of Justice Abe Fortas as chief justice.

The record of the court under the leadership of Chief Justice Earl Warren—a record of expanding protection of civil rights and civil liberties—has been under continuing attack from the hard-line "law and order" forces starting with the John Birch Society and building up to the respectability of leading Dixiecrat senators who sit on the Senate Judiciary Committee.

Nixon gave aid to this group when he told the convention "let us recognize that some of our courts in their decisions have gone too far in weakening the peace forces as against the criminal forces in this country."

It is this argument—along with his landmark decisions on civil liberties—that has triggered the attack on Justice Fortas. The attack has picked up the support also of those who place short-term political profit above the integrity and sanctity of the judiciary.

FOR THE OPPOSITION to Fortas is concocted in part on his role in helping write some of the historic decisions on civil liberties, decisions keyed to the protection and the rights of the individual from assault by government; of Republican hopes of winning the November election and having a Republican president—read Nixon—name a new chief justice.

And not too far below the surface there is the prejudice and bias that all members of minority groups meet when they are selected for high public office.

Those dedicated to blocking Justice Fortas from becoming the chief justice have worked out a tactical approach that is only slightly less worthy of respect than the attack itself: to perpetrate in the Senate a full-blown filibuster that would prevent the members of the "greatest deliberative body in the world" from voting on whether or not to confirm the President's choice.

IF A FILIBUSTER is in fact launched against the Fortas nomination when Congress reconvenes—a filibuster led by the unholy alliance of conservative Republicans and Dixiecrats—then we will have indeed reached a new low in political morality in this country.

Richard Nixon has the opportunity to stop the planned filibuster, to prevent the combination of prejudice and political expediency from becoming the basic guidelines for the appointment of a Chief Justice of the United States.

A man who aspires to the presidency can do no less.

And the forces representing decency and democratic principles in the Senate must rally to prevent a handful of bitter-enders and narrow practitioners of ward-heeling politics from degrading both the Senate and the country.

Much more than the appointment of Justice Fortas is at stake; the basic decency and morality of the nation is on the block.

Family Incomes Rise:

2.9 Million Americans Emerge From Poverty Level in 1967

IMPORTANT PROGRESS in the fight against poverty was scored during 1967, according to statistics compiled by the Bureau of the Census, which has reported that for the first time in history median family income passed the $8,000 a year mark.

The report showed that the 1967 median was 6½ percent higher than the 1966 median of $7,500. Price increases cut into the gain, but the Bureau said that the gain in "real" purchasing power was about 4 percent.

A highly important factor in the 1967 gain, as in previous years, was the steady increase of women in the labor force, thus contributing to the number of more-than-one earners in today's families.

On a family basis it was estimated that about 600,000 families had escaped from the poverty classification based on a poverty threshold of $3,335 for a nonfarm family of four. On an individual basis, the statistics showed that the total number of poor persons in 1967 was 25.9 million, down by 2.9 million from the 1966 level.

The statistics showed that of the 2.9 million persons whose incomes climbed above the poverty level, 1 million were nonwhites, 91 percent of whom are Negroes.

"This sharp reduction in the number of poor and the reduction of similar magnitude in the previous year, were the largest declines on record for the nonwhite population since 1959," the Bureau of the Census said. "However, nonwhites continued to be over-represented among the poor in 1967. They constituted 32 percent of the poor, although they comprised only 12 percent of the total population."

Detailed statistics showed that the 1967 median income for white families was $8,300; for nonwhite families $5,200 and for Negroes $4,900. The ratio of Negro family income to white family income was 59 percent. A year earlier it was 58 percent showing a 1 percent gain.

IN THE SOUTH the discrepancy was far greater; the ratio of Negro to white median family income was only 54 percent. In the Northeast, the North Central states and the West the ratio averaged about 73 percent.

Publication of the census figures brought an analysis by the Office of Economic Opportunity plus figures of its own claiming that no less than 7 million Americans have escaped from the poverty level since the war on poverty began three years ago.

Acting OEO Dir. Bertrand M. Harding said that last year's record represented "the greatest exodus from the ranks of the poor in the 10 years that records have been kept, and possibly in the nation's history."

In the three years since passage of the Economic Opportunity Act—from December 1964, to December 1967—7 million Americans escaped from the poverty status compared with 4.5 million in the previous five years, Harding continued.

In those first three years of the poverty program, the proportion of non-white Americans in poverty dropped from 47 percent to about 35 percent and the proportion of whites in poverty declined from 14 percent to 10 percent.

Harding declared that while economic growth was responsible for much of the improvement, a substantial share of the accelerated movement out of poverty was the result of war on poverty programs, including those of OEO operated by local people in local communities. There is no satisfactory way of separating the effect of the two factors, he said. (PAI).

Social Security Pays College Fees for Many

Nearly a half-million students are helped through college by social security benefits. These benefits amount to more than the scholarships at all colleges and universities, according to Sec. Wilbur J. Cohen of the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare.

The program will pay $479 million during the 1968-69 school year to about 466,000 students in the 18-22 age bracket who are entitled to the benefits because of a disabled, retired or deceased parent, Cohen reported.

The coming school year is the fourth the program has been in effect since the law was changed in 1965 to provide for children's benefits beyond age 18. Before the change, Cohen pointed out, a young beneficiary's payments ceased when he turned 18, unless he was totally disabled.

Students receiving social security payments also may receive scholarship funds. It is also allowable for them to earn up to $1,680 each year.

As N.Y. Times Columnist Sees It:

Nixon Sacrifices GOP Liberals To Shoddy Bid for Presidency

The following column by Tom Wicker, Washington Bureau Chief of the New York Times, appeared in the Aug. 11, 1968 issue of the Times.

LONG AFTER the Republican Party had nominated Warren G. Harding for President at Chicago in 1920, William Allen White looked back in melancholy at his part in the debacle:

"I was torn," he wrote, "as I often am in politics, between the desire to jump in the fiery furnace as a martyr, and the instinct to save my hide and go along on the broad way that leadeth to destruction. In the end I toddled along, followed the Kansas banner in the parade, ashamed, disheveled in body and spirit, making a sad, fat figure while the bands played, the trumpets brayed, and the crowd howled for Harding. . . . A sad spectacle I made, and time has not softened the shabby outlines of the picture in all these long years."

Surely some Republicans straggled out of Miami Beach last week in much the same spirit, wondering if they had gone along "on the broad way that leadeth to destruction," when they might better have "jumped in the fiery furnace."

They had had to bear the shocking sight of J. Strom Thurmond, the burning-eyed racist of South Carolina, standing shoulder to shoulder with Richard Nixon when Nixon came to the platform to accept the nomination of the party of Abraham Lincoln.

There was the disreputable fact of a major-party candidate for President of the United States, and a "law and order candidate" at that, attacking the judicial branch of the government for his own political profit.

There was the intellectual dishonesty of the same candidate pledging "no more Viet Nams," while in the same breath rattling off dangerous demagogic blathes about throwing so much weight around the world that no "fourth-rate military power" would dare to "hijajck" an American ship.

And if the "first civil right of every American" really is, as Nixon asserted to great roars from his audience, the right "to be free from domestic violence," then all the safeguards of the Bill of Rights are secondary to the straightforward power of those armed by government to keep order. One would have thought such words unutterable for any lawyer, much less a man standing on the threshold of the White House and a sworn duty to uphold the Constitution.

IT IS TRUE that Nixon has said all these things before, and repeatedly, during his primary campaigns. But if such calculated applause-getters are permissible for a man seeking the nomination of a conservative party with growing strength in the racially haunted South, they are shoddy and disappointing from a man who has won that nomination, who is asking to lead a great nation gripped in a crisis of its spirit, whose main pledge is to unite all races and all sections.

The manner in which Nixon accepted his nomination, in short, dashed any hope that he intended to provide truly new leadership for his party and therefore his nation, to lead both on to higher ground, that he could bring out of spiritual crisis the kind of fresh new era that Franklin Roosevelt wrought from the nation's economic crisis 35 years ago. After the comeback, after the buildup, after the victory—after all—it was the same old party, the same old rhetoric, the same old Nixon.

The selection of Ted Agnew for Vice President is not quite in the same category. Nixon apparently tried to choose a centrist figure, between the extremes represented by John Lindsay on the left and Ronald Reagan on the right; even conceding that Agnew is a man of ability, what Nixon essentially sought was a political neuter who could offend no one.

THIS DIFFERED from John F. Kennedy's choice of Lyndon Johnson in 1960, and not only because Johnson was an acknowledged leader of a party faction and nationally known; Kennedy acted then to put back together a party riven by his nomination and by a liberal platform.

Kennedy's choice was bold and imaginative; Nixon's was timid and shrinking. It did not put back together a split party; it was a bland effort to keep anyone, anywhere, most particularly the Southerners, from being disgruntled. And even so, bringing the candidate's political judgment into sharp question at the outset, the gesture failed.

The leading moderates of this party went home dispirited and in some cases angry and offended—not so much at Agnew personally, but at the negative nature of what Nixon had done, when something positive and encouraging had been so badly needed.

The biggest political victory here, it may be said, belongs to Lindsay. By staying out of the fight against Agnew even though he could have led a spectacular insurgency, he gained the party regularity always denied him before. His appearances before the convention proved his political glamor, and he clearly set out on the long road to the next Republican presidential nomination.

He did, that is, unless this party finally has gone too far South—unless the Nixon campaign that apparently impends, kills the last Republican flicker in the cities, the urban states, among the poor, the black, the intellectuals, the young.

In such a party, there could be no place for John Lindsay. Nixon is said by close associates to be particularly anxious to nurture the growth of the party in the South, where it was for so long shut out. But what kind of growth? And what shall it profit any Republican if he gains Strom Thurmond and loses his political soul?

Appeal to Congress:

Landmark Housing Program Needs Funds to Make it Work

HAILING ENACTMENT of the new landmark housing law as a "heartening victory," an AFL-CIO spokesman called upon the Congress to provide the funds needed to make the law a reality instead of a promise.

Unless the money authorized to implement the new law is forthcoming, "America's needy would have been cruelly hoaxed, by being held out a promise of housing, only to have it denied them by failure of the appropriations process," declared Ray Denison, legislative representative for the AFL-CIO. Denison appeared on Labor News Conference, an AFL-CIO-produced public affairs program broadcast Tuesdays at 7:35 p.m., EDT, on the Mutual Radio Network.

Denison said that if the various programs in the new law are fully funded, some 1.8 million housing units can be built during the next three years to help ease the nation's immediate and critical housing needs.

The union spokesman said that the first objective will be congressional approval of the $700 million needed to get such programs as low- and middle-income home ownership and rent subsidies under way during the current fiscal year. This request is expected to come by when Congress reconvenes next month.

THE MAJOR THRUST of the new housing law will come in fiscal 1970, Denison said, when some $4 billion will be needed to get other features of the law, such as urban renewal, model cities and new communities fully operative. Funding needs for the third year will be considerably less, he said.

Denison expressed the hope that such incentives as tax credits and government assistance for interest charges will encourage stepped-up participation of private industry in low-income housing. This, he said, would be an important source of "technological knowledge and expertise" for the various programs, as well as help meet the "need for many billions of dollars from the general mortgage market and corporate sources."

Reporters interviewing Denison were William Eaton, Washington correspondent for the Chicago Daily News, and Alex Uhl, editor of Press Associates, Inc.

By Press Associates, Inc.

IN A YEAR AND A HALF or so some 200,000 Americans will start the job of counting the rest of us and finding out what changes have taken place in the American population during the past 10 years.

The count is more than just an exercise in telling us how big we are, how rich we are and even where we are heading. It will involve how many jobs we need, where those jobs will be located and how successfully we are meeting the challenges that face us—unemployment, the progress of civil rights, the success or failure of the war on poverty.

The year 1970, of course, seems a long way off, but already we are compiling preliminary figures that show the considerable changes in the American population scene that are taking place and will be reflected in the 1970 census.

The nation is growing—we now number more than 200 million—but the fact remains that our rate of growth is slowing down. The Bureau of the Census reports that calendar year 1967, when the nation's population increased by 2,138,000, "produced the lowest annual change, both in total and percent, for any calendar year since 1945."

Our birth rate continued a drop that began in 1957, falling from a high of 25.2 per thousand in 1957 to 17.9 per thousand 10 years later. During those years the death rate had gone down slightly, the net immigration rate was up slightly, but the final result was a net growth rate of only 10.7 per thousand as compared with a net growth rate of 17.2 per thousand 10 years earlier.

For more than a century, the United States was essentially a rural country. It was only in 1920 that the Bureau of the Census reported that more than half of our people now lived in cities. The 1970 census will tell us how urbanized we have become in the past half century.

It will tell us too, how far advanced a new phenomenon is also—the phenomenon of shrinking core cities and the growth of the suburbs that now ring them, bringing crucial problems to city ghettos and their inhabitants, problems involving jobs, transportation, education and housing.

But the 1970 census and its meaning for all Americans is not confined to the problems of the countryside, the cities and the suburbs. Great changes in the regional composition of our people also are involved. During the 1950's there were marked changes in the population picture in the United States with heavy migration to the far West and out of the deep South when rural Negroes moved to the North as farm work disappeared.

THE 60'S HAVE SHOWN a decided slow-down in this migration. California, Arizona and Florida—California is now the largest state in the nation—have continued to grow but at a slower pace than in the 50's.

There have been important changes, too, in the racial composition of the nation. In 1960, the Negro population constituted 10.5 percent of the population. As of Jan. 1, 1968 it constituted 11.1 percent, showing an increase of 17.24 percent.

The composition of the country by sex has changed also. Until the 1940's the number of males exceeded the number of females in the United States. During the 1940's, the ratio of females to males went ahead slightly. That trend has continued until the ratio last January was only 96.7 for males with a female population of 101,790,000 as compared with a male population of 98,458,000.

The United States is becoming a young nation, too. As of January the median age of the total population was 27.7 years, but there were marked differences by sex and race. The median age for males was 26.4, compared with 28.9 for females.

What the census figures for 1970 will surely tell us is that we are a changing nation; that old solutions for problems are no longer safe guides; that the nation's thinking will have to keep pace with the changes that are taking place.

PASSAGE OF the new housing law was a heartening victory. But it will become a "cruel hoax" on needy Americans unless Congress provides the funds to make the law's promise a reality, AFL-CIO Legislative Rep. Ray Denison, center, warned on Labor News Conference. Reporters Alex Uhl, left, of Press Associates, Inc., and William Eaton of the Chicago Daily News query Denison on the AFL-CIO public affairs interview on Mutual Radio.

Marion Crank Wins Runoff In Arkansas

State Rep. Marion H. Crank won Arkansas' Democratic gubernatorial nomination in a primary runoff election, halting an effort by Mrs. Virginia Johnson to become the state's first woman governor.

Crank, 53, of Foreman, now faces Republican Gov. Winthrop Rockefeller in the Nov. 5 general election. Rockefeller was renominated overwhelmingly over a single opponent in the state's first primary, July 30.

In that election, Crank led a six-way race, but failed to get a majority. Mrs. Johnson is the wife of Jim Johnson, who unsuccessfully sought to defeat Sen. J. W. Fulbright in the first primary.

Also in Arkansas, William Alexander won the Democratic nomination in the first congressional district, defeating Jack D. Files. The seat is now held by Rep. E. C. Gathings (D-Ark.), who is retiring at the end of his term.

Tuskegee Contest

In another election of interest, Mayor Charles M. Keever of Tuskegee, Ala., a white, was re-elected by better than a 2 to 1 margin over a Negro businessman challenger, Thomas Reed, even though Tuskegee's voter strength is 4 to 1 in the favor of Negroes.

Tuskegee Negro leaders have opposed government by race and the city has been termed a model of biracial government.

Last week the AFL-CIO News incorrectly listed Milton Carpenter as winning the Republican nomination in Missouri's first congressional district. The GOP nominee is Curtis E. Crawford.

J. P. Sullivan Dies; IBEW's Treasurer

Flushing, N.Y.—Jeremiah P. Sullivan, treasurer of the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers since 1957, was buried here after services in St. Michael's Church. He died at 77 after an illness of several months.

Initiated into IBEW Local 3 in 1912, Sullivan served his union and the New York City community in many official posts. Appointed international treasurer 11 years ago, he won unanimous election at three subsequent conventions.

At his death he was an executive board member of the city AFL-CIO, the New York City Career & Appeals Salary Board, the contractors' licensing board of the city Dept. of Water Supply, and a trustee of the Joint Board of the electrical industry and seven of its constituent funds.

A DRAMATIC STORY of the life of Samuel Gompers is presented in "The Liquid Fire," a half-hour telecast that will be shown on many stations across the nation over the Labor Day holiday. In this scene, Gompers, played by Larry Robinson (right), rejects a bribe offer by the boss (Rudy Bond) of a cigar manufacturing shop during a strike by Gompers' local union. The telecast, produced under the auspices of the George Meany Foundation in conjunction with the Jewish Theological Seminary, follows Gompers from his days as a youngster through his many years as president of the American Federation of Labor.

Rail Carmen Assured Relief in Old Dispute

Miami Beach—The Edward Ball-Florida East Coast Railway-Alfred I. Du Pont financial empire will positively be dismantled by its 1971 deadline, if not before, if one senator has his way.

Sen. Wayne Morse (D-Ore.) told delegates to the 24th convention of the Railway Carmen that the strike of non-operating unions against FEC is "one of the most cruel and unjust labor disputes in history."

Jacksonville financier Ed Ball is chairman of FEC and trustee of the vast multi-million dollar Du Pont estate in Florida, which controls the railroad. The workers have been on strike since January, 1963.

Morse, who sponsored a bill passed in 1966 requiring the supposedly charitable estate to divest itself of FEC within five years, said he will insist the "timetable" be followed.

Stressing that he will "continue to press for a fair settlement of the dispute," Morse also said, "The government should recognize that this is an emergency dispute and it should be settled at once."

Morse warned that if reactionary forces win in this year's election, railroad labor and all labor will face the threat of legislation imposing compulsory arbitration and other measures to weaken unions.

Morse, who is scheduled to become chairman of the Senate Labor committee if he wins re-election, pledged that as long as he is in the Senate he "will fight any attempt to fasten a system of compulsory arbitration into our labor laws." He defended his sponsorship of "mediation to finality" in last year's rail wage dispute, which labor had opposed as "compulsion."

Carmen's Pres. George L. O'Brien reported that the union has made "substantial improvements in wages and working conditions" since the union's last convention five years ago. He also cited legislative gains that improved pensions.

Past Pres. A. J. Bernhardt stressed the importance of the 1968 elections. "As trade unionists we must go to the polls and see that our friends and relatives also vote," Bernhardt declared.

Among other speakers were Sec.-Treas. Howard Pickett of the AFL-CIO Railway Employes Dept., who is a veteran member of the Carmen, and George Sabo, deputy administrator of the Labor Dept.'s Bureau of Apprenticeship & Training.

Delegates cheered a telegram from Vice Pres. Hubert H. Humphrey who told the convention, "You know my record on the issues which directly affect the labor movement and the fundamental health of the economy. Let us stand together behind these causes in 1968."

CWA Wins Carolina Vote, Tops Since '53

Orangeburg, S.C.—Workers who make typewriters, calculators and adding machines at a Smith-Corona-Marchant Corp. plant here voted for the Communications Workers in a National Labor Relations Board election. The vote was CWA 657, no union 402 in what the NLRB said was the largest group of workers organized since 1953 in South Carolina.

Fred (Taft-) Hartley Acts To 'Save' Country Again

Former Rep. Fred Hartley is at it again—seeking funds from gullible business executives and corporations who are interested in saving the country by "breaking the power" of unions.

Hartley, who has made a career out of fighting labor since his defeat for Congress in 1948—after he had co-authored the Taft-Hartley Act—is co-chairman of a Conference of American Small Business Organizations.

In that capacity, he has written letters soliciting "modest" contributions to help promote "agitation" in the next Congress to enact curbs on unions. The former Republican congressman from New Jersey also wants investigations of the National Labor Relations Board, the Wage & Hour Division and the courts for "abetting" the unions.

Hartley has a novel, new pitch in his letters: he blames unions for riots in ghettos. His reasoning: they helped secure minimum wage increases, which caused unemployment, which caused the uprisings.

Still Has Claim:

Labor Board Backs Striker Job Rights

An economic striker's job rights do not end just because there is a replacement in his job at the time he applies for reinstatement, the National Labor Relations Board has ruled.

Applying two Supreme Court decisions to the case of 67 strikers whom the Laidlaw Corp. refused to rehire at its Peru, Ind., plant, when their replacements left, the board set down new guidelines and reversed the old rule established in Brown & Root, Inc., Bartlett-Collins, Atlas Storage Div. and other cases.

In a unanimous decision, the five board members ordered Laidlaw not to discourage membership in Pulp, Sulphite & Paper Mill Workers Local 681 by terminating the employe status of continuing strikers or failing to reinstate them.

It ordered the firm not to threaten employes with "forever losing any right to employment" if they should strike and be replaced; to rescind plant rules against distributing union literature or petitions during nonworking time in nonworking areas on company premises.

The board ordered Laidlaw, a wire processing firm, to reinstate employes who struck Jan. 12, 1966, for better wages; applied for reinstatement unconditionally on Feb. 11, 1966, and struck again Feb. 21 that year when a few employes were reinstated as new hires.

The board agreed with Trial Examiner Louis Libbin that the treatment of applications as valid only on the day they were made, and the termination of employes who allegedly had been replaced, violated the Taft-Hartley Act. Also it cited the Supreme Court decision in a Fleetwood Trailers case, 1967, rejecting the employer's claim that reinstatement rights of strikers are determined at the time they first apply.

The Laidlaw strikers, the NLRB said, remained employes and were entitled to full reinstatement as vacancies occurred. It laid down this rule:

"Economic strikers who unconditionally apply for reinstatement at a time when their positions are filled by permanent replacements:

"1. Remain employes; 2. Are entitled to full reinstatement upon the departure of replacements unless they have acquired regular and substantially equivalent employment, or: 3. The employer can prove that the failure to offer full reinstatement was for legitimate and substantial business reasons."

Elmer Holland Dies; Unionist, Congressman

Rep. Elmer J. Holland (D-Pa.), who died at 74, was a "sincere and dedicated congressman who served the people of his district, his state and his nation with compassion and common sense," AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany said in a message of sympathy to the family.

Meany added: "He was a true friend of the labor movement and we mourn his death."

Holland suffered a stroke in 1966 and was not a candidate for re-election to the 20th District seat he had held since 1956.

Holland was chairman of the House Select Subcommittee on Labor, sponsored the Manpower Development & Training Act of 1962, and was a leader in many drives for progressive legislation.

Born in Pittsburgh, Holland was a charter member of Steelworkers Local 1272 and served on the union's national organizing staff in the 1930's. At his death, USWA Pres. I. W. Abel called Holland one of the most "consistent and faithful champions" of worker welfare in Congress.

Labor, Universities Join In Community Training

Grants totaling more than $615,000 by the Office of Economic Opportunity were given to three universities to extend training programs for trade union leaders involved in community action programs.

The University of Houston was added to the OEO economic development effort with a grant of $258,189. Grants also were given to the University of Massachusetts of $204,522 and West Virginia University of $152,885 to continue prior programs in OEO Trade Union Leadership Training.

The Houston program will cover an eight-state area in the Southwest-Rocky Mountain region, including Arizona, New Mexico, Colorado, Arkansas, Oklahoma, Louisiana, Mississippi and Texas.

The prime objectives of the Houston program, OEO said, are to expand the economic development effort of the region by using the resources of the labor movement and by building a reservoir of knowledgeable people with the capability of initiating new programs and opening opportunities for employment.

Four hundred union trainees from an earlier program at West Virginia University will receive further training to assist other community leaders strengthen community action agencies and set up new ones in the Appalachian states.

The states included in the Appalachian states program are Alabama, Georgia, Kentucky, Maryland, North Carolina, Ohio, Pennsylvania, South Carolina, Tennessee, Virginia and West Virginia.

The new England program at University of Massachusetts will follow up an earlier program and will continue the multiplier effect on both labor movement and 77 community action agencies in the six New England states.

Graduates of earlier programs in New England already have established Economic Opportunity Committees in 20 union locals and six central bodies. Through these 26 committees an additional 130 union leaders have been activated, OEO reported.

The training program at the University of Houston will include intensive resident training of 100 union members focused on the understanding of poverty problems unique to the Southwest and Rocky Mountain states, as well as federal projects and the role organized labor plays in getting people out of poverty and into jobs.

U. S., Mexican Labor Act:

Campaign Opens On Border Wages

Mexico City—United States and Mexican labor launched a joint attack here on two problems that are undermining wages and working conditions on both sides of the border.

Plans for the campaign were announced following a meeting of a committee composed of four representatives of the AFL-CIO and an equal number from the Mexican Confederation of Workers (CTM).

One problem involves the effort of the Mexican government to lure U.S. companies to set up branch plants just across the border to take advantage of cheap wages.

The firms then export their products back into the United States under laws that give them a further benefit from U.S. tariff and Mexican tax treatment.

Latest reports show that more than 100 U.S. companies have jumped the border to take advantage of this so-called Mexican "industrialization" program.

The second problem concerns the hiring of Mexican "green carders" by U.S. employers. The "green carders," named from the color of the card issued to them, enter the United States under immigration laws that allow them permanent resident status.

Labor leaders charge that the "green carders," many of whom commute back and forth across the border to avoid higher living costs in the United States, are being used to depress wages and break strikes and organizing drives.

The committee that met here was established by AFL-CIO and CTM leaders in May during a conference of the Joint United States-Mexico Trade Union Committee in Washington, D.C.

Following two days of sessions, the committee's eight members announced "complete identification of purpose" among themselves in seeking solutions to the problems.

"We found ourselves in agreement," a committee statement declared, "that the industrialization of the border should not become a means for the exploitation of workers in either country."

A "working party" of four committee members—two each from the AFL-CIO and CTM—was set up to conduct an "on-the-scene" study of the industrialization program.

The "working party" will submit its findings and recommendations to the committee, and in turn to the AFL-CIO and CTM. A report is expected to be ready for a US-MTUC conference here in September.

The "working party" also will develop ideas on strengthening the minimum wage in Mexico—to take away the appeal given to U.S. runaways.

The committee condemned strikebreaking "in all of its forms and . . . the attitude of employers and government authorities in encouraging strikebreaking."

Strikebreaking in the United States is being abetted by "green carders," the committee declared, calling upon U.S. and Mexican governments to adopt "appropriate measures" to stop the hiring of immigrants in labor disputes.

A U.S. observer to the meeting said the committee had in mind a particular step that could be taken by the U.S. government:

It could act to clarify immigration laws either to require "continuous" residency in the United States by all persons coming in under "permanent resident status" or forbid their employment in labor disputes.

Attending the meeting as U.S. members of the committee were AFL-CIO Vice Presidents Joseph D. Keenan, David Dubinksy and Jacob S. Potofsky. AFL-CIO Vice Pres. Paul Jennings was represented by Vice Pres. William Drohan of the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers.

Keenan and Potofsky were chosen as the U.S. representatives on the four-member "working party."

Serving as advisers to the U.S. committee members were AFL-CIO Inter-American Rep. Andrew C. McLellan; Elizabeth Jager of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Research; Vice Pres. Howard Samuel, Clothing Workers, and Lezare Teper, economist for the Ladies Garment Workers.

The Mexican delegation was led by CTM Gen. Sec. Fidel Velazquez, and Justino Sanchez Madariaga, Jesus Elias Pina, Bernado Cobos and Manuel Pavon.

ADVISORY COMMITTEE on a feasibility study of a proposed AFL-CIO Institute of Labor Studies meets with Dir. Walter G. Davis of the federation's Dept. of Education at AFL-CIO headquarters. Such a study was authorized at the last AFL-CIO convention. The committee will prepare guidelines for the study and help produce a final report to the Executive Council. Besides Davis, members are Rees Hammond, Operating Engineers; John Brumm, Machinists; Glenn Watts, Communications Workers; Helmuth Kern, Meat Cutters; Gus Tyler, Ladies' Garment Workers; Don Stevens, Michigan AFL-CIO; Lawrence Rogin, American University; Professors Herbert Levine, Rutgers, and Fred K. Hoehler, Jr., Michigan State universities; Assistant Dir. Otto Pragan and John Sessions of Davis's staff.

Meany Asks Senators to Repudiate Survey Report Attacking AIFLD

ficial U.S. government policy," Meany said, "then it is impossible as a recommendation applicable to AIFLD because the latter is a voluntary organization, an auxiliary of the AFL-CIO, with management representation in its policy board."

"If this statement is directed at the AIFLD," he added, "it is tantamount to a call for its disavowal by the U.S. government. This attitude towards the relations between the U.S. government and voluntary organizations has no place in our democratic society."

As an "obvious contradiction," Meany noted that the committee print at one point criticized AIFLD because "many Latins view it as an instrument of U.S. government" and in another section recommended more U.S. government control over AIFLD.

Meany attacked an attempt by Dockery to portray AIFLD as being in competition with the Inter-American Regional Organization of Workers (ORIT) in helping to promote economic growth and social justice in Latin America.

Facts Ignored

Ignored, Meany said, is the fact that "the ORIT general secretary and four of the most important Latin American labor leaders are on the AIFLD board of trustees helping to formulate its policy."

"As a matter of fact," Meany continued, "the AIFLD is supported by and in turn lends its complete support to the ORIT and its affiliated organizations."

Similarly, Meany exploded a survey conclusion that AIFLD "has involved the AFL-CIO in some awkward contradictions of its principles that the trade unions should not be tied to political parties."

The facts are, Meany stated, that the AFL-CIO has been working for more than 20 years with organizations like CTM of Mexico, CTP of Peru and CTV of Venezuela "and many other major trade union confederations that have direct ties to political parties."

Furthermore, he said the AFL-CIO has maintained "warm, close relations" with the Trade Union Congress of Great Britain since 1894, and it "is more closely tied with a political party than any free labor national center in Latin America."

"Our only insistence is that the unions with which we cooperate reject all association with or control by totalitarian political parties," Meany emphasized.

Elsewhere, Meany cited other "preconceived and biased viewpoints without any foundation in fact," such as false claims that:

- The U.S. trade union movement is trying to force its philosophy and its methods on the Latin American labor movements.
- The U.S. labor movement is not equipped to work with Latin American labor movements which are more ideologically and politically oriented.
- The AFL-CIO and AIFLD are blindly anti-Communist and equate anti-Communism as such with democratic principles.

Meany contrasted Dockery's attack on AIFLD with a finding by Comptroller General Elmer Staats that the organization represents a "realistic and imaginative approach to some of the major problems of the Western Hemisphere."

After reviewing AIFLD, Staats wrote the subcommittee that "it provides a means whereby the workers of Latin America can participate in the Alliance for Progress and become more active in the economic and social progress in their countries."

Meany told how Dockery had sent AIFLD a questionnaire in connection with his study and "under my instruction" it was answered in detail. "We cannot understand why this study chose not to make use of the reply," Meany said.

He called upon the subcommittee to issue as "a committee print" his letter, AIFLD's reply to the questionnaire and an enclosed detailed AFL-CIO evaluation of the Dockery survey.

The survey is "a great disservice to the American people, the U.S. Senate and the democratic inter-American labor movement which is working hard to overcome misery and poverty in our hemisphere," Meany concluded.

Probe Urged to Check Conglomerates' Power

Atlantic City—A congressional probe of conglomerate corporation mergers and their impact on social and political institutions has been urged here by the executive council of the Textile Workers Union of America.

"The influence wielded by the small group of men at the top of these new industrial pyramids is awesome," the resolution said, with their decisions affecting "the welfare of entire communities and the nation as a whole."

Yet, it added, "their entrenched position permits them to operate with no obligation to consider the interests of workers, the stockholders, or the public at large."

The resolution noted that conglomerate mergers — consolidating of businesses which have no market or product connections with each other—have gobbled up 382 firms with $17 billion in assets in the last five years.

The TWUA executive council also called upon the Federal Trade Commission to determine whether the pending conglomerate merger of the Penn Central railroad system and the Kayser-Roth textile chain is in the public interest.

Noting that 500 TWUA members are locked in a bitter strike at a K-R plant in Dayton, Tenn. because the employer has "illegally" refused to bargain, the council charged that the proposed link has anti-union aspects.

Will it, the union asked, put K-R in a position to "consolidate its resources for additional assaults upon the right of its workers to form and join unions?"

In two other actions, the council:

- Urged the federal government to swifter, more effective enforcement of the Walsh-Healey Public Contracts Act which requires that wages paid on government contract work be up to prevailing minimums in the industry involved.
- Asked for "federal action" to close a tax loophole that permits tax-exempt status for many industrial bonds issued by state and local governments.

This "public subsidy for private profit," which is used to "pirate" industries from other communities, threatens the job security of workers and saddles taxpayers with an unfair tax burden, the council declared.

Report to Urban League:

Apprentice Project Pays Off In Jobs

Apprenticeship openings have been filled by 460 minority-group youths in 12 cities in the past year through the National Urban League's "Learn-Earn-Advance Progress" (LEAP) project, Napoleon Johnson, national director of the program, reported.

The AFL-CIO Dept. of Civil Rights, in cooperation with the Building & Construction Trades Dept., has been assisting the National Urban League in developing "Apprenticeship Outreach" programs in a score of cities.

The Workers Defense League and the A. Philip Randolph Educational Fund, which pioneered in the cooperative effort with the AFL-CIO in placing minority youths in building trades apprentice training, reported last month that 645 had been recruited, tutored, counseled and placed through Apprenticeship Outreach programs in seven cities.

Still other Apprenticeship Outreach projects are being operated through the Opportunity Industrialization Center and local AFL-CIO building trades councils.

AFL-CIO Education Dept. Dir. Walter G. Davis told the convention delegates that "greater participation by Negro trade unionists in the affairs of their unions will have the ultimate effect of strengthening the entire labor movement."

"The AFL-CIO is dedicated to opening the doors to all jobs to all men and women," he said, "and particularly to those in the minority groups who have for so long been denied equal job opportunities. We have had some success. We are not satisfied."

"We will be able to do a better job if the Negroes who are members of unions become deeply involved in the activities of their unions," he said.

Bob McGlotten, Civil Rights Dept. staff representative, told the Urban League delegates that the AFL-CIO wants their organization to become more involved with the labor movement at the local and national levels.

"We need and welcome the Urban League's help in our campaign to bring more effective legislation in the areas of minimum wage, medicare, education, housing and a million public service jobs for the unemployed," he said.

He added that minority group workers will be in heavy demand as the nation's urban development programs, including Model Cities, are accelerated.

Louisiana Pins 'Unfair' Tag On Governor

Baton Rouge, La.—A special convention of the Louisiana State AFL-CIO voted unanimously to brand Gov. John J. McKeithen as "unfair to labor" for his "unwarranted veto" of workmen's compensation improvements passed by the legislature.

A record 1,900 delegates—twice the number who usually attend state conventions—took part in the one-day session. Delegates wore "Sad Friday" buttons and tags, referring to the day McKeithen vetoed the labor-backed bills.

The governor accepted an invitation to defend his action before the convention. The delegates rose out of respect for his office as he entered and left the hall—and listened in icy silence. Not a clap, not a boo.

Then they adopted a blistering resolution of condemnation.

The "unfair" brand will stick, the delegates vowed, until such time as the governor "shall prove that he places the needs of widows, children and injured workers above the greed and indifference of his wealthy friends by signing into law legislation which will guarantee, in every instance, that the benefits provided exceed those contained in the legislation he vetoed."

If this condition is met, the convention said, the "unfair" label can be subsequently lifted.

Humphrey Maintains Wide Nomination Lead

Republican convention showing Thurmond, the 1948 Dixiecrat candidate for President, "walking Mr. Nixon up to the podium."

Humphrey added: "I don't think that makes the 'new Nixon.' I think it sort of comes back to what I would call Mr. Nixon as we all knew him."

A third entrant for the nomination, Sen. George S. McGovern of South Dakota announced his candidacy, and made a strong bid for the support of delegates previously pledged to the slain Sen. Robert F. Kennedy.

Since the assassination, some of the Kennedy supporters have moved into the camp of Sen. Eugene J. McCarthy and others have endorsed Humphrey. The bulk, however, including the 174-member California delegation and a large share of the New York contingent, is still listed as "uncommitted"

As the AFL-CIO News went to press, there was no sign of a firm transfer of Kennedy support to McGovern despite friendly comments by some of the leaders of the uncommitted delegations.

McGovern made it clear that he will support the party's nominee after the convention.

He indicated that he will make a strong effort to influence the Democratic platform towards a twin goal of peace in Viet Nam and high priority to city problems.

Supporters of McCarthy stepped up their efforts to demonstrate strong public support for the Minnesota senator with a nationwide series of rallies including a celebrity-studded gathering at New York's Madison Square Garden addressed by McCarthy.

A possible fourth candidate half-tossed his hat in the ring. Gov. Lester Maddox of Georgia said he will probably enter the race in order to "save the Democratic Party" from "socialism."

But Maddox, who once passed out ax handles in his restaurant to keep Negroes out, is unlikely to pick up more than a scant handful of convention votes.

A United Press Intl. survey less than two weeks before the Democratic convention credited Humphrey with 1,056 of the 1,312 votes needed for nomination. In addition, the news service notes, a number of the delegations now technically pledged to "favorite sons" are expected to end up in the Humphrey column.

The tally showed 428 convention votes for McCarthy, 31 for McGovern—a figure considered certain to grow—and 578 uncommitted and 516 listed under favorite sons.

The party's platform committee was to begin public hearings in Washington Aug. 19 and switch to the Chicago convention site in midweek. AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany was scheduled to present labor's position Aug. 22 in Chicago.

There was an agreement between the principal candidates on a key credentials challenge. Both Humphrey and McCarthy have indicated their support of the "Mississippi Loyalists," a liberal, biracial group which is challenging the Dixiecrat "regular" delegation.

Preliminary tallies indicate that more than 300 Negroes—100 from southern states—will be delegates and alternates at the Democratic convention. This is more than twice the number at the 1964 convention, when the South sent only seven Negro delegates and seven alternates.

There was sharp criticism at the Republican convention of the "lily white" southern delegations and the fact that only 28 of the delegates and 54 alternates were Negro.

Biggest Ever Labor Parade Set For N.Y.

New York—The New York Labor Day parade will be back this year bigger and better than ever.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany will be the grand marshal of the parade, which Pres. Harry Van Arsdale, Jr., of the New York City AFL-CIO says "will be the most exciting parade the city has ever seen."

The parade theme this year will be "Civil Rights, Women, Youth."

The march on Sept. 2 will dramatize organized labor's role in assuring equal opportunity and equal rights for all Americans. It will pledge labor's determination to push toward mending divisions between the American people.

Some 300 parade chairmen from local unions, councils and joint boards took part in a recent planning session.

Thousands of newly-organized workers will be among the participants. This will include representatives of the Taxi Drivers, marching this year for the first time.

A special delegation of the Farm Workers will be on hand to dramatize their appeal for a boycott of the product of struck California grape fields.

Stars of stage and screen, as well as casts of current shows will lead the march. They will then proceed directly from the end of the march to their theaters for the holiday matinees.

The schedule calls for the march to start promptly at 10 a.m. at 26th Street and Fifth Avenue and proceed past the reviewing stand in front of the Public Library at 42nd Street.

Suburbia Wooed by GOP Ticket With Theme on 'Law and Order' would "divide" the GOP. This assurance was credited with holding the bulk of southern delegates in the Nixon camp despite their ideological affinity to California Gov. Ronald Reagan.

It was Nixon's desire for "unity" that led in large part to the choice of Agnew. The Maryland governor, a comparative unknown alongside more dynamic figures like Illinois Sen. Charles H. Percy or New York City Mayor John V. Lindsay, is at least less controversial. He was acceptable to the southern wing of the party and considered inoffensive to other sections.

Agnew's selection did, nevertheless, provoke dismay and a minor revolt among a number of northern, big city, big state Republicans who saw it as a sell-out to the South and abandonment of any attempt to appeal to dissident, liberal Democrats or to Negro voters.

Lindsay refused to let his name be placed in nomination against Nixon's choice and made a "party unity" seconding speech for Agnew. Michigan Gov. George Romney did run against Agnew, but trailed by a big margin.

Oddly, it was the votes of liberal Democrats and Negroes that put Agnew into office as governor when they could not stomach the racist appeal of his Democratic opponent. He supported enactment of a state open housing law and was counted among the GOP liberals as an early advocate of New York Gov. Nelson A. Rockefeller's candidacy.

Rockefeller's indecision, however, led Agnew to shift his backing to Nixon, and he began to take a harder line on civil rights matters. Ultimately, following the Baltimore riots last spring, he alienated moderate Negro leaders in the state—virtually all of whom had supported his election—when he delivered a sharp, public tongue-lashing, accusing them of failing to denounce black extremists.

Negro Republicans greeted the Nixon-Agnew ticket with undisguised disillusion. Former baseball star Jackie Robinson, an adviser to Rockefeller, announced he was resigning from his post and would campaign for the Democrats whether that party nominated Vice Pres. Hubert Humphrey or Minnesota Sen. Eugene McCarthy. And James Farmer, the former leader of CORE, who is running for Congress on the Republican-Liberal slate in Brooklyn, said he could not support the GOP candidates, calling them "a heavy albatross around my neck."

A Negro New Yorker predicted that there would be "more fishermen than black Republican voters in November." And a white Michigan delegate to the convention predicted that the national slate would cost the party three House seats in the state.

For all this, the right-of-center Nixon-Agnew combination was made-to-order for a campaign keyed to a call for "safe streets" and an end to rioting, an issue which is by no means confined to the South.

Nixon, in fact, seems to have accepted the theory, bolstered by a number of polls, that a conservative trend dominates the mood of the country. While his strategy may abandon any appeal for the votes of liberals or minorities in the northern central cities, it places heavy reliance on the "backlash" element of both the cities and the suburbs more than counterbalancing the loss. Many of these votes that might have gone to segregationist, third-party candidate George C. Wallace now have a less repugnant alternative.

Senior Aides Project Opens 400 New Jobs

Four hundred community service jobs in 10 major cities across the country are being opened for unemployed workers over 55 under the Senior Aides program.

The program is operated through an agreement between the Labor Dept. and the National Council of Senior Citizens and is subcontracted to sponsors in each locality.

About 40 persons in each of the 10 cities will be hired by the subcontractor-sponsors to work 20 hours a week at an average of $2 an hour.

The program is being funded through a Labor Dept. grant of $879,520. Sponsors in the 10 cities will provide an additional $116,155.

The Senior Aides will work in a variety of jobs—in hospitals, old age homes, offices, libraries, child day care centers and others. Cities in the program are Buffalo, Chicago, Detroit, Miami, Milwaukee, Minneapolis, New Bedford, Conn.; Pittsburgh, Providence, R.I., and Washington, D.C.

Democrats Urged to Press Attack on Social Problems

Aggression Bares Iron Soviet Fist

American labor condemns the "dastardly armed invasion of Czechoslovakia by the Soviet Union and its satellites," AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany declared.

He termed the aggression a violation "of every principle of human decency" as well as a repudiation of the United Nations Charter and Soviet Russia's own treaty agreements.

Meany stressed that the Czechs posed no military or economic threat to the Soviets and had agreed just two weeks earlier to "conditions laid down by their oppressors."

The AFL-CIO president urged a special session of the UN General Assembly—where the Russians cannot exercise a veto—to bring on the aggressor the judgment of the nations of the world.

Meany added:

"The Soviet action proves, once again, that dictatorial communism cannot tolerate even a small measure of freedom on its borders. It once more gives the lie to those who pretend to believe that communism has changed—that Russia has been liberalized—that there are no more satellites.

"The brutal invasion of Czechoslovakia demonstrates without question the blind fear of the Kremlin rulers that their own people would be contaminated by the existence of free speech and a free press in Czechoslovakia.

"It demonstrates the basic fear

Credentials, Platform Battles Seen:

Humphrey Piles Up Big Lead Towards Party's Nomination

By John M. Barry

Chicago—The Democratic Party headed toward the opening of its national convention with Vice Pres. Humphrey holding a clear and commanding lead over his rivals for the presidential nomination, but with the party embroiled in controversy over credentials and platform.

Humphrey was heavily favored to capture the nomination on the first convention ballot. His campaign coordinator, former Postmaster Gen. Lawrence F. O'Brien, claimed 1,400 solid delegate votes for the Vice President against 1,312 needed for nomination.

Supporters of Humphrey's principal rival, Sen. Eugene J. McCarthy of Minnesota, counterclaimed that O'Brien's figures were inflated.

But independent tallies of delegate commitments and leanings supported the view that the Vice President is within clear striking distance of the nomination. Newsweek magazine, for example, reported that Humphrey could count 1,246 votes a week before the convention was due to open on Aug. 26, against 477¼ for McCarthy and 34½ for latecomer Sen. George McGovern of South Dakota.

Meanwhile, a fourth candidate had entered the picture—Gov. Lester Maddox of Georgia—but he was expected to draw only scattered votes from hard-core segregationists in a few of the southern delegations, including his own.

A first-ballot victory for Humphrey would parallel the overwhelming choice of former Vice Pres. Richard M. Nixon by the Republicans at Miami Beach earlier this month. But that shapes up as the only similarity with the GOP convention, which was carefully stage-managed to submerge disputes and convey the appearance of party unity.

The gathering of the Democrats, in contrast, will be anything but dull.

Party Chairman John M. Bailey, for one thing, already has banned the time-consuming "hoopla" of floor demonstrations on behalf of candidates, acting on the suggestion of Humphrey and McGovern and the assent of McCarthy. And a number of favorite sons have released their delegations to eliminate extended nominating and seconding speeches and save the convention more time.

Even so, there was the expectation of numerous demonstrations outside the International Amphitheater, the convention site, as various anti-war protest groups descended upon Chicago. Gov. Samuel H. Stratton, citing the threat of "tumult, riot, or mob disorder," called some 5,600 National Guard troops to active duty in the city at the request of Mayor Richard J. Daley.

And despite the efforts to streamline the proceedings, party leaders were concerned that floor fights over the platform and the seating of challenged delegations might force the convention into extra sessions, possibly delaying the selection of a nominee until Thursday or Friday.

The tentative schedule called for the usual opening day ceremonies on Monday, including the keynote speech of Sen. Daniel K. Inouye of

Meany Hits Weak GOP Platform

Chicago — The AFL-CIO called on the Democratic Party to spell out a program to solve "the grave problems that now confront the nation and the world" and make the American system "work just as well for the minority as for everyone else."

Federation Pres. George Meany, testifying before the full platform committee at hearings prior to the Democratic national convention, presented labor's detailed recommendations in 46 areas of national concern, with major emphasis on the urban crisis.

Labor's proposals to the Democrats, Meany noted, were the same, "word for word," as those presented to the Republican Party less than a month ago. But, he observed, the AFL-CIO has searched the GOP platform in vain for any evidence that the Republicans were listening.

"We found an abundance of generalities but all too few specifics," he said. "The specifics were sometimes buried among otherwise unexceptionable cliches and when we did find them we didn't like them."

Meany noted that the war in Viet Nam is in the forefront of the nation's concern and reemphasized labor's support for "the American effort to defend the freedom of the South Vietnamese people to run their country as they choose, without interference by force."

The labor movement, he said, respects the right of dissent and the right of petition, having had long experience with them.

But, he continued, "those who oppose the war can direct their

Farm Union Wins Pact At Masson Vineyards

Fresno, Calif.—The AFL-CIO Farm Workers capped a year of organizing and bargaining efforts in Fresno area vineyards by winning a hefty package of benefits in a first contract for the field employes of Paul Masson, Inc., producer of quality table wines and champagnes.

Cesar Chavez, director of the United Farm Workers Organizing Committee signed a three-year agreement raising wages and providing union-won benefits for field crews totaling about 350 at the peak of the harvest season.

It was the latest in a series of agreements won since April 1966, when UFWOC scored its first breakthrough toward union conditions at Schenley Distillers properties.

The new pact provides a pay range of $1.90 to $2.55 an hour, with 10-cent increases in each of the next two years. Piece rate pickers are guaranteed an average of $3.25 an hour.

The contract provides a full union shop and dues checkoff, union hiring hall, paid holidays and vacations.

Workers will be covered by a Special Benefits Fund the union has negotiated with other employers in the industry. The company will pay 10 cents for every hour worked into

Apprentice Excellence Set as Plumbers' Goal

Lafayette, Ind.—The system of apprenticeship is nothing other than a trade union engaging in a special form of education for quality performance.

This point repeatedly was emphasized by Pres. Peter T. Schoemann of the Plumbers & Pipe Fitters, Sen. Ralph W. Yarborough (D-Tex.), Dean Earl L. Butz of Purdue University and other principal speakers during the union's 15th annual apprentice contest and instructor training course at Purdue University here.

The weeklong program was attended by a record 844 plumbing, pipe fitter and sprinkler fitter instructors.

Simultaneously, 120 apprentices from 46 states and six Canadian provinces competed for more than $5,000 cash and additional bonus prizes in the three categories. For the first time in the history of the competition, a Canadian apprentice, Alex R. Logan of Local 170, Vancouver, B.C., won a top prize when he finished first in the sprinkler-fitter contest.

Both at the instructor training program completion ceremony and at the awards banquet, Pres. Schoemann stressed that the very existence of the union depended on the quality of the teachers and the apprentices He urged continued pursuit of excellence as a goal of union craftsmen.

On this same theme, Dean Butz observed that 10 years from now half the information the apprentices and instructors had acquired would be obsolete and useless. In addition, he said that half of the information American craftsmen will need for success in 1978 has not yet been discovered.

The contest winners were awarded prizes by Schoemann and Sec.-Treas. Martin J. Ward.

In the plumber competition, William C. Taylor of Local 98, Detroit, won the $1,000 first prize. James T. Sullivan of Local 130, Chicago, and John F. Duffy, Local 15, Minneapolis, tied for second and each was awarded $500, with the $250 third prize going to Anthony J. Gilsoul of Local 469, Phoenix.

In the steam fitter-pipe fitter category, James J. Clauson of Local 420, Philadelphia, won the $1,000 first prize, James W. Medeiros of Local 393, San Jose, Calif., won the $500 second prize and Eugene W. Terrell of Local 211, Houston, Tex., the $250 third prize.

In the sprinkler-fitter division, Alex R. Logan of Local 170, Vancouver, B.C., became the first Canadian winner and took the $1,000 top prize. Dennis Haffner of Local 183, Milwaukee, won second prize and Jim Dan Lewis won the third prize.

Joseph P Corcoran is director of the union's training department of apprentices and journeymen and the Purdue program is under his supervision.

Labor Support Of Humphrey Voted in Utah

Salt Lake City—National politics and state legislation highlighted the 12th convention of the Utah State AFL-CIO here.

Delegates voted an enthusiastic endorsement of Vice Pres. Hubert H. Humphrey as candidate for president.

Their state legislative program included support for a plan giving uniform sick leave, vacation and living-cost benefits to Utah state employes.

Meeting here in Carpenters Hall, the state body voted new terms in office for Sec.-Treas. Ormond Konkle, of Steelworkers Local 3503, and Vice Pres. A. A. Thon of Meat Cutters Local 637, Ogden.

It re-elected nine vice presidents and chose three new ones to fill vacancies in the southern area—John G. Thornton, Operating Engineers Local 3; Elwyn Petersen, Bricklayers Local 1, and Paul Calton, Steelworkers Local 5236.

State AFL-CIO Pres. C. E. Berger, who presided, has one more year of his current term to serve.

The convention called on all affiliates to give regular financial aid to Los Angeles Herald-Examiner strikers and to join the national boycott against merchants who advertise in the struck Hearst paper.

It also endorsed a state law protecting the rights of Communications Workers and others to refuse overtime work, and saluted Typographical Local 115 here, at 100, the oldest union local in Utah.

Painters Assist Youths in New Training Plan

More than 300 disadvantaged or jobless youth will train with labor cooperation as painter-decorators and paperhangers under a $500,000 on-the-job training contract approved by Sec. of Labor W. Willard Wirtz.

A total of 530 persons will be trained—320 youths selected mainly from apprenticeship preparation projects, and 210 journeymen who need skills upgrading to forestall layoffs.

The contract is with a labor and management committee called the National Joint Painting & Decorating Apprenticeship and Training Committee representing programs in 22 states and the District of Columbia.

The 320 from Apprenticeship Outreach programs, funded by the Dept. of Labor in 36 cities, will be given six weeks of pre-job training before beginning 20 weeks of training on the job.

Outreach programs are the cooperative efforts of labor and civil rights organizations.

The contract will help combat critical skill shortages in the painting and decorating industry, Wirtz said. It will provide unemployed and disadvantaged persons a chance to gain skills through apprenticeship. It will also develop and carry out journeyman training programs necessary to offset skill obsolescence in 80-hour courses.

William Duval, director of education for the Painters, and Glen Craven, executive director of the Painting & Decorating Contractors of America, will supervise the program's administrative staff.

Rail Yardmaster Officer Retires

Chicago—W. A. Snyder, secretary-treasurer of the Railroad Yardmasters for the past six years, has retired for health reasons, Yardmasters Pres. Ralph H. Wachowiak announced here.

The union's executive board has named Vice Pres. Robert J. Culver to fill Snyder's unexpired term until the next convention in 1970.

Snyder started railroading in the West in 1916. He was elected a union vice president in 1958 and secretary-treasurer in 1962. Culver, who also has served the union in varied positions, is a native of Pittston, Pa., who has worked on the Lehigh Valley Railroad.

Sweeps All Offices:

Teacher Convention Elects Selden Slate

By Eugene A. Kelly

Cleveland—The American Federation of Teachers stopped midway in their deliberations at the union's 52nd annual convention here to elect a new slate of officers headed by David Selden, longtime aide to retiring Pres. Charles Cogen. Then they resumed the iob of constructing the "positive program" called for by Selden and his Progressive Caucus to meet the need for improved "teacher power."

Selden defeated two other candidates to lead a clean sweep of all elected top offices for the 21-member AFT Executive Council. The Progressive Party, which swept the field with Cogen two years ago, repeated the feat this year by reelecting 15 vice presidents and seating five new candidates for the enlarged board.

The vote was 1,321 for Selden, 586 for Zeline Richard of the militant New Caucus, and 503 for Edward Bolstad, president of the Minnesota AFT, the candidate of the National Caucus.

Resolution Approved

In a special order of business, the convention after prolonged parliamentary maneuvering strongly approved a resolution condemning Soviet military intervention in Czechoslovakia and calling on the AFL-CIO and "all other lovers of freedom" to join in demanding the immediate withdrawal of Red troops from occupied Prague.

The resolution, introduced by Pres. Israel Kugler of the American Federation of College Teachers, won by a standing vote, 362-123. Two attempts to substitute resolutions condemning both the U.S. for sending troops to Saigon and the Russians for their latest show of force were ruled out of order by Cogen, who was then upheld by standing votes of the delegates.

Still awaiting action by 750 delegates from 138 local unions as the AFL-CIO News went to press were three dozen proposed changes in the constitution, including a per capita dues increase, and nearly 100 resolutions.

In early convention stages one change in the size of the council, from 17 to 21 members, was approved. The delegates voted down a proposal to delete a long-standing constitutional provision that no applicant shall be admitted to membership whose political actions are subject to totalitarian control, such as Fascist, Nazi or Communist." The vote was 407-80 against deleting the requirements.

Two major issues awaiting determination by the convention are future AFT relations with the National Education Association, which admits superintendents and principals into membership, and with the so-called "militants" who demand a more important role in school leadership for leaders of the black community.

Cogen in his farewell address to the delegates reported that since 1964, when he first took office, the AFT has grown from 100,000 members to 165,000 members. Growth of 22,000 during the past year, he said, was the greatest in union history and, if the current rate continues, "we will be pushing the 200,000 mark in 1970."

Predicting more teacher strikes in the future, Cogen said teacher power rests on "responsible militancy, effective organization and just demands." He called for a resurgence and an "active coalition of the liberal, labor and civil rights groups now dormant, battling among themselves, or playing a misguided game of monolithic power-seeking."

Economist Leon H. Keyserling submitted a report, commissioned by the union, calling for a 10-year program keyed to "new and adequate federal legislation" to save public schools which he called "far behind where they ought to be now" and in danger of falling even further behind in the future.

Selden, the incoming president, was a social studies teacher in the Dearborn, Mich., schools when he joined the AFT in 1940. He was an AFT field representative from 1948 to 1953; director of organization for Local 2, then assistant to the president since 1964.

Multi-Trades Project Opened in Kentucky

Cave City, Ky.—Eighty Job Corpsmen are involved in a new multi-trades training program set up through the Kentucky State Building & Construction Trades Council and the National Park Service.

The state building trades body signed a $117,530 contract with the U.S. Dept. of Interior to provide the Jobs Corpsmen with work experience and vocational training in carpentry, cement masonry, laborer crafts, painting and heavy equipment operation and repairs.

It is believed that this is the first time a state building trades council has directly undertaken such a training project.

The training project is being conducted at the Great Onyx Civilian Conservation Center in Mammoth Cave National Park. A combination of classroom and on-the-job training is offered the corpsmen.

Work projects tied to the training program include the rehabilitation and maintenance of existing park facilities and the construction of new structures.

The trainees will assist in the building of cave shelters, boat launching ramps, aluminum bridges, roads and trails, painting of fire towers and other major improvement projects at the national park.

The state building trades council also will seek to place graduates of the program in apprenticeship programs or in fulltime jobs.

The contract for the program, which was signed by Skip Neal of the Kentucky building trades council and John Aubechon of the National Park Service, runs until next June 30. Also involved with the development of the program were William M. Price, regional labor relations officer for the Office of Economic Opportunity, and Sam Ezelle, of the Kentucky AFL-CIO.

Gains Could Ebb Away:

Steelworkers Hear Threat Of Anti-Labor Forces at Polls

By Duane Emme

Chicago—Unity, determination and a collective bargaining process adopted two years ago have brought the Steelworkers "the greatest contracts in our history," Pres. I. W. Abel told the union's 14th convention here.

But if the 1968 elections do not result in a liberal Administration and Congress, he warned, "we stand to lose much of what we have gained at the bargaining table."

The USWA convention was held in the sprawling International Amphitheater, where the Democratic National Convention will nominate its candidates for President and Vice President next week.

Vice Pres. Hubert H. Humphrey, earlier endorsed by the union's executive board for the presidency, received a 20-minute, cheering, whistling, stomping ovation when he appeared to address the 3,500 delegates. (Speech excerpts on Page 7)

Describing his appearance as preliminary to "the big ball game ahead," Humphrey said, "I thought I would come out here to Chicago and get warmed up a bit."

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany voiced labor's intent to "have people elected to Congress and the state legislatures that have concern for the welfare of the great masses of the American people."

In obvious reference to Humphrey, Meany added, "And I think we are going to have a candidate for the office of President . . . who has the same concern."

'Build Not Burn'

Emphasizing that Americans must "build not burn" to solve the nation's problems, Meany said, "let us hold to the faith that we have in this nation, that we have the will and the power to bring the good life to all citizens."

"Don't buy the idea that America is sick," Meany told the delegates. "America is not sick. It can solve its problems."

Trade unionists, particularly, he pointed out, should not lose faith in the American system because it has "brought benefits to workers and their families that are unmatched in the history of any other country."

In an action that followed 90 minutes of debate, the convention by an overwhelming voice vote upheld a constitution committee's "no" report on a proposal to provide "two vice presidents, one a Negro."

A number of Negro delegates contended that the dispersion of Negroes among the various districts makes it impossible for them to attain high elective office.

Abel noted that Negroes currently hold a number of key staff jobs. But he warned against making race a criterion for elective office.

"We have lived long enough without representation," said one Negro delegate. "You must understand that."

Joseph P. Malony, the USWA's vice president, said of the Negroes' desire for top-level representation:

Sympathy Voiced

"I not only understand it but I sympathize with it, but I would urge you to rely on the democratic procedure and follow the election procedure which has served our union so well since its inception.

"Those who seek the creation of an office based on color are wrong in assuming that the officers and members of the executive board represent only the members of their own particular national and racial origins."

In his keynote address, Abel said the union has emerged from collective bargaining challenges in copper, can, aluminum and basic steel with "the best settlements" ever negotiated in these industries.

He noted that the pacts were the first to be negotiated under "industry conference" procedures adopted by the 1966 Steelworkers' convention to give rank-and-file members enlarged authority to negotiate, reject or ratify settlements.

"If any of us had any doubts in 1966, when we established the industry conference plan, I am sure those doubts now have been dispelled," Abel declared.

Abel blasted as "sheer nonsense and pure propaganda" the attempts by editorial writers and others to blame price increases and inflation on the new steel wage gains.

Observing that Steelworkers went from 1962 through four months of 1965 without wage increases, he noted, "But what happened during those years? Did steel prices remain stable? No, of course not. During that period they increased by 4.8 percent."

Abel paid tribute to the other 25 unions that joined the Steelworkers in an 8.5 month strike that preceded the copper settlement. This "show of solidarity more than matched an arrogant industry's attempt to divide and conquer," he said.

In Mainstream

Elsewhere, in stressing the union's active role in AFL-CIO activities, Abel hit at "those who say labor has run out of new ideas." The charges, he said, come from "the mouths of those who don't take the trouble to find out what labor is doing."

The Steelworkers, he said, are dedicated to remaining "in the mainstream" of the labor movement, rather "than to flounder on some beach."

Turning to the need for political action, Abel cited the fact that the convention was being held "on the eve of a critically important national election."

He urged the union's members to realize that "almost every action of Congress has an impact upon your wages, your living standards and the welfare of you and your family."

'Critical Election'

"We must help elect a friendly Administration and a liberal Congress or we stand to lose much of what we have gained at the collective bargaining table," he said.

The officers' report said that the union has added 96,000 new members and 564 new bargaining units over the past two years. Total membership in the United States and Canada now is close to the 1,210,000 peak of 1956.

"As good as this membership gain has been, we are not satisfied," the officers said, pointing to an "accelerated organizing drive that we hope will bring into our union thousands of new members."

The officers said the action of a steelworkers' special convention in March which increased dues to provide a permanent defense fund has made the union "better prepared to withstand future challenges on the bargaining front."

More than 2,500 resolutions covering labor were submitted to the convention for its consideration.

LABOR'S POLITICAL ACTION will be in "high gear" between now and November on behalf of candidates "who are concerned about the welfare of all Americans," AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany told the Steelworkers' convention in Chicago.

Farm Union Wins Pact At Masson Vineyards

the fund, which provides comprehensive health and welfare protection.

Many of the contract provisions deal with benefits and working conditions industrial workers have had for many years—which farm workers are just now achieving through organization.

The Masson firm agreed last February, at a meeting with Chavez and AFL-CIO Dir. of Organization William L. Kircher, to recognize UFWOC and to start contract negotiations with a committee headed by Chavez and Irwin L. DeShetler, national farm labor coordinator for AFL-CIO.

Kircher called it significant that "this kind of progress has been made with one segment of the grape industry while growers of table grapes continue to resist their workers and make it necessary for them to engage in a bitter strike and wage a national boycott against California table grapes."

UFWOC began organizing Masson workers about a year ago. Its negotiating committee included Mack Lyons, Jose Luna, Jose Banueloz Herrera and Taribio Salvado.

The agreement signed Aug. 16 covers hourly and piece rate agricultural employes in Masson vineyards at Gilroy and Soledad, Calif., excluding shop employes at the latter location for whom Distillery Workers Local 186 is bargaining agent.

The contract specifies that all covered employes shall join the union and remain members in good standing as a condition of employment within 30 days of contract signing or after 10 days of hiring. A voluntary checkoff is included.

It binds the employer to call on the union first when he requires any additional employes to perform work covered by the contract.

A health and safety section mandates "adequate toilet facilities in the field, readily accessible to employes" and maintained in a clean and sanitary manner.

The pact also calls for "suitable, wholesome, potable drinking water" with individual paper cups, drinking fountains or spouts provided "reasonably near each place where work is being performed"; adequate first aid supplies, "kept clean and sanitary in a dustproof container," and protective garments where needed," provided, maintained and paid for by the employer . . . and worn and properly safeguarded by the employe."

The union and the company will establish a joint safety committee to meet regularly once a month "to consider practices and rules relating to safety . . . and to make recommendations to local management."

The agreement also establishes the rule of seniority based on length of service, extended from the date of last hire. It provides that in filling vacancies or making promotions, demotions or transfers, recalls from layoff or reclassifications, the employer will give preference to workers with the greatest seniority.

The contract specifies that management will provide "reasonable and necessary time off for relief" at the rate of 15 minutes for each four hours worked.

It also has a clause forbidding discrimination for race, creed, color or national origin; provides funeral leave for regular employes, and protection of job rights during military service.

There are provisions for paid holidays and vacations—short of industrial standards but major achievements for farm field workers. And there is a detailed grievance and arbitration procedure to resolve disputes.

Labor Rallies Support Of Campbell Strikers

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany has called upon all trade unionists to aid 8,000 workers on strike against the Campbell Soup Co. since late July.

"Their struggle merits your full support," Meany said in a letter to presidents of all unions affiliated with the AFL-CIO, as well as all AFL-CIO state and local central body presidents.

"The company's adamant refusal to negotiate a fair and equitable agreement finally forced the Campbell workers to strike," Meany declared, adding:

"The justice of the strikers' demands for equitable wages and proper working conditions and the threat to the American labor movement inherent in the adoption of such an attitude by a firm as prominent as Campbell's should prompt us all to do everything we can to help the striking workers."

The AFL-CIO Executive Council had announced its "complete support" of a "Do Not Buy" campaign against Campbell's products in the event of a strike. This consumer "Do Not Buy" campaign is now in effect.

"I firmly believe, as does the Executive Council, that the American labor movement has a vital stake in the Campbell strike," Meany declared.

The Executive Council, in its May 14 statement, charged that "instead of collective bargaining, Campbell has attempted to use the obsolete and wholly unacceptable tactics of Boulwareism."

Its "take it or leave it" proposals, the council noted, were "admittedly based on Campbell management's unilateral view of what it believes is 'justified' for its employes."

Meany noted that members of the Meat Cutters and the Machinists struck Campbell plants at Camden, N.J., Napoleon, Ohio, and Paris, Tex., "only after the company refused over a period of months to engage in real collective bargaining."

Campbell's products affected by the "Do Not Buy" campaign include the brand names of Campbell soups and foods, Bounty, Franco-American, Pepperidge Farm, Swanson frozen foods and V-8 products.

Time Off Awarded To Help Children

Wisconsin Rapids, Wis.—Office & Professional Employes Local 95 has negotiated a new fringe benefit for a unit of workers at Preway, Inc., stove manufacturing firm.

It permits employes with children in school to take time off to consult teachers about their youngsters' progress, or lack of it; and for accompanying them to clinics and doctors' offices when they go for immunization shots.

Local 95 has 700 members employed by a number of firms in a heavily concentrated white collar area here, OPEIU reported.

City Workers Given Rights In Louisville

Louisville, Ky.—Collective bargaining rights were given public employes by unanimous action of the labor-backed Board of Aldermen. The 12 aldermen passed the resolution despite vigorous objection of Republican Mayor Kenneth A. Schmied.

The main issue was a two-year dispute between the Service Employes' Union and Louisville General Hospital. Although the SEIU was designated as the bargaining agent for hundreds of city employes in all departments, Schmied had refused to negotiate.

The new city law takes labor relations out of the hands of Schmied by setting up a labor committee within the aldermanic board. It also provides for union representation elections.

The aldermen took action after testimony was presented by local and state labor leaders. Appearing before the body were Art Potter, associate director of AFL-CIO Region 9; Tom Bond, international representative of the SEIU, and representatives of the Kentucky AFL-CIO and the Greater Louisville AFL-CIO.

Volunteers from the Painters' Washington, D.C. District Council brush on a new coat of paint at the Loyola-on-the-Potomac Jesuit Retreat House, near the nation's capital. Old paint on the trim of the retreat had been peeling for some time, but its budget didn't allow for repainting. So Pres. S. Frank Raftery of the Painters brought down his entire headquarters staff while Rep. Mike Monroe and District Council Sec. Al Mangum recruited 26 volunteer journeymen and apprentices. The Rev. John M. Daley inspects the work with a smile (lower photo). The paint supplies and rigging were donated by a Washington painting contractor, J. W. Johnson. The paint crew included Pres. Raftery's young son, Pat, who was the water boy.

Meany Asks UN Action:

Labor Condemns Brutal Soviet Attack

and distrust which the Soviet leaders have for their own people.

"This action should end the luxury of confusing hope with judgment that has characterized the thinking of many prominent Americans, who have been advocating political and economic advantages to the Soviets in our dealings with them.

"Despite the obviously political position of Sen. McCarthy, it is our view that Pres. Johnson has very correctly demanded action by the United Nations on this basic violation of international law.

"Our nation should call for a special session of the United Nations General Assembly—where the Soviet Union cannot exercise a veto—so that all nations of the world can clearly express their reaction to the Soviet aggression.

"The free world should not ignore the lesson and implications of this grave hour."

The Int'l. Confederation of Free Trade Unions also urged the United Nations to condemn the invasion and rule that all foreign troops must leave Czechoslovakia.

The appeal—on behalf of 63 million workers in free nations—went to UN Gen. Sec. U Thant in a telegram signed by ICFTU Gen. Sec. Harm G. Buiter.

The telegram expressed "profound horror and indignation" at the invasion "by the Soviet Union and her Polish, Hungarian and East German henchmen."

It also extended ICFTU's "solidarity" with the Czechoslovak people who "again as in Hitler's time are the victims of brutal aggression perpetrated under the most threadbare pretext."

"Events of the last few weeks," ICFTU said, "irrefutably proved that 12 years after Hungary and 15 years after East Berlin, communism has not changed its nature of approach."

Once again, the telegram pointed out, it has been demonstrated that "the Kremlin rulers, prisoners of their own evil system, feel bound to rush in with tanks and guns to stamp out any spark of freedom" in the Soviet orbit.

U Thant, after a series of conferences with UN delegates, issued a statement terming the development "as yet another serious blow to the concepts of international order and morality."

These are concepts, he pointed out, "which form the basis of the charter of the United Nations, and for which the United Nations has been striving all these years."

Pres. Johnson charged that the invasion of Czech soil was "a flat violation" of the UN charter and an act that "shocks the conscience of the world."

He said "the excuses offered by the Soviet Union—that it was invited to come in by Czech "leaders"—were "patently contrived."

"The Czechoslovakian government did not request its allies to interfere in its internal affairs" and no external aggression threatened the Soviets, Johnson emphasized.

"It is a sad commentary on the Communist mind that a sign of liberty in Czechoslovakia is deemed a fundamental threat to the Soviet system," the President added.

All through the world, the reaction was one of shock, dismay and condemnation.

Britain's Prime Minister Harold Wilson called the invasion a "flagrant violation" of "all accepted standards of international behavior." Prime Minister Indira Gandhi of India extended her country's deep sympathy to "the valiant people of Czechoslovakia."

Sweden's government said it was an effort to reimpose a regime which represents "20 years of oppression. Once again it has happened that in a Communist country a liberation movement has been stopped by violence."

Before the invaders overthrew Czechoslovakia's moderate government and jailed its leaders, there was sporadic fighting. As some Hungarians had done in 1956, some Czechs threw themselves in front of the tanks. They hissed, spit and threw stones at the invaders.

Radio Prague went off the air by saying "the end is near" and then playing the Czechoslovak national anthem, "My Homeland."

Proprietor of Fake 'Labor Paper' Indicted on Mail Fraud Charges

Columbus, O.—Anthony B. Pomporeni, proprietor of the "Labor Union Advocate," has been indicted by a federal grand jury here on charges of mail fraud. The action was reported to the Intl. Labor Press Association by L. J. Henry, area postal inspector.

The indictment here follows closely on a similar prosecution in Sarasota, Fla., where an indictment was also entered against Pomporeni, "alias P. J. Kelly, Pale Beasley Moss, Pole B. Moss and Ralph Beasely."

Pomporeni, 49, whose criminal record shows more than 30 arrests dating back to 1931, apparently entered the "labor paper" racket in 1965, after a term in the Florida state prison.

He came to ILPA's attention as "advertising manager" of the "Labor Union Advocate" in Cleveland, Youngstown and Akron, O., claiming to have the endorsement of the respective central bodies and applying for ILPA membership.

Investigation by Stanton Smith, AFL-CIO coordinator of central bodies, and ILPA Secy.-Treas. Kenneth Fiester disclosed that one central body had been offered (and had rejected) $600 for a six-month endorsement; that approaches had been made to some others, and to several local unions, and that the "Advocate" operated in typical boiler-room fashion.

Temporarily discouraged by adverse publicity in Ohio, Pomporeni turned his attention to Florida. Early in 1966 he influenced the Sarasota District Labor Council into a contract which gave him an endorsement for $100 a week. An alert officer of the council who disapproved of the deal wrote to AFL-CIO headquarters about it. Smith invoked the AFL-CIO's rules governing central bodies, and in October the district council broke the contract.

However, Pomporeni continued to publish, switching his editorial line to attack the national AFL-CIO and keeping his boiler-room in full swing. One issue contained 282 ads, including 60 from nine states outside Florida.

Fiester wrote to all identifiable advertisers reciting the record. Florida AFL-CIO officials pressed for Pomporeni's prosecution under a new state statute requiring that any paper using "labor" in its title must actually be sponsored by a union organization. Leaders of AFL-CIO councils in neighboring states, notably Georgia, moved quickly to warn the business community when Pomporeni's operations reached outward.

By mid-1967 the "Labor Advocate" operation in Florida was quiescent, but its Ohio operation was back into high gear. Merchants who advertise in legitimate labor papers in Ohio, Pennsylvania, Indiana and other states were bombarded with phone calls and with invoices for unordered advertising.

Eventually it was the mailed invoice, Pomporeni's favorite device, which brought the indictments. A number of businessmen, responding to ILPA's letter to advertisers, reported their experiences, and subsequently cooperated with the postal authorities.

Clothing Workers Local 'Adopts' a Needy School

New York—Several months ago the chorus of Junior High School No. 99 put on a concert at a meeting of Clothing Workers Local 169.

This was a "thank you" performance for uniforms the local had donated to the school's basketball team. The original uniforms somehow got lost.

One point became very evident as the choristers performed. They had no choir robes.

Thomas Flavell, manager of ACWA Local 169, made note of this and soon had another project rolling to benefit the junior high school in Spanish Harlem.

Like the basketball uniforms, the local's members turned out 100 choir robes on their own time in New York's clothing shops.

Since then, the local has been flooded with letters of thanks from the students, teachers and the chorus.

"I think now we will sing better than ever," wrote one chorus member, "because we will be prouder than ever in our beautiful robes."

"They are worth much more to us than you will ever know," noted another. "We appreciate them even more because we could not afford them."

Music teacher Michael Gordon of JHS 99 said that the thing that makes the difference in the development of the children into responsible citizens is that they find a positive, pleasant recognition of their being.

"In a community such as ours," he noted, "such recognition is difficult for the children to find early enough in their lives for them to build a positive self-image."

"These robes," he continued, "will do more than I could say in helping us give that pleasant recognition to these wonderful children."

USW Wins Election At Revere Copper

Scottsboro, Ala.—Employes of Revere Copper & Brass Co., Inc., here voted overwhelmingly to be represented by the Steelworkers.

Out of 241 votes cast in the National Labor Relations Board election, 213 favored the USW. Negotiations for a contract with the company are expected to begin shortly.

Service Union Rejects Black, White Racism

Chicago—The doctrine of racial separation—whether proclaimed by white segregationists or black nationalists—was firmly rejected by Negro trade unionists at the 16th biennial convention of the Transport Service Employes.

Delegates called on the union's 60 locals to take the lead in community efforts to discourage racial separation in America.

The appeal was contained in a policy resolution adopted by delegates to the union's 16th biennial convention here.

The union originally organized to represent "red caps" and "sky caps" in the railroad and airline industry, has since branched out into a number of other industries.

Pledging the union to attainment "of oneness in American life," the resolution voices a firm belief in the "basic tenets of democracy" expressed in the Constitution and the Bill of Rights.

The welfare of all America, it points out, can be served satisfactorily only when equality of speech, opportunity, and education—along with respect of the dignity of all persons of every race—"becomes the order of the day."

"We believe these ideals must be realized through the subordination of ethnic and nationalized origins to an overall single nationalistic identification—America.

"We believe in the right of protest and the redress of grievances through legal means. We believe this to be the enduring way to democratic goals."

Other resolutions adopted by the convention called for legislative action to provide jobs and extend and improve social welfare programs.

In his keynote address, Pres. George P. Sabattie strongly endorsed the presidential candidacy of Vice Pres. Hubert H. Humphrey as the man who is "best qualified" to lead the nation and "most attuned" to the needs of workers.

The convention paid special tribute to Richard S. Hamme, the union's secretary-treasurer, who has announced his retirement after more than 30 years of service in the labor movement.

Community Services Project:

Labor's Volunteer Network Serves Veterans Hospitals

Pockets of success are popping up throughout the country in the AFL-CIO Dept. of Community Services drive to set up a nationwide network of volunteer service organizations at veterans hospitals.

The idea for labor cooperation in the Veterans Administration Voluntary Service was first put into motion by the Dept. of Community Services in 1966.

A letter was sent to all fulltime CSA staffs urging them to contact VA hospitals in their areas to determine how labor could help in the voluntary service program.

A short time later, James Parke, VAVS director, happened to be at the same banquet table with Harry Van Arsdale Jr., president of the New York City Taxi Drivers and the City AFL-CIO.

Parke told Van Arsdale about the problem of providing transportation for volunteers of the VA Bedside Network, an organization of volunteers from the entertainment and communications industries who help produce shows in which the patients are cast.

The Taxi Drivers responded by offering to provide a driver and his private car to transport the show people and technicians to and from VA hospitals in the New York City area.

The cabbies even got into the act by helping operate tape recorders and by participating in other phases of the productions. They became regulars on the Bedside Network team, along with the actors, actresses, musicians and directors.

Bedside Network volunteers act as production technicians and supporting actors in the taping of dramatic or musical programs while the veterans star. The programs are then played back over closed circuit television systems in the hospitals.

Chicago Has Program

A similar program with the Chicago cab drivers assisting the Bedside Network in that city has been set up through the Dept. of Community Services.

However, these Bedside Network operations are only a minor part of the VAVS programs, points out Ray Andrus of the Community Services staff. He noted that a wide variety of services are provided by VA volunteers, requiring both men and women.

The aim of the department is to develop the volunteer service organizations through state AFL-CIO staffs and central labor bodies in all areas where VA hospitals are located.

To Work With VA

With these organizations, volunteers will be recruited from union locals to work directly with the VA hospitals and the patients. Response to the programs has come from Buffalo, N.Y.; Ft. Wayne, Ind.; Falls River, Mass.; Birmingham, Ala., and Chicago.

The Veterans Administration has intensified its efforts in expanding the VAVS programs as the influx of patients climbs because of the Viet Nam war.

Particular emphasis is being put on the recruiting of male volunteers to aid in recreation and rehabilitation programs at the hospitals.

Florida Dispute Settled After Striker Is Killed

Jacksonville, Fla.—The slaying of a striker by a company supervisor on a downtown street brought such a public outcry that Mayor Hans Tanzler stepped in to help settle a strike of 275 members of the Retail, Wholesale & Dept. Store Union against Royal Services, a building maintenance firm.

The janitorial workers had been on strike for three days when a shotgun blast killed striker Thomas Felix, father of seven children. He was standing near strike headquarters when the shot was fired from a company station wagon full of strikebreakers. The accused killer is in jail awaiting trial on a homicide charge.

Local 589 won a National Labor Relations Board election among employes last December and by June had reached agreement with the company on every issue except wages. Members on June 25 staged a one-day stoppage and picketed City Hall, one of two public buildings cleaned by Royal employes under a maintenance contract.

When Royal refused to budge on wages, though most employes were earning only $1.60 an hour, the federal wage minimum, the workers put up picket lines Aug. 5 at 10 of the buildings Royal cleans in downtown Jacksonville.

The company began bringing in strikebreakers and some of them were in a car which stopped for a traffic light late one night near the union office. When some of the strikers shouted at the strikebreakers, the driver reportedly fired a shotgun blast at the crowd, killing Felix.

When the RWDSU called on civil rights and community leaders to join in demonstration marches, the mayor returned from an out-of-town trip and brought the parties together with the aid of a federal mediator.

A memorial service for the slain unionist was held at Grant A.M.E. Church, followed by funeral services at Abyssinian Baptist Church. Mourners included RWDSU Pres. Max Greenberg; the Rev. Dr. A. D. King of the Southern Christian Leadership Conference, brother of the late Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr., and Southern Area Dir. E. T. Kehrer of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Civil Rights.

Contract agreement was reached the following day. It provides wage increases of 10 cents an hour, six paid holidays, a dues deduction system, arbitration, coffee breaks, jury duty pay, time off for voting, and an improved vacation schedule.

Felix held another job and had worked at Royal part time for five years to help support his family.

Candians Sour On Struck Grapes

Ottawa, Ont.—The Canadian Labor Congress made a $1,000 grant—the second in three years—to striking California farm workers and called on members across Canada to "withhold their patronage from grapes" produced under conditions of semi-slavery.

CLC Pres. Donald MacDonald urged all members to rally public opinion to "end the disgraceful conditions" which impelled the United Farm Workers Organizing Committee to strike for a living wage.

Rudy Ahumada, a grape striker, told the CLC executive council that he and his wife work from sun-up to sundown in the growing season for $45 to $50 a week in temperatures up to 115 degrees.

Trades Train Prisoners Into Skilled Journeymen

Tacoma, Wash.—There may be fewer repeaters at the nearby McNeil Island federal penitentiary if a four-year-old apprenticeship training program for prisoners does what its sponsors expect it to do.

The program for skilled trade training at the island has advantages over other prison training programs in that it represents:

- The first time a manpower training program of the kind has drawn the cooperation of both management and labor from "outside."
- The first prison program to meet training standards set by private industry.
- The first time a formal apprenticeship program has been conducted in prison.
- The first time a prisoner can learn an advanced skill and have a stable job waiting when he leaves.

A new Labor Dept. pamphlet, Training in Prison, reports that 90 of the 1,080 inmates here are taking formal training in 12 skilled trades categories that take anywhere from three to five years to learn. A dozen unions are cooperating in the program.

Based on job demands in the Tacoma area, the apprentices are enrolled in such trades as auto diesel mechanics, baker, cabinetmaker and millman, cook, electrician, lineman, machinist, painter, plumber, silk-screen printer, upholsterer.

Some of those under training are serving terms for crimes including bank robbery, drug law violations and auto theft. Their chances of rehabilitation are improved if they have a skill and can go to a responsible job after serving their term, prison authorities point out.

The McNeil Island program is being administered by prison officials, the Dept. of Labor's Bureau of Apprenticeship & Training, and the Multi-Trades Joint Apprenticeship Training Committee consisting of 12 management and 12 union representatives.

So successful has the program been that BAT staff members are meeting with prison officials elsewhere to develop similar programs, the Labor Dept. said.

The island program won registration this year as the first prison apprentice training plan registered with the Labor Dept. under the minimum quality standards of training recommended by the secretary of labor.

Four Rail Unions Agree On Plans for Merger

Hot Springs, Ark.—Four of the major operating railroad unions have reached agreement on a plan aimed at unifying them into a single union.

The plan is the result of nine months of work and deliberations by principal officers and committees of the Conductors & Brakemen, Locomotive Firemen & Enginemen, Railroad Trainmen and the Switchmen's Union. It will now be submitted to the governing bodies of each of the unions after which the rank and file members will give final approval.

Announcement of the "historic unity plan" was made by the chief executives of the unions—Clyde F. Lane, ORC&B; H. E. Gilbert, BLF&E; Charles Luna, BRT; and Neil P. Speirs, SUNA.

"We are confident that the members of each of these proud old unions will support overwhelmingly the actions we have taken here," the chiefs said.

They also unveiled for the first time the name of the proposed new union. It will be known as the United Transportation Union.

Times Demand It

Noting that the four unions involved in the unique effort "are four of the oldest unions in existence," the chiefs said, "technological advances demand that we keep pace with the times and this action and its anticipated results will put our members in a position to share more adequately the increased fruits of their productivity."

The four union spokesmen said that while the UTU would be a strong singular body with the strength that comes from unified effort, the four crafts will continue to play autonomous roles within the framework of the new union.

"We have," they said, "preserved one of the sacred principles of craft unionism while molding together an organization geared to meet the challenges of the growing giants in our industry."

The union officials said that while no "minute-by-minute" timetable exists for final consummation of the merger, they indicated the target date would be Jan. 1, 1969. The UTU with more than 250,000 members will be the largest union made up chiefly of railroad workers. Plans call for a single headquarters for the new organization.

The chiefs emphasized that the growing trend toward "huge rail empires created by wholesale mergers is a strong motivation for unity of the craft unions" but they said economics—the cost of operating small independent unions—was also responsible for bringing about the unity movement.

IAM Contract Ends Strike In Ontario

Malton, Ont.—A six-week strike against Orenda, Ltd., by 1,200 members of Machinists Local 717 ended here on an agreement for a three-year contract with wage increases expected to average 86 cents an hour plus improved fringe benefits.

The guaranteed wage increase over the contract period averages 70 cents an hour. But workers will receive an additional 16 cents an hour, under a revised formula, if the cost of living continues to rise at its present rate.

Orenda is 40 percent owned by United Aircraft Corp.

IAM Vice Pres. Mike Rygus credited "the solidarity and militancy of the membership" in the strike for winning "one of the best settlements in the aerospace industry."

Wage increases averaging 35.6 cents an hour in the first year are retroactive to June 1. The gains range from 30 cents to 48 cents an hour.

Effective next June 1, all employes will receive 17 cents more an hour and additional 17 cents will go to all workers on June 1, 1970.

Other features in the contract include:

- Incorporation of the old cost of living bonus of 45 cents an hour into the base rate.
- Premiums raised from 15 cents to 18 cents an hour for second shifts and from 20 cents to 24 cents for third shifts.
- Layoff benefits doubled from $20 to $40 with a maximum of 13 weeks.
- Allowance for the cost of drugs under the health plan raised from $100 to $150.
- Weekly indemnity raised $20 a week and extended from 26 to 39 weeks.
- Pensions improved with back service credits increased from a 10-year maximum to 15.

The new 38-month contract will expire July 31, 1971 to coincide with expiration dates of major aerospace pacts in the United States.

Pull for Progress

THE LEVERS YOU PULL in the voting booth this November can move this nation forward or backwards.

One lever, of course, registers the voter's choice for President and Vice President of the United States—the free world's most important political offices.

In an era of recurring crisis, at home and abroad, Americans look to the President for leadership and action.

Over the years, we have been fortunate in our national leaders—men of ability and integrity, who have grown with the heavy responsibility of their office.

But the powers of the presidency have their limits—as every one of our recent presidents discovered—and that's why the other levers in the voting booth are so important.

A recalcitrant Congress can ignore, dilute or distort the legislative program submitted by the President. It can—for better or worse—substitute its own judgment of the nation's needs and solutions.

IT IS NO ACCIDENT that much of the labor-backed, social legislation of the modern era has come about in two spurts.

One was during the New Deal era, which brought us such historic beginnings as the National Labor Relations Act, social security, the Wage-Hour Act, and the concept that the government has an obligation to provide work for the jobless if private industry is unable to do so.

The other spurt came after the 1964 election, when Americans not only overwhelmingly elected Pres. Johnson but gave him the liberal 89th Congress.

Medicare, aid to education, broadened civil rights, anti-poverty programs and a massive investment in health facilities were among the products of that Congress.

But in 1966, millions of Americans "couldn't be bothered" to register and vote—and the 90th Congress saw a return of the conservative coalition to control of the House.

IT IS ALWAYS RISKY to anticipate the political situation some months ahead. But the present outlook is for a close presidential race, which would mean that few candidates for the House or Senate can expect to ride into office on the coattails of their party's standard-bearer.

Except in the minority of "safe" Democratic or Republican districts—and the number of such districts has diminished over the years—each contest will stand on its own merits. The extra work, the extra effort, in reaching the voters could result in the election or re-election of a congressman whose vote will tip the balance on an issue of importance to labor and the nation.

For those candidates whose record has earned labor's endorsement, that extra effort must be made. The record of past years is that an aroused labor movement, whose members turn out to vote—and take the trouble to pull all the levers—can be the decisive influence in a close election.

It is more than a catch phrase that the gains won at the bargaining table can be lost in the legislative halls. We know from experience that this is a fact.

American Education Upgraded In Last Decade by NDEA Funds

WITH A TINY MOON manufactured in the Soviet Union whirling overhead at 18,000 miles-per-hour, senators and representatives passed the National Defense Education Act in September 1958.

Sen. Lyndon B. Johnson reflected the apprehensive mood of his colleagues in Congress when he said, ". . . We must take advantage of time, money, energy, imagination, and everything else available to us and devote them to our educational system . . ."

In its 10-year history, NDEA has provided a federal investment of nearly $3 billion to buttress the nation's education enterprise from kindergarten through graduate schools. These funds have aided such diverse supportive activities as loans to college students; strengthening instruction in critical subjects; expansion of guidance, counseling, and testing; improvement of communications media for educational purposes; teacher-training institutes; foreign language and area centers, and development of state educational statistical services.

More than 1.5 million needy students have borrowed over $1.3 billion in low-interest loans to help finance their education at colleges, universities, business schools, or technical institutes. During the past school year $245 million was made available to about 405,000 students through 1,730 institutions throughout the nation.

More than $500 million has been paid to states and outlying areas on a 50-50 matching basis for improving instruction in certain "critical" subjects taught in public elementary and secondary schools. Subjects include science, mathematics, modern foreign languages, history, civics, geography, economics, English, reading, and industrial arts. In addition to funds for public schools, almost 400 loans totaling nearly $6 million have been made to private elementary and secondary schools.

Nearly 27,000 fellowships have been awarded to graduate students who intend to be college or university teachers. Nearly $356 million has been obligated for stipends, allowances, and support of participating graduate schools.

STATES HAVE RECEIVED grants of more than $168 million to help bring the number of high school counselors from 12,000 to 44,000 full-time equivalent counselors in public schools from kindergarten through junior college. In 10 years 260 million scholastic aptitude and achievement tests were given to public school students and over 11.5 million tests to nonpublic students.

By the end of the 1968-69 school year, more than 22,000 counselors and teachers preparing to be counselors will have attended 703 institutes to improve their qualifications. Cost of the program was about $66 million.

More than $27 million has been made available to 106 language and area centers at 63 colleges and universities for instruction in more than 90 foreign languages and cultures. More than 10,000 fellowships worth about $34.5 million have been awarded to advanced students and college teachers for language and area studies.

Over $24 million has been obligated to universities and educational organizations for 484 foreign language research and development projects.

More than $40 million has stimulated research and experimentation in the educational potential of new media (television, motion pictures, radio, computers) and printed materials, and to disseminate information about new developments in the use of these media. Over 700 projects were supported.

About 85,000 new technicians have completed preparatory training in various job areas. Between 1959 and 1967 the number of participating institutions increased from 262 to nearly 1,100. The federal contribution to the program has been almost $100 million.

The National Science Foundation has made available more than $90 million to improve the dissemination of scientific information and to develop new or better ways for communicating scientific data. More than 1,500 awards have been made to institutions and organizations concerned with scientific information.

By the end of this year, more than 100,000 teachers and other educational personnel will have attended almost 2,500 institutes for advanced study. Over $155 million has been invested in this enterprise.

Approximately $12.7 million has been paid to the states and outlying areas to improve and expand their statistical services in education. The number of state education agencies using data processing equipment for statistics has increased from 13 in 1959 to 53.

'Clear It With Strom':

Humphrey Raps Thurmond Role In Birth of New 'Nixiecrat' Party

Following are excerpts from Vice Pres. Humphrey's speech to the Steelworkers convention in Chicago:

YOU SAW what happened down at Miami Beach at the Republican convention. When that man of yesterday, from the midnight of the South, Strom Thurmond, escorted Nixon to the podium. You saw the birth, not of a new Nixon but of a new party—the Nixiecrats.

When it came to picking Nixon's running mate, who dictated the choice?

It was the man who in 1948—when I stood before the Democratic convention and asked the Democratic Party to walk into the bright sunlight of human rights—got up and walked out with the Dixiecrats.

Listen, if you can clear the second-highest office of the land with Mr. Dixiecrat, what else is there to be cleared. Secretary of State? Secretary of Labor? Attorney General? The Supreme Court? Foreign policy? Civil rights policy?

You know, I read some wonderful fiction in the Republican platform.

The Nixiecrats promised to attack the causes of poverty. But they forgot to tell you that the Republicans in Congress voted to kill the war on poverty program.

And they promised they were going to rebuild America's cities. But when the roll was called, when the contract was to be negotiated, they voted 89 percent against model cities.

It's like management saying they would like to see you live well, but no new contract. I think what this country needs is a new contract—for the millions and millions of working people and the millions who do not have a job, so that they can have a better standard of living and a better home and a better place in which to raise their families.

And that's why I'm coming back to Chicago next week to wage a fight. If you will stick with me and stand with me, I will stick with you and stand with you.

As the young people say. I want you to get with it. I want you to go out and do your job of registration. I want you to have the strength of a giant and the conviction of a saint, because you are going to fight now against a coalition of reaction and conservatism.

We don't want to win just an election. We want to build a better country.

This is serious business. This isn't just a matter of being opposed to a man. It is not just a matter of being opposed to a party.

Our problems are tremendous. The problems of urbanization, the problems of deprivation, the ghettos and the slums, the race relationship problem in our country, the problems of automation and its impact upon workers and industry. There are tremendous difficulties in this world, a world beset with tension, a world in which war still persits; and whoever is the President of the United States in these next four years will be faced with these problems.

I don't mean to stand idly by while poverty and discrimination and urban decay and hunger plague this land.

I remember when John Kennedy said, "Let's get this country moving again." I remember that when the assassin's bullet took his life that Lyndon Johnson, who became President, went before the Congress of the United States and said, "Let us continue the work that has just begun."

If I'm permitted to be your President, I shall not only seek to keep America moving again, I shall not only seek to continue what we started; I shall seek to take this country to higher ground and a better day than we have ever had before.

And all that we seek to do depends on a strong and a growing economy. We have been building that economy. We have been building it together. We have improved education. We have improved our health services. For the first time this government has taken an interest in the consumers.

I KNOW you constantly hear what we haven't done. But if we have done nothing else than bring medicare to our senior citizens, we would deserve at least one or two thank you's from our fellow citizens.

But we can't improve this country, we can't rebuild our cities, we can't educate our children, we can't clean up the pollution which contaminates these Great Lakes and the rivers, we can't improve our police forces—unless we have a strong economy.

Now our Republican friends had eight years and they produced three recessions because they ignored the urgent domestic needs of our nation. I say to you that we can't afford to do that.

We are going to build. But to do these things, my friends, depends on having a more peaceful world, and to achieve peace as fast as it is humanly possible with honor and with security in Viet Nam.

I don't stand before you today to tell you every detail of how this war can be brought to an end. I only tell you this, that no people in the world are more interested in peace and stopping the killing of our own men and of others than the President of the United States, the Vice President of the United States, and those who are responsible for policy in this country.

Labor Economist Notes:

Profit-Rich Firms Pass Blame Of Price Spiral Onto Unions

ORGANIZED LABOR'S top economist has charged that many industries have been "profiteering on wage increases" while, at the same time, they were trying to blame unions for price hikes.

Per-unit labor costs actually fell between 1960 and 1966, but both the prices of those products and the profits on their manufacture and sale rose sharply, said Nathaniel Goldfinger, director of AFL-CIO Dept. of Research.

The labor economist said that when compared to prices and profits, workers' wages have risen very slowly since 1960, and the buying power of wages has risen even less. He said that the situation today "clearly pictures a lack of balance" in the economy, with "skyrocketing profits'—up 84 percent since 1960—"soaring dividends"—up 73 percent since 1960—while workers' earnings rose only 27 percent and buying power only 10 percent.

Goldfinger appeared on Labor News Conference, an AFL-CIO produced public affairs interview, broadcast Tuesdays at 7:35 p.m., EDT, on the Mutual Radio Network.

GOLDFINGER SAID he agreed with Peter L. Bernstein, president of a New York investment counselling service, who was reported recently by the Wall Street Journal as saying: "The pattern is clear enough. Instead of labor costs pushing price up, what we see instead is a sort of profits push. Profits are already well on their way up before prices begin to rise, and prices are well on their way up before wages begin to rise faster than output."

Goldfinger declared that the "crucial factors" in the current economic imbalance are "profit inflation and the attempts of the companies to push prices up to increase the profits on each item of goods sold—to charge as much as the traffic will bear."

"The entire country would benefit from better relationships between profits and wages . . . a more or less equal upward movement of workers' wages and buying power of consumers on the one hand, and business profits on the other," he declared. He emphasized that unless consumer buying power moves at an equal pace, "consumers will not have enough purchasing power to buy what the economy can produce."

Reporters interviewing Goldfinger were Sam Sharkey, labor specialist for the Newhouse newspapers, and Harry Conn, editor of Press Associates, Inc.

By Press Associates, Inc.

WHEN HOUSE MINORITY LEADER Gerald Ford of Michigan accepted the post of permanent chairman of the Republican convention in Miami Beach, he recounted—for the delegates—the Republican record in the 89th and 90th Congresses.

He stressed how Republican members of Congress had been in the forefront of the fight for meeting the urban crisis, against poverty, against crime, for education, against discrimination, for housing and for a whole host of other social and economic programs of social reform.

Not as a matter of partisanship, but essentially to set the record straight. Ford's claims should be analyzed in some detail.

One of the most vital measures before the Congress in the area of the urban crisis and in housing, was on the bill which created the cabinet-level Dept. of Housing & Urban Affairs. This brought together and coordinated the work of a multitude of overlapping federal agencies.

The roll call vote on this bill in the House shows that on June 16, 1965 96 percent of the Republicans voted against it, and 66 percent of the Senate Republicans opposed final passage on Aug. 11, 1965.

On April 27, 1966 84 percent of the Senate Republicans voted to cut all rent supplement funds for fiscal 1966. On May 10, 1966 95 percent of the House Republicans voted to cut $22 million for rent supplements in fiscal 1967.

Another vital program sets up model or demonstration cities to fundamentally meet the ghetto problem. Yet, on Oct. 14, 1966, 95 percent of the House Republicans voted to kill the entire measure and later voted to slash funds for model cities.

Senate Republicans, 63 percent of them, also voted to slash model cities funds for projects in 1968 and 1969.

Probably one of the most publicized Republican gambits was to poke fun at a proposed $40 million to help control and exterminate rats. No less than 87 percent of the House Republicans opposed the proposal. It was blocked until it later passed as an amendment to another bill.

Republicans did have a better record on final passage of the omnibus 1968 housing bill but the measure was approved only after numerous crippling amendments, advanced by Republicans and Dixiecrats, were defeated.

THE REPUBLICAN PLATFORM of 1968 declared that "we must attack the root causes of poverty and eradicate racism, hatred and violence."

What 90 percent of the House Republicans did on Aug. 19, 1965 was to vote to kill a bill to authorize funds for the Economic Opportunity Act which embodied the basic programs for giving the poor the opportunity to better themselves through education, work training, legal aid, etc. A total of 69 percent of the Senate Republicans voted against final passage of the measure.

The vast majority of Republicans, too, voted against requiring states to contribute to aid to dependent children even when there is an unemployed father at home, against providing funds for Operation Head Start, against banning discrimination in the sale or rent of housing.

Dealing directly with hunger, 81 percent of House Republicans voted to limit the food stamp program for the poor to $245 million in fiscal 1969 rather than to provide the appropriations as needed.

If the Republicans are going to make an issue of crime this year they will have to explain their vote in April when 95 percent of House Republicans opposed the creation of a special agency to deal on a nationwide basis with the alarming growth of traffic in narcotics; in February when 55 percent of House Republicans voted against incentive pay for Washington police officers who complete college-level courses in law enforcement and the 62 percent of House Republicans who voted in July to exempt shotgun, rifle and .22 caliber rim fire ammunition from restrictions on interstate sale.

MANY INDUSTRIES have been "profiteering on wage increases" while trying to fix blame for price hikes on unions, AFL-CIO Research Dir. Nathaniel Goldfinger (center), charged on Labor News Conference. Interviewing him were Harry Conn (left) of Press Associates, Inc., and Sam Sharkey of the Newhouse Newspapers. The AFL-CIO public service interview is broadcast Tuesdays at 7:35 p.m., (EDT), on Mutual Radio.

How to Buy:

Magazine Publishers Team Up Against Consumer Legislation

By Sidney Margolius

YOU KNOW WHAT'S GOING to happen if the government passes consumer protection laws? If you believe a series of warnings being published in magazines around the country, you'll be limited to just four or five varieties of canned soup, three shades of lipstick, four kinds of cake mix, all women will have to dye their hair the same shade of blonde, and kids won't be able to buy crunchy peanut butter. We also may have to go back to model A Fords.

The mean old consumerists who want grades and standards for consumer goods, also will want to take away the ribbon Mary Murphy wears in her hair, because hair bows aren't really necessary.

These ominous cautions are being published by the Magazine Publishers Association. This is their way of warning the public what life will be like if grades and standards for consumer goods, now in existence on a few products, become more widespread.

The publishers' ads warn, for example, that if the social critics have their way, the government may standardize olives so that "Mary Smith" (that's you) will be able to choose from among only four kinds, instead of 17 as at present.

You probably already have seen some of these ads. If they were not so distorted and insinuating, they might be merely ludicrous. But the publishers have gone all out on behalf of their advertisers.

Actually, the advertisers and publishers are needlessly scaring themselves with their exaggerated fears of "grades." Most poultry, for example, is now graded according to U. S. Agriculture Dept. standards. When you buy a chicken labeled "U.S. Grade A" you can be sure that it meets an impartial standard for proportion of meat to bone; the amount of "finish" or fat in and under the skin, and absence of defects such as cuts, tears and bruises.

Some long-established products are not "graded" but must meet government standards of identity; margarine, jams and jellies, and mayonnaise, for example.

This does not mean that "Mary Smith" now has only four different brands of margarine to choose from. Actually we counted 18 different brands just in one locality. These are sold in different forms such as stick, soft, whipped, etc. So Mary can choose from over 30 different brands and types, and can pay anywhere from 19 cents to as much as 47 cents a pound.

AMERICAN CONSUMERS are not really asking for standardized products like the publishers believe. They merely want more information about the products.

What consumers are complaining about, is that there are many new products on the market for which neither standards of identity nor grades have been established. One of the most notorious complaints has been the frozen fruit pies which show a picture of a pie chockful of cherries. But when you cut into the pie you find a lot less fruit than you expected.

In some cases consumers feel that even where there are government grades, sometimes these are a confusing number and the names are deceptive. The reason the magazine publishers are specifically defending the right of Americans to select from "17 different kinds of olives" is that the official size grades have been criticized.

For example, when you see olives labeled as "Large," don't believe it. "Large" is merely the middle of 10 official sizes. Larger than "Large" are Mammoth, Giant, Jumbo, Colossal and Super Colossal. Smaller than Large are Sub-Petite, Midget, Small and Medium.

Even professional buyers find it difficult to buy foods nowadays without official specifications. Adelaide Neily, director of the Fairfax, Va., school lunch program, told the USDA Consumer & Marketing Service that she had grown tired of spending valuable time haggling with suppliers over meat prices, sizes and quality.

Curiously, when businessmen buy raw materials they themselves insist on using official grades and standards. Cereal manufacturers don't order stuff called "Jets," "Kix," etc. They contract to buy corn, wheat, rice, etc. of specified grade and quality.

Publishers themselves specify grade and quality when they buy paper and other printing supplies.

A GOLDEN ANNIVERSARY Medallion is presented to AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany by American Legion National Commander William E. Galbraith, left. Meany received the medallion upon being appointed to the American Legion 50th Anniversary Committee of One Hundred which is headed by former Presidents Harry S Truman and Dwight D. Eisenhower. The Legion will celebrate its half-century anniversary from September 1968 through 1969.

112,000 Killed in '67:

Accidents Down 1%, But Death Toll High

ACCIDENTS OF ALL KINDS killed 112,000 Americans in 1967, a decrease of 1 percent from 1966, the National Safety Council reports in its 1968 edition of "Accident Facts."

In spite of the reduction, accidents remained the leading cause of death among persons aged 1 to 37 and ranked fourth for persons of all ages.

The 96-page "Accident Facts" gives numbers, costs, and analyses of the four major classes of accidents: Motor vehicle, work, home, and public mishaps. According to the booklet, the most fatalities, 53,100, occurred in motor vehicle accidents last year. This was an increase in highway deaths of less than .5 percent over 1966.

The second highest number, accidental deaths at home, dropped 3 percent and totalled 28,500.

THE MOST COMMON manner in which a person was killed around the home was by falls—on stairs, ladders, roofs, and sidewalks. Some 11,700 persons were killed in this way last year. Almost 8,000 of these deaths were in the 75 and older age class.

The second most common kind of accidental death was from fires, burns and other deaths associated with home fires. More than 6,200 persons were killed in fires by being asphyxiated, by falling, or by being struck by a falling object. Some 1,600 of those deaths were in the 45-64 age bracket.

Home deaths by firearms, one of the most controversial areas of discussion today, totalled more than 1,500 last year, with more than 500 of these being in the 15-24 age bracket. This does not include gun accidents while hunting or target range shooting, but only those which occurred at home while cleaning or playing with guns.

In 1967, 10.8 million persons suffered disabling injuries in accidents. Unlike fatality figures, most disabling injuries, 4.3 million, occurred at home.

In spite of decreases in deaths, the cost of accidents rose to $21.3 billion in 1967 from $20 billion the previous year. These costs included wage losses, medical fees, insurance administrative and claim settlement costs, and property damage.

The 1968 edition has several new sections including an article on motor vehicle accidents in industry, which cause about one out of five work deaths and one out of 20 work injuries.

Single copies of the booklet are available for $2.40 from the National Safety Council, 425 N. Michigan Ave., Chicago, Ill. 60611. Discounts are available on orders of 10 or more.

Soup to Nonsense:

Stores Shun Shoppers Seeking Summertime Styles in Summer

By Jane Goodsell

THE OTHER NIGHT—it was 11 o'clock and the thermometer registered 81 degrees—I picked up a new magazine and came across an advertisement for . . . Christmas cards. Yes, I realize that Christmas will be here before we know it. But even so, I think summer is a bit early to start thinking about avoiding the last minute rush.

That's what I think, but I must be wrong. Timewise, I'm way out of step. When I wrap a hunk of watermelon rind in a sheet of newspaper that proclaims, "NOW's the time to shop for a fur coat!" I feel like one of those characters in space movies who find themselves catapulted onto another planet and into a future dimension in time. If now's the time to buy a fur coat, what am I doing with a watermelon?

Last week I went shopping for a new bathing suit. When I got off the elevator in Ladies' Sportswear, I found myself surrounded by Shetland sweaters and Donegal tweed skirts.

Hailing a salesclerk, I inquired where I might find the bathing suits. She looked at me blankly. "Bathing suits?" she repeated, making it sound as though I'd asked where they kept the opera cloaks. "Oh, I'm afraid we haven't any left. We had a clearance sale on them right after the 4th of July to make room for the new fall merchandise."

A TRULY WELL-ADJUSTED individual wouldn't have stood there, as I did, muttering to herself. She'd have seized the opportunity to pick up a nice sweater and skirt right then and there, when stocks were complete. But, like the giddy grasshopper in the fable, I lack the foresight to spend a sweltering midsummer day laying in supplies for the winter. I simply haven't the heart—or the strength—to shrug myself in and out of wool and cashmere when the asphalt is melting and the sidewalks are hot enough to fry eggs. And I don't care if the store is air-conditioned.

Oh, I know, I know. Months from now I'll curse myself for my improvidence. Come November, I'll go shopping for a nice sweater and skirt outfit, and there won't be any around. They'll have been cleared out weeks ago to make room for the new cruise fashions.

And then, of course, when the north wind is howling and I'm all bundled up in boots and mittens, is the opportune time to pick up a bathing suit and some crisp, cool cottons for the summer ahead. But I won't do it because, nonconformist that I am, I'll just be getting around to thinking about Christmas cards.

Labor in the Bible

"BEGGAR TO KING: All the Occupations of Biblical Times" by Walter Duckat, gathers together in one book for the first time all the pertinent data concerning the more than 200 occupations either directly mentioned or implied in the Bible.

The volume contains descriptions of ancient crafts such as baker, barber, brewer, bricklayer, butcher, carpenter, driver, metal-worker, musician, teacher, warehouseman, weaver. Duckat also describes the role of labor in biblical times and the great concern expressed for the working man.

The descriptions in "Beggar to King" are organized in alphabetical dictionary form, and include an introduction and four appendices dealing with the general conditions of trade, commerce, finances in ancient Israel, and such problems as women's rights, child labor, unions and strikes.

The 327-page volume published by Doubleday sells for $5.95.

Meany Endorses Dystrophy Drive

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany endorsed the March Against Muscular Dystrophy and urged all federation affiliates and their members "to do everything they can, through our community services program, to advance the efforts of Muscular Dystrophy Associations of America, Inc."

Meany's association with MDAA in the past year, he said in a letter to MDAA National Chairman Jerry Lewis, "reinforced my conviction that yours is a cause deserving the support of all Americans." He added:

"There is no question that crippling neuromuscular diseases impose an immense burden not only on victims and their families but also on the community at large. The generous services which MDAA makes available ease that burden somewhat; of even greater moment is the assurance its worldwide research program offers that these tragic conditions can and will be conquered by medical science."

FIRST-HAND REPORTS on what it takes to learn the skills of the building trades are passed on to Chicago area high school students at a construction site. This is a continuing orientation program conducted by the Chicago Building Trades Council, Chicago Board of Education and the employers. The program is designed to give youngsters a background on the value of apprenticeship training leading to a skilled trade.

Household Hazards, Lethal Toys Target of Product Safety Probe

Many household products are lethal traps. Hundreds of thousands of people are injured, maimed or killed by unsafe household items each year.

The National Commission on Product Safety knows this, and it plans to investigate more than 200 types of familiar home products—appliances, tools, toys, furniture, textiles, electrical fixtures, recreational equipment and others. The safety comission wants to know if these things are actually safe for consumer use.

Commission Chairman Arnold Elkind described the study as the first step toward protecting the American consumer from unnecessary injury or even death caused by unsafe products.

The commission's files are stuffed with case histories of accidents and tragedies in homes. Here are a few from around the country:

- Glenalden, Pa.—A new oven became a "nightmare" when its storage door caught fire because of improper insulation.
- Greenwich, Conn.—A 13-month-old boy hanged himself from the string of a musical toy in his crib.
- New York—"The plastic lid on my gift coffee maker caught fire . . . the flames almost reached the ceiling. . . ."
- Brawley, Calif. (AP)—A portable hair dryer fell into his bathtub and electrocuted Hector Ken Tom, 8. . . .
- Garland, Tex.—"For the third time this year my son has had a severe fall from his swing set . . . all because the hooks attached to the swing set last only five days and the chains last only about six months. . . ."
- Lexington, Mass.—A few moments after giving her 16-month-old son a new doll, a young mother returned to find that he had removed the legs exposing three-inch spikes which she described as "a lethal weapon."
- Hayward, Calif.—A 62-year-old woman was electrocuted when her electric edger snipped its cord while she was standing in a puddle.

Public Health Service statistics, Elkind continued, show that 250,000 are injured annually by only four types of household items—heaters, stoves, power mowers and washing machines.

"When we have surveyed all the products on our list, we expect the death and injury toll will turn out to be many times that figure," Elkind said.

Many accidents resulting from household products could be avoided either by design changes or by more adequate consumer information, Elkind added.

The study is the first of its kind taken up by a federal agency. Congress called for the investigation when it set up the seven-member commission.

The Commission also will review and evaluate self-regulatory programs of manufacturers and federal, state and local laws on product safety. It then will report to Congress and the President and give proposals for more effective consumer protection.

One of the members of the Commission is Sidney Margolius, consumer columnist for the AFL-CIO News and other labor papers.

Two Areas Show Employment Gains

Unemployment ratings in three of the 150 major labor areas in the country were changed in August—two improved and one worsened, the Labor Dept. reported.

Improved were Altoona, Pa., from substantial unemployment (6 to 8.9 percent) to moderate (3 to 5.9 percent) and Honolulu shifted from moderate to low (1.5 to 2.9 percent). The Geary-Hammond-East Chicago area rating moved from low to moderate due to layoffs in rail car manufacturing and an influx of summer job seekers.

Ninty-two of the major labor areas are rated as having moderate unemployment and 49 are in the low bracket this month. Two areas remain in the heaviest unemployment category of 12 percent or more.

Arbitration Role Seen In Community Conflicts

New York—Arbitration skills sharpened on settlement of labor disputes will be turned to community conflicts and inner-city problems under a new program launched by the American Arbitration Association.

The association, with the help of a $90,000 grant from the Ford Foundation, has established a Center for Dispute Settlement to develop both techniques and trained people to apply mediation and arbitration principles of new areas.

These might include school controversies, disputes betweeen landlords and organized tenants, direct action challenges by civil rights groups, urban renewal disputes and welfare agency procedures.

Samuel C. Jackson is leaving the U. S. Equal Employment Opportunity Commission and will head the new center, which will have its headquarters in Washington, D.C.

It will recruit and train mediators and arbitrators in various communities who would be available at the request of the parties involved in the dispute.

The center will also seek to come up with some new ideas on resolving organizing and bargaining disputes involving public employes.

This phase of its activity will be centered in the Boston regional office of the American Arbitration Association and the operation will be known as the New England Plan. Working on the program will be Robert L. Stutz, chairman of the Connecticut State Board of Mediation & Arbitration.

Jackson, who will head the overall program and become a vice president of the AAA, has served as a mediator of community disputes in the Bedford-Stuyvesant area of Brooklyn at New York City's request. Before his appointment to the EEOC, he was a Kansas attorney and a member of the board of directors of the NAACP.

DIGNITARIES WATCH Letter Carriers convention parade from reviewing stand in downtown Boston. House Speaker John W. McCormack, the parade's marshal, is in the center. Jerome J. Keating, who is retiring as president of the Letter Carriers, is at right.

Letter Carriers Hail Humphrey, Post Record Membership Gain

Boston—More than 3,700 delegates to the Letter Carriers convention here demonstrated that their union, their legs and their voices are in excellent condition.

Their union's progress was evidenced in the report by Sec.-Treas. J. Stanly Lewis that the NALC had a record 205,279 members on the opening day of its convention, an increase of 21,290 in the past two years.

Legs toughened by year-'round carrying of the mail took in stride the traditional convention parade.

And vocal cords got a mighty workout as delegates greeted Vice Pres. Hubert H. Humphrey with repeated cheers—before, during and after his speech.

Retiring NALC Pres. Jerome J. Keating received an ovation also as he reported on progress made during his six-year period in office as well as during the two years since the last convention.

The record includes five pay raises in the last six years and greatly improved fringe benefits.

Keating and Vice Pres. James H. Rademacher stressed that the big push in the new 91st Congress will be for a strong, effective union recognition law.

The Letter Carriers and other AFL-CIO federal employe unions want written into law a strengthened version of the historic executive order issued by the late Pres. Kennedy in 1962, which set up the government's program of labor-management relations. The legislation the unions are seeking would also include binding arbitration to settle impasses with management.

Humphrey told the delegates that a few days before he had received a letter from a letter carrier asking if Humphrey, as President, would seek to extend the rights of union recognition and meaningful collective bargaining for postal workers.

The Vice President told the convention:

"I'll answer him now, with an unqualified 'Yes.' In particular, we must develop techniques for meaningful third party involvement to resolve negotiation disputes with finality.

"We need a Federal Employes Labor-Management Relations Act.

"But I want a good law—one with real protection. That demands a progressive Congress next year, and with your help I think we can get it.

"Until we can get that good law, there are important improvements that can be made in Executive Order 10988 to protect the interests of federal employes.

"If I become President, they will be made."

In what might be termed a "letter carriers' holiday," delegates took over downtown Boston the first night of the convention for a gala 2 hour and 10 minute parade.

Letter carrier bands paced the marchers along the route which ended in front of a VIP reviewing stand near the Prudential Center.

Floats, displays and costumes entertained thousands of Bostonians who lined the parade route. All the marchers, from Pennsylvania Mummers to Utah Letter Carriers dressed as beehives, did an eyes right in front of House Speaker John W. McCormack. the parade grand marshal.

Representatives Charles Wilson (D-Calif.), William D. Ford (D-Mich.), Arnold Olsen (D-Mont.) and Dominick V. Daniels (D-N.J.) marched the entire parade route as "favorite sons" leading their state delegations.

One contingent marched in the uniform of letter carriers from 30 nations. The uniforms came in from many sources—including diplomatic pouch—and the last one arrived at Boston's Logan Field only a half-hour before parade time.

Delegates voted a $2,500 pay increase for all national officers, and approved a $3-a-year increase in national dues—the equivalent of per capita—to bring it to $16. They rejected overwhelmingly a resolution which would have earmarked $1 of the increase for a strike fund.

Anti-Bias Gains Noted In Manpower Projects

The nationwide campaign against racial and other discrimination has resulted in a number of improvements in manpower programs, Assistant Sec. of Labor Stanley H. Ruttenberg reports.

The conclusion was made by Ruttenberg in his annual report to the secretary of labor on the activities of the Office of Equal Opportunity in Manpower Programs.

The office investigates complaints of discrimination in connection with manpower programs, reviews federally-funded projects for compliance with the Civil Rights Act and works with local and state employment agencies.

The activities of the office over the past year have resulted in three notable improvements, Ruttenberg said. They are:

- Expanded job opportunities for minorities.
- Improved job classifications for nonwhite applicants so as to permit them to be placed in work commensurate with their training, education and abilities.
- A growing refusal by local State Employment Service offices to aid employers who are found to be discriminating.

In citing the expansion of job opportunities for nonwhites, Ruttenberg noted that "increasingly" minority youths are making "breakthroughs" in apprentice programs.

Of more than 200 complaints filed with the office in 1967 and processed by various agencies in the Labor Dept., 81 required field investigations by the office, Ruttenberg said. In all cases corrective action was taken.

In addition to making these investigations, he continued, the office through its compliance officers conducted 121 "in depth" checks on discrimination through "compliance reviews" in 47 states.

While the achievements of the office "have been substantial," he declared, "the continuing extent of discriminatory practices in th manpower programs will require expanded and spartan efforts to achieve their elimination."

Seen as Bargaining Lever:

Fire Fighters Delete 'No-Strike' Clause

Toronto—The Fire Fighters convention voted to remove the no-strike clause from the union's constitution, opening the way for Fire Fighters locals throughout the United States and Canada to strike if necessary.

The no-strike clause that has remained in the constitution in some form throughout the 50-year history of the IAFF was removed during a spirited session at the union's 29th convention here.

Nearly 1,000 delegates from all parts of the United States and Canada were on hand for the opening of the five-day convention. The debate on the no-strike clause was the highlight of the early sessions.

Delegates rejected a recommendation from a commission, established by the international union two years ago, which proposed that there be no withholding "of fire protection services" when other methods are available for the resolution of disputes.

The commission had suggested that, where adequate procedures for resolving disputes are not available, local unions should refer the dispute issues to the International Headquarters of the union "for such further handling as may be available or necessary to secure an acceptable settlement of the dispute."

The delegates instead dropped the no strike provision without substituting additional language.

Elimination of the no-strike clause reflected the frustration that many Fire Fighter locals have experienced over the years in attempting to obtain wage increases from municipalities. Delegates maintained municipalities clamped down on firemen knowing they could not strike.

New York delegates, currently negotiating their contract which expires Sept. 20, felt the removal of the clause would strengthen their bargaining position.

After the vote, a spokesman for the group pressing for removal of the no-strike clause stressed that the action did not mean that fire fighters are becoming "strike-happy." They "always have and will continue to live up to their obligations," he said. But the action, he declared, will put more muscle into negotiations.

In his keynote address, IAFF Pres. William Buck emphasized the changing role of the fire fighter. He said fire fighters today have to face greater dangers than ever before.

"It's getting tougher all the time to be a fire fighter," he told the delegates. "You get a fire in front of you and you get bricks or a bullet on the back of you."

Effective Union Needed

He said in this disturbing age of riots, gun fights and attacks on fire fighters on the job, there is need for an effective union in every city to fight disparity, bargain collectively and get its story to the public.

The veteran union leader, retiring after 38 years in the Fire Fighters organization, called for a forward look at the convention. He strongly urged increased per capita dues to give the IAFF a financial base to better service the individual locals and promote the cause of the Fire Fighters throughout the country.

AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler told the delegates that fire fighters have for too long been taken for granted by the public. The time has come, he suggested, that communities pay a fair price for the service that makes them feel secure.

Tucson Fire Fighters Sponsor Burn Clinic

Tucson, Ariz.—A center to treat and rehabilitate victims of burns will soon be opened at St. Mary's Hospital here, equipped and maintained by Tucson Fire Fighters Local 479.

Local Pres. Norman Clark said the union's decision to bear the initial cost of the center, about $3,000, and set up a perpetual fund for it was reached by a unanimous and enthusiastic vote of members.

Stressing that the center should be "for everyone" who suffers from severe burns, Clark added, "We want this center to be the best in the nation. We're going to start it that way and we intend to keep it that way."

Clark said the need for the center "is tremendous." He pointed out that victims of third degree burns must now be flown to a center in Galveston, Tex. and "several burn patients died here last year because we couldn't get them to the center in time." He added:

St. Mary's Cooperates

"We approached St. Mary's, they were willing to give us the space and staff it—and we were on our way."

He said the union will use income from a yearly barbecue it conducts here every Labor Day to help finance the center, along with funds from the local's treasury.

A hospital official said equipment at the center will include "burn beds" designed to permit nurses to turn patients without causing pain.

The center will also "offer the very latest in burn treatment followup, rehabilitation and skin grafting."

St. Mary's administrator, Sister Julia Mary, lauded the Fire Fighters, saying: "This is a very generous offer to sponsor equipment for an urgent community need."

Sept. 18 Meeting Set For General Board

The AFL-CIO General Board, composed of the chief officer of each federation affiliate and department, plus members of the AFL-CIO Executive Council, will meet at the Commodore Hotel in New York, Wednesday, Sept. 18, at 10 a.m.

Notice of the meeting was sent out by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany and Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler in letters which noted that under the constitution, the General Board decides policy questions referred to it by the federation's executive officers or by the Executive Council.

The Executive Council will meet in New York Sept. 16 and 17.

After 33 Years:

Further Gains Seen In Social Security

The social security system—now a third of a century old—must play an expanded role over the next decade in helping to wipe out poverty, Sec. of Health, Education & Welfare Wilbur J. Cohen urged.

Cohen, speaking at ceremonies marking the 33rd anniversary of the Social Security Act, called the system "our most effective weapon in the war on poverty," declaring that its benefits now keep an estimated 10 million Americans above the poverty line.

But, he said, a million more persons could be raised immediately from the ranks of the poor if minimum monthly benefits were increased from the present $55 to $70 for an individual and from $82.50 to $105 for a couple.

"Benefits can and must be increased all across the board," he asserted. "Health insurance must be broadened and expanded through a combination of public and private efforts. Our unemployment insurance system needs strengthening. And our welfare programs must be radically reshaped to meet new needs. We need more comprehensive community social services, and coupled with these efforts we need jobs, training and education for more of our people.

"We must seek and maintain a social security status commensurate with our growing national income and potential—a status worthy of this nation's expectations for all of its people. We must continue to move toward a life of dignity and independence and greater meaning for all Americans."

Cohen paid special tribute to Arthur J. Altmeyer, now 77 years old, who was honored at the ceremonies and received the highest HEW award for his "singularly creative and courageous contributions in shaping the program of the Social Security Act during the formative years."

Altmeyer was a member of the original Social Security Board, its chairman from 1937 to 1946, and the first commissioner of social security.

He and William L. Mitchell, another former social security commissioner, also were announced as the first American recipients of the Intl. Social Security Association's award created four years ago to honor outstanding contributions by persons no longer associated with social security work.

A further award, named in honor of Altmeyer, was presented by Cohen to Robert M. Ball, the present commissioner.

Cohen recalled that when the social security program began 33 years ago under Altmeyer's direction it was simply a retirement program limited to workers in commerce and industry. It has since grown, he noted, to provide substantial protection for nearly all workers and their families.

Benefits totaling $30 billion annually — including medicare — are now being paid to 24 million persons, and the face value of survivors' insurance in the event of a worker's death is $940 billion. About 6 million of the current beneficiaries are people well below retirement age—widows, children and disabled workers and their dependents.

The anniversary observance drew an audience of government and labor officials who played important roles in the passage and expansion of the social security program. Among guests from the labor movement were AFL-CIO Social Security Dir. Bert Seidman; Nelson Cruikshank, Seidman's predecessor who is now retired; Kitty Elickson, formerly on the AFL-CIO social security staff; Pres. John Edelman of the National Council of Senior Citizens, and Leonard Lesser, general counsel for the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept.

FULL LABOR SUPPORT for the legislative goals of postal workers is pledged by AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler at the 35th national convention of the Postal Clerks in Minneapolis.

Postal Clerks to Stress Union Recognition Law

Minneapolis—The Postal Clerks renewed efforts to gain union recognition by law and pressed for negotiations to return 60,000 members of the unaffiliated National Postal Union to the UFPOC.

The 1,191 delegates at the 35th UFPOC national convention listed labor-management negotiations by law as their "paramount legislative objective."

They got a powerful assist in that direction from Vice Pres. Hubert H. Humphrey, who said:

"I am for it and I have been for a long, long time."

Humphrey was cheered wildly when he promised to send such legislation to Capitol Hill if he is elected and "fight for its passage."

The delegates also reversed a stand taken two years ago when a proposed merger agreement with the NPU was rejected even though it had the backing of the union's officers. This time, delegates voted overwhelmingly to resume merger negotiations.

The 60,000-member NPU was formed after dissident members walked out of the 1958 convention. The UFPOC represents nearly 300,000 postal clerks.

UFPOC Pres. E. C. Hallbeck named a seven-member committee, which he will head, to meet with NPU leaders "at the earliest possible moment." This is contingent on NPU approval of a merger at its national convention being held in San Juan, P.R.

Hallbeck and the entire slate of headquarters officers were re-elected to two-year terms. Opposing candidates had been nominated for seven of the 11 offices.

Gets Fifth Term

Hallbeck, who won his fifth term as president, defeated Frank McNiff of Long Island City, N.Y., 1,108 to 393.

All but two of the union's 15 regional vice presidents were re-elected. In the New York Region, incumbent Vice Pres. George Brink was defeated by Don Silvestri 84 to 58.

Bernard A. Schultz of the Boston Region won over four other candidates to fill a vacancy left by the resignation of John Dubay, who was elected research administrator of the union's hospital plan.

The convention strongly opposed a plan to transfer Post Office functions to a non-profit corporation, which was proposed by a special White House commission, unless the right to strike was guaranteed. Binding arbitration of procedures and full non-profit service for all citizens were also demanded.

Delegates agreed that the study commission listed some "laudable objectives," including collective bargaining provisions for employes. But they complained that "it has not seen fit to provide the weapons to secure those benefits at the bargaining table."

Earlier, the convention deleted from its constitution a no-strike clause—adopted more than 60 years ago—on grounds that existing federal statutes now make it "superfluous."

Raises in salary were voted all the union's national officers. Hallbeck received a $2,500 increase to $30,000 a year; National Legislative Dir. Patrick J Nilan, up $5,000 to $25,000, and all regional vice presidents' salaries were raised from $12,000 to $16,500.

Adopted resolutions included:

- A proposal for legislation to set up an agency shop plan requiring all clerks to pay the equivalent of union dues to the organization representing them on a national basis.
- Protection for Post Office employes from working overtime against their wishes.

The union revamped its system of local representation at national conventions to give larger locals a bigger voice while increasing representation of medium-size locals also.

Delegates selected Los Angeles for the site of its next national convention in 1970.

Brewers Press Voter Drive, Organizing

Miami Beach—The Brewery Workers ended their 39th convention here after returning Pres. Karl Feller and 12 other leaders to office for new three-year terms and placing major emphasis for the future of political action and new member organizing.

The convention called on every local union to intensify political action programs after hearing Dir. Alexander Barkan of the AFL-CIO Committee on Political Education spell out the dangers inherent in a Republican victory in the November elections.

Barkan spoke of the "crime of silence" in the face of anti-labor threats from backers of Richard M. Nixon and George C. Wallace. Saying that "keeping quiet is the worst thing we could do," the COPE head asked whether any union member would be satisfied with "the kind of labor relations Wallace provided" when he was governor of Alabama.

AFL-CIO Dir. of Organization William L. Kircher reported that the federation has made steady gains in membership with its unions reaching record highs.

"This is compelling evidence," Kircher declared, "that we haven't just been sitting on our hands."

He told the story of the rise of the Farm Workers union from a small band of West Coast field hands to its current status as an AFL-CIO affiliate with more than a dozen signed contracts and a vigorous international boycott against California grape growers who have refused to deal with their organized employes.

The convention agreed to keep supporting the UFWOC boycott, and leaders of several locals indicated they plan to take special support action in aid of the embattled farm workers.

Based on an officers' report of substantial membership gains and improved union finances, the convention agreed to extend and improve the program under which local unions conduct organizing campaigns in cooperation with the international union.

Delegates approved $2,500 a year salary increases for Feller, Sec.-Treas. Arthur P. Gildea and Organization Dir. Thomas M. Rusch.

O'Brien Wins Full Term To Head Rail Carmen

Miami Beach—Pres. George O'Brien of the Railway Carmen was elected to his first full term in a spirited election contest at the union's 24th convention here.

O'Brien, who was assistant president of the union for 11 years before moving up to the presidency two years ago following the retirement of Pres. A. J. Bernhardt, defeated Vice. Pres. H. J. Kintzele, Jr., 3,423 to 2,718.

The Carmen's next three top officers—Asst. Pres. A. L. Krause, Sec.-Treas. L. A. Taylor and Alex Gawron, editor-manager of the union's monthly magazine, the Journal, were re-elected without opposition.

Kintzele and nine other vice presidents were re-elected. They are: Frank A. Armstrong, Harvey W. Higgs, Irvin L. Barney, Clair Toone, Oren L. Wertz, Lewis Wood, John DiGregorio, O. W. Jacobson and C. R. Martin.

The convention elected Fred Westwell of Calgary, Alberta, to succeed Vice Pres. Roger Melancon and John J. Noonan, a grand lodge deputy, to succeed Vice Pres. C. J. Kitchas. Melancon and Kitchas previously announced their retirement.

Earlier, the 800 delegates voted a $1,800 a year pay increase for all officers to reflect the rise in living costs and wage gains in the craft in recent years. The raise was the first given to the officers in 10 years.

A move to reduce the compulsory retirement age of the president from 70 to 65—which would have forced the retirement of O'Brien—was defeated. A 65-year limit for other offices was retained.

Also vigorously debated were proposals to move the union's headquarters from Kansas City, Mo. to Chicago and increase grand lodge per capita dues, both of which were defeated.

Among changes adopted was one providing that wage settlements negotiated by the Carmen be subject to ratification by a membership referendum, if and when such ratification procedures are adopted by all other shopcraft unions affiliated with the AFL-CIO Railway Employes Dept.

A past practice of electing two vice presidents from Canada was made ironclad by the adoption of a constitutional amendment. One vice president will be designated administrator of the union's Canadian affairs.

Apathy Lulls 22 Million, Voter Survey Reveals

One of every four Americans of voting age who fails to register to vote does so because of inability to meet citizenship or residency requirements, the Commerce Dept. reported. But more than 22 million persons just don't bother.

The department said that preliminary results of a survey, conducted by the Census Bureau following the 1966 elections, showed that of 113 million persons of voting age, 30 million had not registered to vote. Four out of five of those who were registered actually cast ballots.

Survey interviews revealed that about one in four of the unregistered persons could not meet the citizenship or residence requirements for voting.

However, 63 percent offered a variety of personal reasons for not having registered. Typical among these responses were: "just didn't get around to it" and "couldn't be bothered."

The survey also came up with these findings:

- Voter participation is highest in the middle age groups (45-54 and 55-64 years), drops off among older persons, but is lowest among those under 25.
- Voter participation rises with the educational level of the voters, ranging from a low of 31 percent for those with four years or less of elementary school to a high of about 71 percent for college graduates.
- Persons in white-collar occupations are more likely to vote than blue collar workers.
- Voter participation among the nonwhite population was significantly lower than that of the nation as a whole—41 percent as compared with the overall rate of 55 percent.
- The South had a much lower voter participation rate than the rest of the country.
- Voter participation tends to increase with the level of family income, reaching a peak of 78 percent for persons 45 to 64 years old in families with income of $10,000 a year or more.

Meany Criticizes GOP Platform:

Labor Bids Democrats to Act On Nation's Social Problems

protest to those who started it and who to this hour perpetuate it. The imperialists are not in Washington; they are in Hanoi."

Asked if he feared a negative impact on the economy if the Viet Nam war came to an end, Meany replied:

"The American trade union movement hasn't even considered this. The great body of the trade union movement believes in the defense of freedom, believes in the Commander-in-Chief, who happens to be a gentleman named Lyndon B. Johnson."

Labor, he said in response to another question, "is in favor of negotiating, in favor of protecting American boys who are there, and has no faith whatsoever in the semi-skilled intellectuals who believe that the Viet Nam situation can be solved by surrender."

"When you talk about unconditional bombing halts—you've said it all. There's nothing left to negotiate. That's surrender."

Asked if he would include "the distinguished chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee" among the semi-skilled intellectuals, Meany said:

Poor Judgment

"Yes, I have the greatest respect for Bill Fulbright, but I have no respect for his judgment on communism. He doesn't know what it's all about, even after what happened in Czechoslovakia."

Meany, in his oral statement to the platform committee, expressed labor's faith in the American system of democracy and its ability to adapt to challenges. But focusing on "those who have been left behind for reasons not of their own making," he declared that "this great country can do better than it has done until now . . . not just for most Americans, but for all Americans."

The essence of the crisis in the cities, he suggested, is that the system "is working better than ever for the majority" and "very poorly, or not at all, for the minority." The clear solution, he declared, is to make it work for everyone.

Yet it is precisely on this point that the Republican platform fails, Meany said.

"Its proposals for dealing with the urban crisis do not propose to make the American system work for the minority. The end result of what they propose would be to make the system work better for the majority.

"The other party would accomplish this through tax credits and tax gimmicks. They would further reward those who already adequately share in America's affluence and use as their excuse the plight of those who today are in trouble because they do not have their fair share.

"We urgently plead with this committee to reject such an approach."

Asks Massive Action

Meany called instead for a program of "massive public investment" to overcome the "intolerable" conditions in the urban ghettos. And heading this program, he said, should be a provision for "one million public service jobs now—useful jobs on useful projects for the hard-core unemployed . . . projects badly needed by states, communities and non-profit institutions, which have been held up for lack of manpower and money."

The program, as outlined in the detailed presentation to the committee, also called for public investments to meet pressing needs in housing, mass transit, public facilities, youth programs, education, manpower assistance, public welfare, and relief of rural poverty.

Meany noted that the cry of cost is insistently raised against such measures by the ultraconservatives.

"Their eyes are glued on the price tag of each issue. They pay no attention to the value of an idea; they indicate no understanding of the need for investing in America's future or her people."

The urban crisis, Meany observed, did not begin with last year's riots, but mounted over the years "as more and more of the desperate, the disadvantaged and the displaced flocked into the nation's cities."

But last summer's riots and "disturbances" in cities across the country "compelled a reluctant nation" to recognize the existence of the crisis, the AFL-CIO president said.

He condemned the riots, and the arson, looting and murder that resulted, as "attacks on society," declaring that "no believer in democracy" can condone such crimes.

"But," he went on, "law and order alone, without regard for justice, can be corrupted into a pretext for tyranny. True law and order is not served by equipping police with tanks and machine guns as though the ghetto were the enemy and not the handful of criminals inside it.

"Yes, better police work is needed; but the way to get it is through better-trained and better-paid policemen, operating in a context of justice, not through the indiscriminate use of force against innocent and guilty alike. Nor is true law and order served by ill-advised legislative attempts to dilute the constitutional rights of all Americans in the name of police power.

"By all means let there be law and order. Let there be law and order in the cities, but not by the creation of a garrison state. Let there be law and order in the enforcement of civil rights statutes and application of other social welfare legislation. Let those who cry for more police in the slums cry also for more jobs, more housing and more schools for the prisoners of the slums. Those, too, are tools of law and order."

Discussing basic labor legislation, Meany pointed out that the National Labor Relations Act, from the time of its passage in 1935, has set forth as its purpose and as a public policy of the United States that workers should be encouraged to organize into unions of their own choosing and to engage in collective bargaining.

Republican Plank Hit

He charged that the Republican platform not only failed to reaffirm that "fundamental" public policy, but "sought, in language that was only somewhat camouflaged, to dilute the basic rights of workers to unite in unions and bargain collectively."

Already, he noted, many of the amendments under the Republican-sponsored Taft-Hartley and Landrum-Griffin Acts "contravene" the stated purpose of the NLRA.

"States are allowed to legislate a compulsory open shop.

"The right of construction unions to advertise and prosecute a labor dispute at a common construction site had been virtually abolished.

"Unorganized workers who are seeking to establish a union against the opposition of an intransigent employer, willing to use every device regardless of rulings by the labor board and the courts, are not much better off than they were in 1935. The J. P. Stevens case is a classic example of this, yet the government has no effective remedies to prevent it.

"Matters are even worse for workers at the bottom of the economic ladder—agricultural workers, among others—who have no legal protection at all under federal labor law and who have, therefore, been denied the opportunities of other workers to advance their own interests."

Declaring that the issue "is not the power of unions but the rights of workers," Meany urged the Democratic platform drafters to support the AFL-CIO's proposals "to restore and reinforce those rights."

Wirtz Calls for Pledge On Work Guarantees

Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz called on the Democratic platform committee to put the party on record as favoring guaranteed employment for every American willing and able to work.

The secretary, in a series of proposals that coincided with a number of the AFL-CIO's recommendations to the committee, also called for universal minimum wage coverage and a ban on federal contracts to employers who persist in violating their workers' rights to organize and bargain.

A summary of the Wirtz proposals:

- "A broad but specific and unequivocal commitment to guarantee to every American willing to work for it the full and equal right to earn a living" with a provision for public employment of "any person unable to find private employment."
- Substantial improvement in the unemployment insurance laws, including minimum standards, an increase in the wage base, and extension of coverage.
- A firm commitment to raise the federal minimum wage and extend its coverage to "all employes within the scope of federal authority."
- Enactment of the Occupational Health & Safety bill.
- Amendment of the Taft-Hartley Act to repeal Section 14 (b) which permits states to outlaw union shop agreements, to remove the ban on common-site picketing by construction unions, and to extend coverage to all workers, including farm workers and employes of non-profit organizations.
- "A strong statement that the government should not do business, as a customer, with firms that repeatedly violate federal statutes prohibiting discrimination against those of their employes who are union members or refuse to bargain with duly authorized union representatives—just as the government declines to do business with employers who discriminate in their employment practices on the basis of race or sex."

Humphrey Holds Lead On Eve of Convention

Hawaii; action on rules, credentials and platform committee reports on Tuesday with an address by the permanent chairman, House Majority Leader Carl Albert of Oklahoma; nominations and balloting on presidential candidates on Wednesday night and on the vice presidency Thursday night.

The amphitheater is much smaller than the Miami Beach convention hall where the Republicans met, but it will have to house up to 5,611 delegates and alternates—more than twice the number accredited to the GOP convention.

Included in the total are more than 300 trade unionists, many of whom are playing leading roles in their state delegations. Among them are two AFL-CIO vice-presidents—Steelworkers Pres. I. W. Abel in the Pennsylvania delegation, and Iron Workers Pres. John H. Lyons from Missouri.

All sessions are planned for the evening during the prime television viewing hours, but Bailey warned that daytime sessions may have to be scheduled in the face of the anticipated battles over credentials and the platform.

The credentials committee, headed by New Jersey Gov. Richard J. Hughes, made history early in its deliberations when it refused to seat the nearly all-white 24-vote regular delegation from Mississippi, upholding a charge of racial discrimination in the selection of the delegation.

By an 85 to 9 vote, the committee voted to substitute a half-black, half-white delegation formed by a group called the Loyal Democrats of Mississippi and headed by NAACP leader Charles Evers, who will become the party's national committeeman for the state.

Humphrey, McCarthy and McGovern all supported the challenge by the Mississippi "loyalists."

The prospect of floor fights loomed, however, over credentials disputes involving nearly 1,000 delegates from 15 other states. Most of these challenges were brought by supporters of McCarthy, and they could easily muster the 11 committee votes needed to bring a minority report to the floor.

The central issue in the platform committee debate was the war in Viet Nam. The 110-member committee, headed by Rep. Hale Boggs of Louisiana, held three-days of hearings in Washington before transferring their deliberations to Chicago. And most of the testimony presented in the capital focused on the war.

McCarthy called for a plank committing the party to a halt in the American bombing and a general de-escalation of the fighting along with a coalition government that would include the National Liberation Front, the political arm of the Viet Cong.

Humphrey supporters, while indicating they could go along with a call for a bombing pause if accompanied by "restraint" from the other side, rejected any proposal for the "imposition" of a coalition government on the South Vietnamese people. And they voiced strong opposition to platform language that might repudiate the conduct of the war or hamper the Paris peace talks by setting military strategy or bargaining positions in advance.

Pamphlet on Draft Aids School Debates

A pamphlet to aid students in the 1968-69 high school debates and discussions on the nation's selective service system has been prepared by the AFL-CIO.

Entitled "Labor's Views on Selective Service," it presents the federation's position on present draft policy, universal military training and alternatives to the draft.

It also contains reprints of articles written by John A. Sessions, a staff member of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Education, and Gus Tyler, assistant president of the Ladies' Garment Workers.

"Labor's Views on Selective Service" may be ordered free from the AFL-CIO Pamphlet Division, 815 Sixteenth St., N.W., Washington, D.C. 20006.

Humphrey-Muskie Mount Liberal Drive Against GOP

Labor Aid Rallied for Campaign

Chicago—Vice Pres. Humphrey appealed to organized labor to "give me your hands and your hearts, your support and your faith, so that you can say in November 'once again we helped elect a President of the United States.' "

Humphrey's remarks produced a roar of assent from more than 400 trade unionists gathered at a breakfast meeting called by the National Labor Committee for Humphrey on the opening day of the Democratic national convention here.

And AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany responded with a pledge of redoubled union efforts on "the practical side" of the political campaign—"getting the votes into the ballot box."

Pres. I. W. Abel of the Steelworkers, who presided, noted that the meeting brought together the largest group of labor officials ever to take part in a Democratic convention—201 delegates and 103 alternates from 43 states, plus scores of unionists involved in other convention activity.

Abel, who is chairman of the Labor Committee for Humphrey, and Sec. Joseph D. Keenan of the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, the committee's secretary-treasurer, both urged the labor delegates to help put Humphrey over the top for the nomination and to return home to help elect him in November.

Humphrey came to the breakfast meeting unannounced to thank Meany and the labor movement, he said, for their "support, friendship and loyalty, not only to me but to the President of the United States,

Rules Updated To Give Party Modern Base

Chicago—A major overhaul of the rules and procedures of the Democratic Party took shape at its 35th national convention here in a series of actions aimed at encouraging broad participation in party affairs and eliminating racial discrimination in the selection of delegates.

The actions involved the rules themselves and contests over the seating of challenged delegations.

The convention agreed to set up

NOMINATED as the Democratic Party candidate for President of the United States, Vice Pres. Humphrey plans to open his campaign at New York's Labor Day parade.

Meany Cites Common Sense:

Platform Details Plan for Progress

Chicago—The Democratic national convention adopted a sweeping platform pledging "to build greatly" on the achievements of the Johnson-Humphrey Administration and spelling out the party's programs to combat poverty and social injustice.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany called the platform "a common sense approach to the great domestic and international problems" facing the nation, one that workers "can wholeheartedly support."

It contains, Meany observed, "specific, sound and achievable programs to meet these problems. All are based on the belief, which we in the AFL-CIO fully share, that America can—and will—solve its problems."

Meany said the platform stood "in stark and welcome contrast" to the one adopted by the Republicans in Miami Beach earlier this month.

The contrast was marked both in the forthright liberalism of the Democratic domestic proposals and the sharp detail in which they are set forth.

Another major difference lay in the vigorous debate provoked by the Democratic plank on the war in Viet Nam, a plank supporting the Administration's position in quest of an honorable, negotiated peace and rejecting the approach urged by supporters of Sen. Eugene J. McCarthy of Minnesota and Sen. George McGovern of South Dakota.

There was no vocal dissent, however, from the planks dealing with domestic programs and problems.

In the area of labor relations, the platform asserts unequivocally that "private collective bargaining and a strong and independent labor move-

Democratic Ticket Seeks Party Unity

By John M. Barry

Chicago—The Democratic Party moved to head off a strong Republican challenge for the presidency of the United States as it gathered its forces behind a new, liberal team of standard bearers, Vice Pres. Hubert H. Humphrey and Sen. Edmond S. Muskie of Maine.

The Humphrey-Muskie ticket will be opposed in the November election by the conservatively-oriented GOP slate chosen three weeks ago—former Vice Pres. Richard M. Nixon for President and Maryland Gov. Spiro T. Agnew for vice president.

Humphrey won the Democratic nomination for President on the first convention ballot, receiving 1,761¾ delegate votes, far in excess of the 1.312 needed. His principal opponent, Sen. Eugene J. McCarthy, a fellow Minnesotan, drew 601. Sen. George McGovern of South Dakota, a late entry, received 146½.

Humphrey's choice of Muskie as his running mate came as no surprise. The Maine senator was among those listed repeatedly as possible choices.

Muskie's liberal record and philosophy as senator, and previously as Maine's governor, complement Humphrey's own background and his approach to the campaign.

The Vice President carried the delegations of 47 of the 55 states and territories represented at the convention. He took six of the big seven states—Illinois, Michigan, New York, Ohio, Pennsylvania and Texas—losing only California, whose votes were split largely between McCarthy and McGovern.

Despite this broadly based support, Humphrey faced the task of drawing together party forces divided over the war in Viet Nam, a division marked by the wide-open democratically conducted debate over Viet Nam policies that preceded the nomination.

But the elements that make up the Democratic Party have a long history of differences and divisions and a long history, as well, of quickly healing the wounds of convention conflict.

This healing process was beginning to take place as the party's tumultuous 35th convention drew to a close, with supporters of some of Humphrey's rivals closing ranks behind the party's nominee.

The key to unity was their all-out opposition to the Republican candidate, Nixon, and recognition of the need for continuation of liberal policies to meet the country's domestic problems.

And Nixon will be no "soft touch," Humphrey himself warned early in the convention week.

Labor Day Messages to Workers Stress Importance of 1968 Elections

The first order of business for all Americans on this Labor Day is to make sure that they are registered to vote in the November election, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany declared in his 1968 Labor Day message.

And the next responsibility of every citizen is to "make a solemn vow to vote on Election Day" and see to it that the pledge is lived up to, he emphasized.

This is a Labor Day of "greater significance than usual" because it comes in an election year when Americans "will bring to office a new President," Meany emphasized.

While the AFL-CIO "will have a preference to express" and will do its utmost on behalf of the candidate endorsed, he continued, "our first and overriding concern . . . is to ensure the largest possible vote on Nov. 5."

Turning to the issues in the election, Meany appealed to voters to take note of the "sweeping gains" made over the past eight years in securing jobs, equal rights, education, housing, conservation and consumer protection.

"There is no question that an overwhelming majority of the American people enthusiastically support this record of social progress," Meany stated.

But, he warned, this year's election "is being obscured in the minds of many Americans" by demagogues who seek to "inflame emotions rather than appeal to reason" on two issues—the war in Viet Nam and "law and order."

On the Viet Nam issue, he asked Americans not to be misled by those "who direct their protests only to Washington, never to Hanoi." There is "far too little" reason-based-on-fact among opponents of America's "defense of freedom," he added.

As for the "law and order" proponents, Meany said, "let those who

Postal-Service Membership Up 10 Percent

Houston—The Post Office & General Service Maintenance Employes had a 10 percent membership gain since the union affiliated with the AFL-CIO two years ago and plans to do even better in future, officers reported to the convention here.

Delegates elected new officers, with contests for every post.

Monroe Crable of Cleveland won a three-way contest with Robert Harmon of Houston and Paul Farnsworth of Omaha for president. Richard Wevodau of Harrisburg, Pa., won the post of legislative representative succeeding Ross A. Messer, and David M. Hendricks of Kansas City is the new secretary-treasurer. All three posts are full-time.

Crable succeeds Edward M. Diekemper, who did not run for a second term as president.

Contests for vice president were won by Johnnie Thomas, Detroit; John Allen, Winston-Salem, N.C.; Robert M. Gjonovich, Denver, and Vernon Daniel, Nashville, Tenn.

The delegates presented a plaque and a television set to Messer, who stepped down after 21 years of legislative duty.

The convention called for intensified upgrading programs in the Post Office and General Services Administration, and asked that all members in those services be provided with uniforms while on duty.

Crable reported that, since the 1966 convention, the union improved its financial stability. It scored a breakthrough in getting federal agencies to provide uniforms for some members and to initiate some training programs. More training is needed to help workers improve their knowledge and skills, Crable said.

The convention voted to meet next in Omaha in 1970.

FIRE FIGHTERS newly elected Pres. W. H. McClennan receives a standing ovation from delegates at the union's 29th convention in Toronto. McClennan succeeds retiring Pres. William D. Buck.

Fire Fighters Union Elects W. H. McClennan

Toronto—W. H. McClennan of Boston was elected president of the Fire Fighters at the union's 29th convention here to succeed Pres. William D. Buck, who is retiring at the end of his term later this month.

McClennan, a union vice president, defeated Vernon Cook of Clinton, Ia., 510-380, in the second of two runoff contests. Earlier Earl Berry of Detroit and Albert O. Raeder of Washington, D.C. had been eliminated from the running.

IAFF Sec.-Treas. Albert E. Albertoni of Oakland, Calif. was re-elected to a third two-year term, defeating Patrick Mangan of Buffalo by a 549-366 vote.

Re-elected vice presidents are James King, New York; Raymond M. Hemmert, Philadelphia; Harlan A. Lippolt, Madison, Wis.; Gordon R. Anderson, Vancouver, B.C.; Walter Lambert, Spokane, Wash.; Harry E. Williams, Portland, Ore.; H. C. Harmelink, San Diego; Jack Bostick, Ft. Worth; Bernard Bonser, Toronto; Raymond B. Oliver, Shreveport, La.; and Percy Clark St. John, N.B.

Newly elected vice presidents are Joseph McMahon, St. Louis; Martin Pierce, Boston; Daniel T. Delegato, Detroit; Charles Hall, Miami, Fla. and Nicholas F. Herbst, Grandview, Mo.

The spirited elections were in keeping with some close votes and intense debate on issues that came before the nearly 1,000 delegates from all parts of the United States and Canada.

A change in the constitution requiring IAFF locals to also affiliate with IAFF state, provincial or regional associations was at first approved by 454 to 411 but later was shelved until after the next convention.

McClennan will set up a commission to study the issue and report back to the union's next convention in October 1970, in Miami, Fla.

The convention, which earlier removed a no-strike clause from its constitution, approved an increase in per capita dues from 65 cents to $1.00 per month to provide for an increased staff and nation-wide organizing.

The delegates voted to establish a committee to seek methods of better protecting fire fighters working in areas of cities where men of the fire service have been attacked by rioters.

Other resolutions approved by the convention called for standardization of building codes, enactment of legislation for greater public safety and adoption of fire prevention codes.

Court Brief Attacks Rail Picketing Ban

The AFL-CIO has asked the U.S. Supreme Court to knock out a Florida state court injunction that has blocked "legal, peaceful" picketing by striking Railroad Trainmen on the Florida East Coast Railway.

The case, involving the Jacksonville (Fla.) Terminal Co., is one of a number of litigations arising from a long, bitter strike against FEC, dating back to January 1963.

BRT members began picketing Terminal—an interchange for most of FEC's freight traffic—in May 1966, shortly after their union joined the strike, which began as a walkout of "non-operating" employes.

State Intervenes

The company—owned by FEC and three other railroads—quickly got a federal injunction against picketing. After it was ruled illegal on appeal, Terminal obtained a state court injunction. It has been appealed and the high court is expected to hear the case in the fall.

An AFL-CIO "friend of the court" brief contends that "the legality of peaceful picketing growing out of a dispute under the Railway Labor Act is governed entirely by federal law."

The federation cites past Supreme Court decisions to show that "federal dominance over the labor relations of the railroads has a long and unbroken history."

Further, the brief notes, there have been many Supreme Court edicts overturning state court injunctions that infringed upon the National Labor Relations Act's control over strikes and picketing.

Listed among them are several Florida court injunctions that were set aside because of their "inability to recognize" that the NLRA prevailed.

If the Supreme Court does not pass on the "preemption" issue, the brief continues, it should remove the BRT injunction because the state court erred in defining the picketing as "secondary" instead of "primary."

The AFL-CIO cites a previous case involving the Steelworkers in which the Supreme Court ruled the union's picketing of a railroad spur adjacent to the struck Carrier Corp. in Syracuse, N.Y., was legal "primary" picketing.

There the high court decided that "Congress intended to preserve (as primary pressure) the right to picket . . . a gate reserved for employes of neutral delivery men furnishing day-to-day service essential to the employer's regular operations."

"The picketing enjoined here fits squarely within the Carrier definition of primary picketing," the brief emphasizes.

Noting that other high court rulings show "the totality of the railway labor law is, at the very least, as solicitous of the right to engage in primary picketing" as the NLRA, the brief reasons:

"Thus, picketing which this court has held is primary under the NLRA must be considered primary under the Railway Labor Act and as such clearly beyond the reach of the states."

Blue Collar Job Experience Valued

Workers with blue-collar experience should be given more consideration by employers in filling white collar jobs, the Labor Dept. said after a study of the subject.

The study, by University of Wisconsin researchers involving 10 percent of Milwaukee County employes, showed that more than 20 percent of workers hired or promoted into white collar jobs during a two-year period had worked at blue collar jobs for at least one year out of the preceding six.

Among those entering managerial jobs, more than 40 percent had blue collar experience. One of every four entering clerical jobs, one of six in professional and technical jobs, one in eight of sales entrants came from blue-collar ranks.

Social, Economic Justice:

Steelworkers Drive Set for Full Rights

Chicago—A big, busy Steelworkers' convention has pledged the union to a relentless drive "to achieve full social and economic justice in the plants in which we work and in the communities in which we live."

The goal was defined in the preamble to a series of resolutions dealing with community activities, international affairs, civil rights, economic policy, the urban crisis, legislation and political action.

These resolutions and others, including those covering organizing and collective bargaining programs, were adopted by the 3,500 delegates during five days of deliberation and debate.

One session was literally marked by "heated" debate—the air-conditioning broke down in the International Amphitheater and the temperature inside soon matched the 95 degrees outside.

The convention was held just prior to the Democratic National Convention—in the same Amphitheater—and labor's role in the election campaign drew major attention from the delegates and speakers.

A political action resolution committed the 1.2 million member union to a "massive campaign" to get all members, their families and other citizens to register and vote in support of liberal candidates.

Election Priority

In resolving to give "the highest priority" to the election, the resolution warned that business groups have indicated a "prime aim" of enacting laws to cripple unions if they can elect a conservative Congress.

"The stakes of the 1968 elections therefore include the welfare of the trade union movement and perhaps its survival as an effective force" for the general welfare, the resolution emphasized.

In an address frequently interrupted by applause, Exec. Dir. Bayard Rustin of the A. Philip Randolph Institute, blasted Republican presidential candidate Richard Nixon for ignoring "social justice" in his fixation on "law and order."

The labor movement, minority groups and liberals must "congeal to make a political movement to create the kind of Congress which is prepared to bring justice to all men, black or white, or this country is doomed," Rustin declared.

"I urge you to urge your black brothers never to desert such a coalition of forces," he continued, "for it is the only one capable of saving us."

Negroes on Voting

Negroes who take the attitude "what's the use" and "why should I vote" and decide not to vote are playing into the hands of the Ku Klux Klan and race-haters who say Negroes should not be able to vote, Rustin warned.

Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz told the delegates that the nation must understand that "law and order" not only includes making neighborhoods safe but also making them "mentors of pride for the people who live in them."

He said workers must support candidates who are devoted to "other things that have become part of our law and order"—equality, the right to a job, educational rights and health guarantees.

There were vigorous debates on several proposed constitutional changes, but in the end the delegates left the constitution virtually unchanged.

The convention rejected a series of resolutions that would have, in varying ways, changed the requirements for nominating candidates for international officer or district director.

Instead, the delegates upheld a recommendation of the constitution committee to retain present machinery that specifies that a nominee for district director must be backed by five locals plus one additional local for each 10,000 USWA members in the district.

A nominee for president, vice president or secretary-treasurer needs the support of five local plus one more local for each 10,000 members of the union.

A collective bargaining resolution stressed a "commitment" to continue a strong unionizing program among a potential of 500,000 unorganized women employed in industries in which the union has jurisdiction.

Steel Conference

The convention approved a campaign being carried out by the union's officers to set up an international steel conference which would stabilize international steel trade. It also called for "reasonable quotas" on steel imports into the United States.

Convention speakers included Mayor Richard G. Hatcher of Gary, Ind.; C. W. Blackburn, executive director of the Board for Fundamental Education with which USWA participates; COPE Dir. Alexander E. Barkan; Longshoremen's Pres. Thomas W. Gleason, and David Lewis, parliamentary leader of the New Democratic Party of Canada.

McCracken, 55, Dies; Official of Glass Union

Columbus, O.—Lewis McCracken, 55, secretary-treasurer of the Glass & Ceramic Workers for the past 25 years, died in University Hospital here Aug. 25. He had suffered a coronary attack Aug. 1 at the union's convention in Florida.

McCracken, who was born in Butler, Pa., went to work for Franklin Glass Co. there in 1933, helped organize the plant a year later and became Local 15's financial secretary.

He was elected secretary-treasurer of the international in 1943, and re-elected every two years thereafter in the union's referendum election. The union will hold a special referendum to fill out the term which expires next April.

A telegram from AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany and AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler, sent to Pres. Ralph Reiser, mourned McCracken's passing as "a great loss to the labor movement and most especially to your union, which he served so long and so well."

Employment Service Fills 8.1 Million Jobs

More than a million employers called upon the Federal-State employment service to fill 8.1 million jobs in the year ended June 30. More than 10.5 million persons filed job applications with local offices of the Employment Services in the same period, according to the Labor Dept.'s Manpower Administration.

Record 2-Month Rise:

Mortgage Rate, Health Care Send Living Costs Soaring

The cost of living shot up by five-tenths of 1 percent in July, the same as it had done in June, for the biggest two-month increase in 11 years, the Labor Dept. reported.

With the boost came a loss in real earnings for the average worker, partly because of slackening in gross pay, but mostly because of the sharp increase in consumer prices.

The only bright spot in the July picture was the report by the Bureau of Labor Statistics that preliminary figures on August wholesale prices indicated a lesser climb than in the past two months. Spoksemen for the bureau said that they expected a smaller increase in living costs during August with the likelihood that the increases will slacken off.

There were two big factors in the July statistics which showed the Consumer Price Index at a high of 121.5, which means that there has been more than a 20 percent boost in living costs since the index was established in the 1957-59 period. They were mortgage interest rates, up 4 percent over the month, and medical care costs, which had slackened off somewhat during June, but again resumed their rapid climb in July with a seven-tenths of 1 percent rise.

Interest rates are now 13 percent higher than they were a year ago, while medical care costs are up more than 7 percent over the year. Doctors' fees, especially dentists' fees, climbed again and are now 5 percent higher than they were a year ago.

Other items that went up during July included textiles, apparel and lumber. Taxes, insurance rates and personal services also climbed. Even fees for baby-sitters went up.

Food prices increased eight-tenths of a point, with the likelihood that they will register another increase for August because of a 1.6 percent jump in wholesale prices. Higher prices for meats, poultry, fresh fruits and eggs were chiefly responsible for the wholesale price upswing.

About a million workers will receive hourly pay boosts based on the national and city indexes for July. Some 800,000 are employed in automobile and farm construction equipment industries. They will get an 8-cent boost—the maximum permitted in the first annual adjustment under their three-year contracts negotiated in 1967 and 1968.

Another 100,000 employed in the aerospace industry will receive a 4-cent increase based on the rise in the national index since April. Increases for the remaining 100,000 will range between 1 cent and 6 cents.

Gross earnings for the average worker and his take-home pay went up during July, but more slowly than in the past two months. Real earnings—that is, buying power—however, were slightly below June levels. Gross earnings increased by 57 cents a week to $109.16. After adjustment for price increases, real earnings dropped 1 cent over the month for a worker with no dependents and dropped 3 cents for the worker with three dependents.

On an over-the-year basis, the worker with no dependents has lost 42 cents in buying power. The worker with three dependents and lower taxes has gained 44 cents.

Production workers in manufacturing with higher pay levels were in the same boat. The worker with no dependents lost $1.13 in buying power over the month, while the worker with three dependents lost $1.21.

Letter Carriers Elect Rademacher President

Boston—James H. Rademacher—the son, brother and brother-in-law of men who carry the mail—stepped up to become the new president of the Letter Carriers.

The union's 46th biennial convention here elected Rademacher by acclamation to succeed Jerome J. Keating, who retired after 41 years service with the union and the post office.

In five days of jam-packed sessions, the 3,713 delegates elected other NALC officers, heard addresses from congressional leaders and acted on a long list of resolutions. Some actions were preceded by vigorous debate.

Right to Strike

The convention passed a resolution instructing its national officers to "investigate fully the legal and legislative technicalities involved so that government employes may be accorded the right to strike by Congress."

NALC's officers also were instructed to study "the feasibility" of removing the no-strike oath which federal workers must take as a condition of employment.

The resolution was adopted as a substitute for another resolution which demanded that the strike ban be removed from Executive Order 10988, the government's program for labor-management relations.

NALC is the third AFL-CIO union to act in the area of strikes by government employes. Earlier, the Postal Clerks and Fire Fighters dropped no-strike bans from their constitutions.

The chairman of the Senate Post Office Committee, Sen. Mike Monroney (D-Okla.), however, urged the union not to press for the right to strike.

Delegates here unanimously approved a resolution expressing "total disagreement" with the plan to transfer Post Office functions to a non-profit corporation as has been proposed by a White House commission.

The proposal also was attacked by members of Congress who spoke at the convention, including Sen. Ralph W. Yarborough (D-Tex.), Sen. Daniel B. Brewster (D-Md.), and Representative Charles H. Wilson (D-Calif.) and Arnold Olsen (D-Mont.)

"What the American people need is not a postal corporation," Olsen declared, "they need a greater investment in the present system—in machines, sure, but most of all in the human beings who work in it."

The convention approved measures calling for cost of living pay increases, higher wages for letter carriers, maximum salary levels after five years, and restoration of two mail deliveries a day in residential areas.

The delegates enacted a resolution demanding that no letter carrier be compelled to work overtime except in December, during the Christmas mail rush.

Earlier the delegates had given a roaring welcome to Vice Pres. Humphrey, who spoke shortly before the Democratic convention, and had held a gala parade through the streets of downtown Boston.

Rademacher, the union's vice president and a letter carrier for 27 years, was nominated for the top post by retired Pres. William C. Doherty and had the strong support of Keating.

J. Stanley Lewis, who has served as NALC secretary-treasurer since 1962, was elected to succeed Rademacher as vice president. William T. Sullivan, a member of the Union's executive board and field director of the Boston region, is the newly elected secretary-treasurer.

Soup Strike Continues, Camden Local Settles

A strike and nationwide boycott against the Campbell Soup Co. will be continued at five company plants until a settlement is reached at all plants, the striking unions announced.

Members of Meat Cutters Local 80-A at Camden, N.J., voted to accept a new two-year contract providing wage increases of 13 cents an hour this year, and an additional 15 cents next year; improvements in pension, vacation, and hospitalization programs; and changes in contract language affecting local conditions.

The pact covers 2,800 Camden workers. Still unsettled are contracts covering 7,400 members of the Machinists, Meat Cutters and Teamsters at Camden and Moorestown, N.J.; Napoleon, Ohio, Chestertown, Md., Paris, Tex. and Sacramento, Calif.

The one-location agreement followed meetings called in Philadelphia by the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service.

It represents a wage improvement over a company offer made before the strike started late in July, and some updating in vacation and pension benefits, according to the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept., which has been coordinating the negotiations.

The Camden contract also improved vacation, pension and health care benefits.

The AFL-CIO Executive Council assured the unions of "complete support" and federation Pres. George Meany called on all trade unionists to support the boycott until Campbell management agreed to "real collective bargaining."

Campbell products on the boycott list included the brand names of Campbell Soups and Foods, Pepperidge Farm, Swanson Frozen Foods and V-8 Products, and Bounty labels.

P. O. Delivery Union Acts On Per Capita

Memphis—An all-day seminar on grievance handling and "adverse action" procedures was a feature of the Special Delivery Messengers convention attended by 115 delegates from 55 locals.

The convention voted to increase per capita dues payments from $1.50 to $1.75 a month; created the office of executive vice president to assist the president at national headquarters and in the field; and voted new two-year terms for all officers.

The new officer is John J. Ayers of Miami, Fla. Returned without challenge were Pres. Michael J. Cullen, Sec.-Treas. John K. Dunning, and Vice Presidents Robert J. Eimer, St. Louis; Wade Sherritze, Knoxville, Tenn.; Joseph F. Gadas, Chicago; Robert Butler, Jr., Cleveland, and Frank H. Thompson, Los Angeles.

The grievance seminar was conducted by Otto Pragan, assistant director of education for the AFL-CIO; Operations Dir. John McCart of the AFL-CIO Government Employes Council, and Arthur Kane of the Government Employes' education department.

Delegates reported that the difficulty of negotiating meaningful contracts at the local level remains a major source of membership dissatisfaction.

Officers reported that membership has more than doubled since 1962. The convention chose Minneapolis as the site of the next convention in 1970.

Willis Zagrovich Heads Indiana State AFL-CIO

Indianapolis—The Indiana AFL-CIO named Willis Zagrovich as president succeeding Dallas Sells of the Auto Workers, resigned. Zagrovich, a Steelworker from Gary, will serve until an election is held at the state federation convention here Oct. 17.

California Labor Blasts Reagan For False Data on Grape Dispute

San Francisco—The California AFL-CIO called a foul on Gov. Ronald Reagan for spreading "false" information about the grape pickers' strike and urged that, "instead of siding so vociferously with the growers," he induce them to bargain with the union the strikers have chosen to represent them.

Reagan sent wires to Vice Pres. Hubert H. Humphrey, the governors of Oregon and Washington and the mayors of San Francisco and Vancouver, B.C., attacking the boycott of California grapes.

Saying the boycott "has nothing to do with working or living conditions," Reagan claimed that the earnings of California farm workers are "the highest in the U.S."

Sec.-Treas. Thomas L. Pitts of the state AFL-CIO said government reports show the average hourly rate in Washington state as higher and that in Hawaii "much higher."

Pitts said Reagan "conveniently overlooked" the fact that median earnings of the state's regular farm workers are less than $1,400 a year or $27 a week.

"The workers want a union," Pitts said in rebuttal telegrams. "The United Farm Workers Organizing Committee has offered to meet with the growers; the growers have steadfastly refused. The UFWOC has agreed to representation elections; the growers have refused."

Elsewhere on the grape front:

- Mayor Alfonso J. Cervantes, St. Louis, ordered city employes to halt all purchases of California grapes as a "tangible indication of support for striking agricultural laborers in California who seek union organization and free collective bargaining."

The order parallels similar action in New York, Detroit, Chicago and other cities and an agreement by Cleveland chain grocers to post "Don't Buy" signs in their stores.

- The Boston Tea Party was recreated when 400 boycott supporters threw grapes into Boston harbor at the site where American colonists once threw British tea overboard.
- The Minnesota Rabbinical Association voted to implement a decision by the American Jewish Committee and eight other national Jewish organizations to protest "repressive measures" by growers against farm workers. The rabbis agreed to protest "intolerable" working conditions and urge their congregations to support the boycott.

Goldberg Appointed Princeton Professor

Former Ambassador to the United Nations Arthur Goldberg—now a mediator for the garment industry—has been named to a professorship at Princeton University. Goldberg, who also was Secretary of Labor and a Supreme Court justice, will conduct a graduate seminar in international negotiations.

Highlights of '68 Democratic Platform

On this page the AFL-CIO News reproduces excerpts of key portions of the platform adopted by the Democratic National Convention in Chicago. The subject headings are those used by the AFL-CIO in its presentation to the Democratic Platform Committee and do not appear in the platform.

Economic Issues and Jobs

We will continue to use tax policy to maintain steady economic growth by helping through tax reduction to stimulate the economy when it is sluggish and through temporary tax increases to restrain inflation.

We support a proposal for a minimum income tax for persons of high income based on an individual's total income regardless of source in order that wealthy persons will be required to make some kind of income tax contribution, no matter how many tax shelters they use to protect their incomes.

We also support a reduction of the tax burden on the poor by lowering the income tax rates at the bottom of the tax scale and increasing the minimum standard deduction. No person or family below the poverty level should be required to pay federal income taxes.

The minimum standards covering terms and conditions of employment must be improved:

—By increasing the minimum wage (and) extending the minimum wage and overtime provisions of the Fair Labor Standards Act to all workers.

—By occupational health and safety legislation.

—By assuring that the "green card" worker does not depress wages and conditions of employment for American workers.

—By updating of the benefit provisions of the Longshoremen & Harbor Workers Act.

The unemployment compensation program should be modernized by national minimum standards for level and duration of benefits, eligibility, and universal coverage.

To the maximum possible extent our national goal of full employment should be realized through creation of jobs in the private economy, where six of every seven Americans now work.

For those who can work but cannot find jobs, we pledge to expand public job and job-training programs, including the Neighborhood Youth Corps, to provide meaningful employment in state and local government and non-profit institutions.

For those who cannot obtain other employment, the federal government will be the employer of last resort.

Civil Rights

We acknowledge with concern the findings of the report of the bi-partisan National Advisory Commission on Civil Disorders and we commit ourselves to implement its recommendations.

The Civil Rights Acts of 1964 and 1968 and the Voting Rights Act of 1965, all adopted under the vigorous leadership of Pres. Johnson, are basic to America's long march toward full equality.

We will not permit these great gains to be chipped away by opponents or eroded by administrative neglect. We pledge effective and impartial enforcement of these laws. If they prove inadequate, or if their compliance provisions fail to serve their purposes, we will propose new laws. In particular, the enforcement provisions of the legislation prohibiting discrimination in employment should be strengthened. This will be done as a matter of first priority.

Urban Crisis

In the decaying slums of our larger cities, where so many of our poor are concentrated, the attack on poverty must embrace many interrelated aspects of development—economic development, the rehabilitation or replacement of dilapidated and unsafe housing, job training and placement, and the improvement of education, health, recreation, crime control, welfare and other public services.

As the framework of such an effort, we will continue to support the Model Cities program under which communities themselves are planning and carrying out the most comprehensive plans ever put together for converting their worst slum areas into model neighborhoods —with full participation and leadership by the neighborhood residents themselves.

Some of the most urgent jobs in the revival of the inner city remain undone because the hazards are too great and the rewards too limited to attract sufficient private capital. To meet this problem, we will charter a new federal banking structure to provide capital and investment guarantees for urban projects planned and implemented through local initiative. We will also enact legislation providing tax incentives for new business and industrial enterprises in the inner city.

We are firm in our commitment that equal justice under law shall be denied to no one.

We pledge a vigorous and sustained campaign against lawlessness in all its forms—organized crime, white collar crime, rioting, and other violations of the rights and liberties of others. We will further this campaign by attack on the root causes of crime and disorder.

In fighting crime we must not foster injustice. Lawlessness cannot be ended by curtailing the hard-won liberties of all Americans.

Labor and Management

We will thoroughly review and update the National Labor Relations Act to assure an effective opportunity to all workers to exercise the right to organize and to bargain collectively, including such amendments as:

—Repeal of the provision permitting states to enact compulsory open shop laws.

—Extension of the Act's protection to farm workers, employes of private non-profit organizations, and other employes not now covered.

—Removal of unreasonable restrictions upon the right of peaceful picketing, including situs picketing.

—Speedier decisions in unfair labor practice cases and representation proceedings.

—Greater equality between the remedies available under the Act to labor and those available to management.

—Effective opportunities for unions as well as employers to communicate with employes, without coercion by either side or by anyone acting in their behalf.

The federal government will not do business with firms that repeatedly violate federal statutes prohibiting discrimination against employes who are union members or refuse to bargain with duly authorized union representatives.

We support continued application of the principles of collective bargaining to federal employment.

Social and Public Needs

Economic growth is our first antipoverty program. The best avenue to an independent, confident citizenry is a dynamic, full-employment economy.

We support community action agencies and their programs, such as Head Start, that will prevent the children of the poor from becoming the poor of the next generation. We support the extension of neighborhood centers. We are committed to the principle of meaningful participation of the poor in policy-making and administration of community action and related programs.

We will fully fund Title I of the Elementary & Secondary Education Act of 1965, which provides federal funds for improving education in schools serving large numbers of students from low income families.

We will enlarge the federal scholarship program to remove the remaining financial barriers to post-secondary education for low income youths, and increase assistance to students in the form of repayable loan out of future income.

We will assist private enterprise to double its volume of homebuilding, to an annual rate of 2.6 million units a year—a 10-year total of 26 million units.

We will give the highest priority to federally-assisted home-building for low income families.

We support expanded programs of assistance to mass transit in order to avoid increasing congestion and decay of center cities and to link residential and work areas.

We will press forward with the effort to develop high-speed passenger trains to serve major urban areas.

To assume our proper place as a leading maritime nation, we must launch an aggressive and balanced program to replace and augment our obsolete merchant ships with modern vessels built in American shipyards. We will assist U.S. flag operators to overcome the competitive disparity between American and foreign operating costs.

Foreign Policy and Defense

Our most urgent task in Southeast Asia is to end the war in Viet Nam by an honorable and lasting settlement which respects the rights of all the people of Viet Nam.

We reject as unacceptable a unilateral withdrawal of our forces which would allow that aggression and subversion to succeed. We have never demanded, and do not now demand, unconditional surrender by the Communists.

We strongly support the Paris talks and applaud the initiative of Pres. Johnson which brought North Viet Nam to the peace table.

Recognizing that events in Viet Nam and the negotiations in Paris may affect the timing and the actions we recommend, we would support our government in the following steps:

—Stop all bombing of North Viet Nam when this action would not endanger the lives of our troops in the field; this action should take into account the response from Hanoi.

Negotiate with Hanoi an immediate end or limitation of hostilities and the withdrawal from South Viet Nam of all foreign forces—both United States and allied forces, and forces infiltrated from North Viet Nam.

Encourage parties and interests to agree that the choice of the postwar government of South Viet Nam should be determined by fair and safeguarded elections, open to all major political factions and parties prepared to accept peaceful political processes.

Until the fighting stops, accelerate our efforts to train and equip the South Vietnamese army so that it can defend its own country and carry out cutbacks of U.S. military involvement as the South Vietnamese forces are able to take over their larger responsibilities.

- The tragic events in Czechoslovakia are a shocking reminder that we live in a dangerous and unpredictable world. The Soviet attack on and invasion of a small country that only yesterday was Moscow's peaceful ally, is an ominous reversal of the slow trend toward greater freedom and independence in eastern Europe.
- The Middle East remains a powder keg. As long as Israel is threatened by hostile and well-armed neighbors, we will assist her with essential military equipment needed for her defense, including the most advanced types of combat aircraft.
- We shall build upon the Trade Expansion Act of 1962 and the Kennedy Round of trade negotiations, in order to achieve greater trade cooperation and progress toward freer international trade.

To lessen the hardships suffered by industries and workers as the results of trade liberalization, we support improvements in the adjustment assistance provisions of present law. Provisions of law to remedy unfair and destructive import competition should be reviewed and strengthened, and negotiated international agreements to achieve this purpose should be employed where appropriate.

- The lives of millions of young men are deeply affected by the requirement for military service. We support a system of selection which will reduce the time period of eligibility for the draft and ensure equality in selection procedures.

Government Administration

- We fully recognize the principle of one man, one vote in all elections. We urge that due consideration be given to the question of presidential primaries throughout the nation. We urge reform of the Electoral College and election procedures to assure that the votes of the people are fully reflected.

We will also seek to eliminate disenfranchisement of voters who change residence during an election year.

The Democratic Party supports full citizenship for residents of the District of Columbia and a constitutional amendment to grant such citizenship through voting representation in Congress, until this can be satisfied we propose non-voting representation.

- We will support a constitutional amendment lowering the voting age to 18.

Social Security and Health

- Benefits, especially minimum benefits, under old age, survivors, and disability insurance, should be raised to overcome present inadequacies and thereafter should be adjusted automatically to reflect increases in living costs.

Medical care for the aged should be expanded to include the costs of prescription drugs.

Medical care should be extended to disabled beneficiaries under the Old Age, Survivors & Disability Insurance Act.

- Every American family whose income is not sufficient to enable them to live in decency should receive assistance free of the indignities and uncertainties that still too often mar our present programs.

Income payments and eligibility standards for the aged, the blind, the disabled and dependent children should be determined and financed on a federal basis—in place of the present inequitable, under-financed hodge-podge state plans.

Congress has temporarily suspended the restrictive amendment of 1967 that placed an arbitrary limit on the number of dependent children who can be aided in each state. We favor permanent repeal of that restriction and of the provision requiring mothers of young children to work.

Medicare programs administered by the states should have uniform standards so that no mother or child is denied necessary health services. Finally, we urge consideration of a program comparable to medicare to finance pre-natal care for mothers and post-natal care for children during the first year of life.

Forthright Liberal Programs Mark Democratic Platform

ment are essential to our system of free enterprise and economic democracy."

It pledges a thorough review and updating of the National Labor Relations Act "to assure an effective opportunity to all workers to exercise the right to organize and to bargain collectively."

This overhaul of the basic labor law, the platform goes on, will include amendments to repeal Section 14(b) permitting states to enact compulsory open shop laws, extend coverage to farm workers and employes of non-profit organizations; remove restrictions on the right of peaceful picketing including on-site picketing by construction unions, speed decisions of the National Labor Relations Board and strengthen the remedies available to it, and give unions equal rights with employers to communicate with workers.

The platform declares that the government "will not do business with" companies which repeatedly violate their workers' rights to organize or which refuse to bargain with their unions.

"By all these means," the platform continues, "we will sustain the right of workers to organize in unions of their own choosing and will foster truly effective collective bargaining to provide the maximum opportunity for just and fair agreements between management and labor."

Foreign Policy Planks

The platform planks dealing with foreign affairs and national defense run the range from the Soviet Union's invasion of Czechoslovakia to U.S. support for the state of Israel against the threats of its hostile Arab neighbors.

It warned that the invasion of Czechoslovakia and "reimposition of Soviet tyranny raises the spectre of the darkest days of the Stalin era."

But the debate focused almost solely on Viet Nam. As finally adopted, the plank declares the nation's "most urgent task" to be ending the war in Viet Nam and achieving a "lasting settlement" which respects the rights of "all the people of Viet Nam." The platform rejects as "unacceptable" a unilateral withdrawal of troops which would allow "aggression and subversion" to succeed.

It gives strong support to the Paris peace talks and applauds Pres. Johnson's initiative in bringing North Viet Nam to the peace table.

The platform calls for a halt in the bombing of North Viet Nam "when this action would not endanger the lives of our troops in the field; this action should take into account the response from Hanoi."

An alliance of McCarthy-McGovern supporters sought, in hours of emotion-charged debate, to persuade the convention to adopt a substitute plank. This called for an unconditional halt in the bombing, a phased withdrawal of all foreign forces and recognition of the National Liberation Front—the political arm of the Viet Cong—in forming a postwar government.

In the end, however, the superior numbers of Administration supporters, lined up behind Vice Pres. Humphrey, prevailed on the issue as they had on a series of earlier votes over rules and credentials.

The final roll call vote was 1,567 in favor of the majority report, 1,041 for the McCarthy-McGovern alternative.

The platform provides a full-scale review of the accomplishments of the Democratic administrations of the late Pres. Kennedy and Johnson, including "a 90-month period of recession-free prosperity, the lowest and strongest period of sustained economic growth in American history."

For the future, it pledges, among other things to:

- Continue the economic policies "that more than doubled the nation's rate of economic expansion in the past eight years and can double and redouble our national income by the end of this century."
- Revamp federal taxes "to make them more equitable as between rich and poor and as among people with the same income and family responsibilities."
- Improve the "minimum standards" covering terms and conditions of employment by increasing the minimum wage and extending its protection to all workers, enacting occupational health and safety legislation, assuring that "green card" foreign workers do not depress wages and conditions of American workers, updating the Longshoremen & Harbor Workers Act, and modernizing the unemployment insurance program through national minimum standards of benefits and coverage.
- Reduce the tax burden on the poor "by lowering the income tax rates at the bottom of the tax scale and increasing the minimum standard deduction."
- Develop programs "that will enable members of minority groups to obtain the financing and technical management assistance needed to succeed in launching and operating new enterprises."
- Extend protective legislation for consumers and establish a federal office of consumer affairs.
- Press the goal of the new housing act to provide "a decent home and suitable living environment for every American family."
- Expand programs of aid to mass transit and highway construction.
- Strengthen the nation's railroads, particularly in pressing the development of high-speed passenger train service.
- Launch "an aggressive and balanced program to replace and augment our obsolete merchant ships with modern vessels built in American shipyards" and to assist U.S. flag operators "to overcome the competitive disparity between American and foreign operating costs."
- Broaden the war on poverty, "guided by the recommendations of the National Advisory Commission on Civil Disorders concerning jobs, housing, urban renewal, and education on a scale commensurate with the needs of the urban ghettos," and guided by the report of the Commission on Rural Poverty "in tackling the equally compelling problems of the rural slums."
- Wipe out, "once and for all, the stain of racial and other discrimination from our national life" through the "effective and impartial enforcement" of the civil rights laws and the enactment of new laws where they prove necessary.
- Extend and adequately finance the model cities program to more cities and more neighborhoods.
- Marshal "the resources and leadership" of private enterprise in the attack on slums and poverty, including "such incentives as may be essential for that purpose."
- Push ahead with programs for full employment, including expansion of public job and training programs for those who cannot find work and establishment of the federal government as the "employer of last resort."
- Raise social security benefits to overcome present inequities with automatic adjustments thereafter to reflect rising living costs.
- Expand medicare to cover the cost of prescription drugs.
- Establish federal standards for welfare payments to the aged, the blind, the disabled and dependent children "in place of the present inequitable, under-financed hodgepodge state plans."
- Make "a national commitment that no Americans should have to go hungry or undernourished" and to implement it "through continued improvement and expansion of our food programs."
- Extend medicare to disabled social security beneficiaries to the same extent that it is available to the aged.
- Support a constitutional amendment lowering the voting age to 18.
- Support a "random" system of military draft selection which will reduce the time period of eligibility and ensure equality in selection procedures.
- Improve the conditions of public service through a program that includes "continued application of the principles of collective bargaining to federal employment."
- Give full recognition to "the principle of one man, one vote in all elections," urging due consideration to the question of presidential primaries throughout the nation and reform of the Electoral College and election procedures "to assure that the votes of the people are fully reflected."
- Assume leadership "in removing all remaining barriers to voter registration" and "seek to eliminate disenfranchisement of voters who change residence during an election year."
- Support self-government and full citizenship for residents of the District of Columbia, including a constitutional amendment for voting representation in Congress.
- Wage "a vigorous and sustained campaign against lawlessness in all its forms—organized crime, white collar crime, rioting and other violations of the rights and liberties of others" and to further this campaign "by attack on the root causes of crime and disorder."

Labor Delegates Rally To Humphrey Support to the nation and to the entire free world."

He recalled his early association with organized labor as mayor of Minneapolis in 1947 and 1948, but observed that this is "a changed America and a changed world, and we must redirect the forces of change."

Citing the gains achieved by unions through collective bargaining, he declared, "we have to take our collective bargaining to the people."

Humphrey warned that his Republican opponent, former Vice Pres. Richard M. Nixon will be "no soft touch," but he ridiculed the suggestion that there is a "new" Nixon.

"He was renewed in 1952," Humphrey observed, "and again in 1956. He got another renewal in 1960, and a touch-up job in 1966, so he can't be very new."

In a reference to Nixon's reliance and association with Sen. Strom Thurmond of South Carolina, the Dixiecrat turned Republican who was one of the leading figures consulted on the choice of the GOP vice presidential candidate, Humphrey asked:

"How many things are going to have to be cleared through Strom?"

"The new Nixon with the old record and the old Strom is not what this nation needs."

The Vice President called on labor, in its drive to register union members and their families and get out the vote on Election Day, to approach the campaign "with the same enthusiasm as when you organized your unions."

Meany, too, lashed out at Nixon, telling his audience:

"If you don't know Nixon and what he represents, then you don't belong in the labor movement. His record is there."

In 1959, he noted, Nixon as vice president cast the tie-breaking vote in the Senate to pass the Landrum-Griffin Act, saddling unions with repressive amendments to the National Labor Relations Act.

As for the "new" Nixon, Meany said, "he may have a new grin, but in back of that grin he's still the same guy."

The AFL-CIO president said he was in Chicago, "as part of my job, to try to see that we get a platform and a candidate that show understanding" of labor's needs and objectives.

Noting that he had made the same presentation to the Republican Resolutions Committee, he observed that after reading the GOP platform, "I wondered if I'd been in Miami at all."

He told the delegates that while they were selected through the Democratic Party machinery and were free to vote for the candidates of their choice, "you cannot escape the fact that you are here as trade unionists as well."

And labor, he noted, has more at stake in the 1968 election perhaps "than any other segment of American society."

The things that labor has achieved, he went on, "didn't just happen" because "politicans in smoke-filled rooms" or the Chamber of Commerce "decided they were good for us." They happened, he said, "because there was a trade union movement to fight for them."

He urged the delegates to keep in mind, throughout the campaign the record of the Johnson-Humphrey Administration, declaring:

"On the cold record of facts, no administration in the history of this country has written more legislation of benefit to the little people of the United States—and that's us—than has the Johnson-Humphrey Administration."

Urging an all-out campaign aimed at "getting votes into the ballot box," he noted that the percentage of union members who vote "isn't any better than the rest of the country"—about 65 percent.

"If we could raise this by just 10 points," he urged, "we could be sure about how the election goes in November."

Alaska's Sen. Gruening Loses Renomination Bid

The long political career of Alaska's 81-year-old Sen. Ernest Gruening apparently neared an end after he was defeated by Mike Gravel for the Democratic senatorial nomination in the state's primary election.

Gravel, 38, an Anchorage real estate developer, led 16,820 to 14,354 with 373 of Alaska's 410 precincts counted. It appeared unlikely that uncounted precincts in Alaska's remote interior and absentee ballots would change the outcome.

The main theme of Gravel's campaign was that Greuning was too old and that it was time for a change. Greuning was territorial governor for 13 years before coming to the Senate, when Alaska became a state in 1959. Earlier he had been director of territories in the Interior Dept.

Anchorage banker Elmer Rasmuson won the Republican nomination for the Senate over State Rep. Ted Stevens. Nicholas J. Begich won the Democratic nomination for the state's one House seat. Rep. Howard W. Pollock, GOP incumbent, was unopposed.

In other primary elections:

In Oklahoma, Sen. A. S. Mike Monroney (D-Okla.) easily won renomination over four opponents. He will face former Gov. Henry Bellmon, who was unopposed for the GOP nomination for the Senate. All six sitting congressmen—four Democrats and two Republicans—were renominated, including House Majority Leader Carl Albert.

In New Mexico, Republican Gov. David Cargo won renomination for another term over one opponent. He will face Fabian Chavez who defeated five opponents for the Democratic gubernatorial nomination.

Labor Day 1968

THIS LABOR DAY 1968 is the 86th anniversary of a holiday inspired and brought to reality by a handful of trade unionists struggling to assert the basic rights and dignity of the American worker.

In the years since the first Labor Day parade in 1882 the meaning of Labor Day has at times seemed to be drained away into a celebration marking the end of summer vacations, the beginning of a new school year, the last three-day holiday during the warm weather.

But for the trade union movement it is still a day of dedication and rededication—to the unfinished tasks of securing for all workers the same basic rights that were fought for 86 years ago.

As long as there are workers who are denied social justice, who are not represented in an industrial democracy, whose political rights are mocked, labor's work is not done. On this Labor Day there is the simple realization that the work is still unfinished, that the battle goes forward.

THE MOST IMPORTANT aspect of that battle in immediate and overriding terms is the national elections. There is no higher priority than the election of a new Administration and a new Congress that will give voice and direction toward achieving labor's goals of social justice, equal rights and human dignity for all who work for a living.

To continue the progress of the past 86 years the labor movement must first of all remain free and strong and viable. And in this election year 1968, the labor movement faces a direct challenge to trade unionism itself, a campaign that can best be described as anti-labor in both motivation and objective.

Sen. Wayne Morse (D-Ore.) spelled out the nature of that attack in a Senate speech shortly before Congress recessed for the national conventions. He said in part:

"Some special interest groups have already begun to apply pressure for legislation next year in the 91st Congress under what they hope will be the leadership of a Republican President. They are also hoping for a more conservative Congress to reverse the wheels of history.

"There is now emerging a well-financed public relations campaign to rewrite the nation's basic labor relations laws, to abolish the National Labor Relations Board and to substitute in its place a labor court or to transfer many of its functions to the federal district courts. . .

"They would erase much of the progress achieved in American labor-management relations in the last three decades by substantially revising the law and the procedures which have been the foundation for that progress."

This campaign, Morse said, is "both serious and dangerous." If it succeeds, he warned, "I fear it will lead to a new era of labor strife which will merely add to our already lengthy list of national problems."

ON THIS LABOR DAY, then, the trade union movement faces a hard challenge to the strength and stability of its continuing record as a major progressive force in American life.

The place to meet that challenge is at the ballot box and the time is now. Election of a liberal and progressive Administration and Congress is vital to the national interest, to continuing national progress and to the future of the labor movement.

Labor Day Messages:

Nation's Three Faiths Ponder Missing Values, Fair Job Rights

LABOR HAS PLAYED an essential role in the growth of America. Its contributions toward achieving workers' rights has been great. But it must push on to win rights for all men, the nation's three major religions stress in their annual Labor Day messages.

The Synagogue Council of America declares:

"There are two values missing from American life on this Labor Day and without them our foundation will never be securely set. First, we need to give the dispossessed a sense of pride. For let it be said clearly: Black men and white men stand in a most dangerous confrontation . . . The black man is still alienated and the white man still grudges him a worthy sense of participation in America's destiny. The black man has not been accorded an honorable place in our society."

And although "the role of American labor has been essential to the meaningful growth of America's life; its contribution to the industrial strength of our country has been large; its record of achievement in the struggle for winning for labor a deserved place in the sun is truly praiseworthy," it still faces the undone task of winning rights for all men.

"These are matters of the gravest import on Labor Day 1968," the Jewish leaders say.

"The American labor movement has a considerable and crucially significant role to play in creating pride-giving jobs and in translating words of concern into deeds of accomplishment.

"Surely, labor can transform its own pride in self and its own concern for others into the kind of noble leadership for which America waits."

THE NATIONAL COUNCIL of Churches also stresses greater need for equal employment opportunities. This task is up to all segments of society —business, labor and the churches themselves.

"Our responsibility both as churches and as labor organizations must be to challenge the business community to abandon its discriminatory policies and practices," the Protestant church body urges.

"Let acknowledgement of our own guilt be the first word from the church . . . ".

It also called on labor to improve its position on minority groups.

"There are indeed many bright spots in the record of labor," the council points out, "as indeed bright spots can be found among employers.

"The official policies of organized labor have long espoused equal employment opportunity. Some unions have been in the forefront of the struggle for equal opportunity. Nevertheless, there still is far too much exclusiveness and discrimination by many union locals and few international unions.

The Council of Churches called on labor, employer and religious groups to:

- Encourage equal employment practices in all fields, with more than "token" employment of minority group members in the more skilled and prestigious jobs.
- Oppose discrimination in any apprenticeship or work training programs.
- Examine job testing procedures to insure that all persons of minority groups who are capable of performing a certain job are not screened out because of cultural differences.
- See that city transportation systems provide job accessibility for minority persons, and urge that low and middle income housing be built in the suburbs for the persons who work in those areas.

THE SOCIAL ACTION DEPT. of the U.S. Catholic Conference encourages the labor movement to further expand its emphasis on civil rights.

"It has already made a significant commitment," the Catholic leaders point out, through its construction trades unions "to encourage and recruit Negro membership and apprentice programs."

"If this and a number of similar commitments on the part of organized labor are intensified and fully implemented, the time will come—and sooner the better—when labor's critics will no longer be able to question or ridicule the statement recently made by one of the nation's leading civil rights leaders that 'despite discriminatory practices, the labor movement . . . remains the most integrated institution in our society'."

The Catholic leaders also emphasize the need for creating jobs for the unemployed millions in the United States.

"Large scale development of new jobs in the public sector and improved job training programs under government auspices are also required."

Labor and management are urged to team up to sponsor a massive campaign in support of many other programs recommended by the National Advisory Commission on Civil Disorders.

Housing, education, health and welfare programs will require unprecedented levels of funding and performance—just as the Kerner commission recommended. Quoting the commission, the Catholic Conference notes: "There can be no higher priority for national action and no higher claim on the nation's conscience."

Democratic Keynoter Warns:

Violence Uproots Basic Rights, Turns Protests Into Anarchy

The following is excerpted from the keynote address to the Democratic National Convention by Sen. Daniel K. Inouye of Hawaii.

THE REVOLUTION we in the United States are experiencing was born of democratic processes that not only accomodate economic progress and social mobility, but actively encourage them.

But it is important to remember that these expectations are the children of progress and that today's restlessness has been nurtured by our very real achievements. Out of these should emerge a brighter. better society than we have known.

Nowhere is this clearer than in the situation of our young people today. The success of our economic system has freed them in ever-increasing numbers from the tragedies of premature mortality and early labor.

It has built the schools in which they are being educated to higher levels than ever in the world's history. And this progress has been achieved in a political system which not only admits but safeguards the right of dissent.

So it should hardly surprise us when the children of such progress demand to be heard when they become aware of inequities still to be corrected. Neither should we fear their voices. On the contrary, whether we know it or not, the marching feet of youth have led us into a new era of politics and we can never turn back.

What should concern us is something far more fundamental. The true dimension of the challenge facing us is a loss of faith.

I do not mean simply a loss of religious faith, although this erosion is a major contributor to our unease. I mean a loss of faith in our country, its purposes and its institutions. I mean a retreat from the responsibilities of citizenship.

The plain fact is that in the face of complexity and frustration, too many Americans have drifted into the use of power for purely destructive purposes. Too many Americans have come to believe it is their right to decide, as individuals, which of our laws they will obey and which they will violate.

I do not mean to say that all our laws are just. They are not. I do not mean to suggest that protest against unjust laws is not proper. Performed in an orderly manner, the right to protest is a cornerstone of our system.

Men must have the opportunity to be heard, even when their views are extreme and, in a lesser country, dangerous. I, too, have spoken against laws I considered wrong. I am sure I will speak—and vote—against many more.

But I have not burned my birth certificate and I will not renounce my citizenship.

Those who would do such things are relatively few, but there is a much larger number in the face of change and disorder have retreated into disengagement and quiet despair. Less destructively but no less surely, such men are also retreating from the responsibilities of citizenship.

Now let us not deceive ourselves about the consequences of such abdication. It is anarchy. It is a state in which each individual demands instant compliance with his own desires.

FROM THERE IT IS but a short step to the assumption by each individual of the right to decide which of his neighbors shall live and with shall not. So accelerates the sickening spiral of violence which has already cost us John F. Kennedy, Martin Luther King Jr. and Robert F. Kennedy.

We have been told that the revolts are against "the system," that "the establishment" must be torn down. But in Paris recently, students cut down hundred-year old trees to erect temporary street barricades.

Those trees had lived through two world wars. Some of them had even survived the revolution of 1848. Were the goals of these students served by the destruction of those trees? How long will it take for their beauty and the vitality they symbolized to grow again? What trees did the students plant in their place?

If we cut down our institutions, public and private, and with indifference starve the systems which have given us our achievements, who will feed the hungry?

Who will train the unskilled? Who will supply the jobs that mean opportunity for the generation whose voices are not yet heard? Who will launch the Marshall Plan needed to rebuild our cities and open opportunity for all Americans?

These undertakings are too great for individuals going their separate ways.

Finally, let us remember that even anarchy is only a way station. Man, the social animal, has always craved order. He has made the most essential function of his government the maintenance of some level of order.

Chaos and anarchy have never been more than preludes to totalitarianism. Tyrants like Adolph Hitler have taught us this before.

So let us reject violence as a means of protest. And let us reject those who preach violence. Let us not tempt those who would hide the evil face of racism behind the mask of law and order.

To permit violence and anarchy to destroy our cities is to spark the beginning of a cancerous growth of doubt, suspicion, fear and hatred that will gradually infect the entire populace.

Poverty, discrimination and deprivation, as evil as they are, do not justify violence and anarchy, do not justify looting or burning, do not justify murder or assassination.

Law and order must be respected and maintained to protect the rights of all citizens.

But let us also resist the temptation to apathy. We can never cure the causes of violence with indifference. And in the last analysis law and order can only rest securely with justice as its foundation.

Civil Rights Director Notes:

Success of 'Outreach' Projects Attested by New Trades Jobs

THE AFL-CIO's civil rights director reported growing success of union-sponsored "outreach" programs aimed at bringing minority group youngsters into building trades jobs.

Donald Slaiman said "as a direct result" of the effort, more than 1,500 young Negroes and other minorities have entered building trades apprenticeships over the last three years—most of them during the last year.

But, he cautioned, apprenticeships alone can't solve the severe youth unemployment problems in the ghettos. The outreach programs are "models for finding good jobs . . . with a high degree of upward mobility," but there has to be more of this kind of effort and a general expansion of job opportunities for all workers to make a real dent in ghetto unemployment, he said.

Slaiman appeared on Labor News Conference, an AFL-CIO produced public service program aired Tuesdays at 7:35 p.m., EDT, on the Mutual Radio Network.

Slaiman said that going beyond the "simplistic view that the only problem was discrimination" has been one of the keys to success in the apprenticeship programs.

THERE IS NOW "realization that recruiting, prepping and motivating" qualified youngsters are essential, he noted, and those elements are emphasized in the outreach programs carried out by the Urban League, the Workers Defense League, the A. Philip Randolph Institute and other groups, in cooperation with building trades unions and councils, with federal financial help.

Questioned about the upcoming elections, Slaiman predicted that "in spite of all the talk of boycott and all the talk of black capitalism, the overwhelming majority of Negroes and other minorities who get registered and get out to vote will vote their own interests, which happen to coincide with the programs and candidates that the labor movement endorses."

Reporters interviewing Slaiman on Labor News Conference, were William Eaton, Washington correspondent for the Chicago Daily News, and Neil Gilbride, labor correspondent for the Associated Press.

By Press Associates, Inc.

NOT MANY DAYS AGO a group of veterans of the legislative wars that produced our social security system met together to celebrate the 33rd anniversary of legislation that Pres. Franklin D. Roosevelt regarded as the "supreme achievement" of his New Deal.

It was a happy occasion since there were so many survivors on hand to celebrate. There was Arthur J. Altmeyer, a member of the original Social Security Board who has often been called the "father" of the social security system. There was also by an oddly rewarding twist of history Wilbur J. Cohen who served on the committee staff that shaped the legislation 33 years ago and is now secretary of Health, Education & Welfare which administers the system. And there was organized labor's own stalwart in the social security battles, Nelson Cruikshank.

The men who gathered together listed happily the great improvements that have been made in the system during the past 33 years. Within four years of enactment of the law worker dependent and survivor benefits were added. At the end of five years, first benefits were paid. At the end of 15 years the program had so proved itself that coverage was extended.

In 1952 and 1954 benefits were increased to help meet rising living costs. In 1956 disability insurance was added and two years later disabled worker dependent benefits were added. By 1965 a major step was taken—addition of medicare, or health insurance for the aged. And only last year benefits again were increased.

But the struggle for improvements is far from over. Among the things that still are needed are a far more realistic level of benefits than prevails now. Benefits have done better than keep pace with increases in the cost of living during the past 33 years, but they have fallen behind in relation to today's wage and salary levels.

The AFL-CIO has long recognized the need for improvements. At its December 1967 convention, the federation called for substantial boosts in benefits with a provision that benefits can increase so that "beneficiaries will share in our increased standard of living rather than be left behind in the march of economic progress."

It asked that the minimum benefit be increased sufficiently to lift the burden of poverty from large numbers of the poorest among the elderly.

It suggested that the wage base be increased to at least $15,000 so that benefits can be more in line with earnings than they now are.

IT ASKED THAT there be a flexible retirement zone of between 60 and 65 and that disability requirements be made more liberal with payments beginning one month after disability sets in.

Finally, it asked that the medicare program be improved by removal of financial deterrents and that it be broadened to include the disabled immediately and, as soon as possible, all social security beneficiaries, not only those who have attained the age of 65.

All the accomplishments of the past 33 years and the proposals for improving them still further are obviously tributes to the men and women who have given and are still giving to social security their greatest efforts.

Building upon the firm foundation of the law as adopted in 1935, Congress at the urging and frequent prodding of socially minded citizens and organizations, has steadily improved the original act.

And the end, clearly is not yet in sight.

The success of social security also has given the lie to so many of those lamentations that were so common during the days when Congress first debated the system. Critics, in those days, declaimed that the social security system was "insidiously designed to enslave workers" and the new law would unloose "the lash of the dictator."

Obviously none of these events has taken place and it is impossible to imagine the American people of today repudiating a system that has become a part of our lives and a bulwark to our social institutions.

SOLID RESULTS of union-sponsored "outreach" programs to bring minority group youngsters into building trades jobs were reported by AFL-CIO Civil Rights Dir. Donald Slaiman, center, on Labor News Conference. Questioning him on the AFL-CIO produced program, broadcast Tuesdays on Mutual Radio, were Neil Gilbride, left, of the Associated Press and William Eaton, of the Chicago Daily News.

Meany on Labor Day:

Faith in Democracy at Stake in Voting

By George Meany

LABOR DAY is always a special occasion for the trade union movement, but every four years it has even greater significance than usual.

This is one of those years—a year in which the American people will choose a President, and therefore decide to a considerable degree the future course of the nation.

We in the AFL-CIO will have a preference to express, and we will do our utmost on behalf of the candidate endorsed by our General Board at its September meeting. But our first and overriding concern, as always, is to insure the largest possible vote on Nov. 5.

This is of particular importance because the choice this year will bring to office a new President and a new Administration. The new leadership will be sworn to serve the interests of all the people; it should represent the considered decision of the whole electorate, expressed at the polls.

Thus my first appeal to union members and their families, and to all other Americans as well, is to register at the earliest opportunity, and to make a solemn vow to vote on Election Day.

It is difficult to understand why lethargy and indifference should plague the democratic process in the United States, to a far greater degree than in other free nations. Americans have, at the same time, more to protect and more to achieve through their votes than any people in history, yet millions fail to exercise the right which so many have died to establish and preserve.

In this era, and for all the foreseeable future, politics is too much a part of daily life to be neglected by any citizen. Politics—the art of government—is no longer a game, not even the "great game," as it has been called. It profoundly influences job opportunities and wage trends. It affects the kind of housing you can buy and how much you will pay for it. It controls the quality—and the availability—of education, of health care, even of food. It influences the purity of the water and the air; and it probably has much to do with the beach or lake or woodland where you spent your vacation.

The plain fact is that politics is everybody's business because it affects everyone. So I say again, to all Americans: Take care of your business. Make sure you are registered now; and be sure to vote in November.

Now let us turn to the contest itself—to the issues that will be debated over the two months ahead.

In one area—the area of social and economic progress in the broadest sense—there is little room for serious dispute.

The last eight years have bestowed upon the nation the most sweeping gains in its history, or in the history of any other land.

There are more jobs at better wages than ever before.

Education at every level, from pre-kindergarten to graduate school and from the arts and sciences to vocational training, has been broadened, strengthened and made more easily available to all.

The economic well-being of older citizens, widows, dependent children and the disabled has been vastly enhanced by medicare and higher social security benefits.

Equal rights and equal opportunity for all, which still must be fully achieved in fact, are, however, firmly established by laws which insure that justice will soon prevail.

Truth in lending, truth in packaging, effective meat inspection and other statutes provide consumers with a wide range of long-needed safeguards.

A frontal attack on poverty, including substantial improvements in the wage-hour law, is making headway against this economic blight on America's affluence.

Programs are under way to cleanse the nation's lakes and rivers, and to protect the air from continued pollution.

The urban crisis, the greatest of all domestic problems, still remains a formidable threat; but it is the focus of many federal efforts, and the turning-point may have been reached only six weeks ago with the enactment of the best housing bill ever adopted.

There is no question that an overwhelming majority of the American people enthusiastically support this record of social progress. It was the pressure of that support, exerted by state and local officials, by businessmen and by ordinary citizens, regardless of party, combined with the efforts of the labor movement, that pushed a reluctant 90th Congress forward in the last two years.

Therefore if the election depended only upon democratic achievements, measured in terms of prosperity, security and enrichment of life among Americans as a whole, the outcome would be easy to predict.

THE VOTERS WOULD CHOOSE the candidate they trusted most to continue and accelerate this eight-year drive toward an ever-better society, and they would choose him by a landslide.

In our view, this should indeed be the choice. But it is being obscured in the minds of many Americans by two other issues, both providing ready fuel for demagogues who seek to inflame emotions rather than appeal to reason.

One of these issues is the war in Viet Nam.

It is, of course, entirely proper for Americans to discuss and debate the war. For those seeking public office, it is more than proper; they have an obligation to make their views known.

But to have meaning, debate must consist of reason based on fact. It must be—as the dictionary puts it—"discussion for the purpose of elucidating truth or influencing action."

There is far too little of this to be found among those who oppose America's defense of freedom in South Viet Nam. They denounce the bloodshed, they cry for peace, but they direct their protests only to Washington, never to Hanoi. And what is even worse, they hoot down and physically attack those who seek to reason with them.

This is not debate; it is anarchy.

The same applies in a far more dangerous degree to the second of these emotional issues—the issue sometimes called "law and order," or "crime in the streets," but which actually involves the impatient aspirations of ghetto Negroes on one hand and the imbedded prejudice of fearful whites on the other.

Obviously the only real solution is to fulfill the aspirations by social and economic progress, and calm the fears by reason and the light of experience. But there are extremists on both sides who reject this solution—and thus reject American society itself.

The extremists on both sides put their faith in violence. Both turn their backs on the Constitution, and on the very concept of democracy. The potential perils of a confrontation between them cannot be exaggerated.

Riots, assault, arson, looting and murder are intolerable in a government of laws. But "law and order" has in the past too often been corrupted into a synonym for repression—an excuse to crush justifiable aspirations and lawful rights in the name of law enforcement.

Yes, there must be law and order in the cities, but not by the creation of a garrison state. Let there be law and order in the enforcement of civil rights statutes, too. Let those who cry for more police in the slums cry also for more jobs, more housing and more schools for the prisoners of the slums. Those, too, are tools of law and order.

Meanwhile, the extremists on each side gain strength from the other—and distract America from the task of solving the problems they exploit. Alarm has been widely expressed that their insidious appeals to emotion—to angry discouragement, to fear and hatred—will be felt at the polls in November, even to the point of confusing the outcome.

We recognize the reasons for the alarm but we do not share it.

WILD AND SEEMINGLY dangerous excursions into political extremism are not new to this country. There were Know-Nothings and Barn-Burners and anti-Masons in the 19th Century, sometimes gathering impressive support—including, on one occasion, a former President of the United States. As recently as 1948, two radical parties—one left, one right—entered the Presidential lists. But always, when it came to the showdown, when each voter was alone with his ballot, common sense prevailed. We are confident it will prevail again.

The basis for our confidence transcends public opinion polls, scientific tests or expert analyses. Very simply, it is our faith in America.

Among the founding fathers of this government, Thomas Jefferson was the most deeply convinced that the people as a whole, if adequately informed, were better qualified than any elite or aristocratic group to determine public policy.

Nearly 200 years of history have borne him out. We are sure that 1968 will do so again. How can it be otherwise?

Look at this land called America, the land that belongs to us all—beautiful, rich and spacious still, the envy of the world. Look at the free society first created by a handful of brave and farsighted men, now the home of 200 millions—a society which has survived fools, exploiters and adventurers; a society which has fought off formidable foreign enemies and overcome desperate internal crises; a society which has absorbed and made its own a flood of immigrants from every corner of the earth, of every language, race or creed. And yet by any rational measure, American society is infinitely more rewarding to its people than ever before.

Yes, despite all this, these are confused and troubled times. But it is unthinkable that now, with so much achieved and so much more within the reach of all, Americans should lose faith in themselves.

It must not happen. It cannot happen, and it will not happen, if every American makes himself heard at the polls in November. Every vote in 1968 will be a reaffirmation of faith in democracy. Let us all join in that cause.

Building Trades Dept. Says:

Vast Opportunities in Skilled Jobs Noted for Youth Seeking Careers

Excerpts from Labor Day message of C. J. Haggerty, president of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept.

ON THE OCCASION of the first Labor Day, the population of the United States was 52,821,000 and the number of Americans in colleges and universities was 116,000.

This Labor Day our population has soared past 201 million and the students in what commonly are referred to as institutions of higher learning number more than 6 million.

Many factors have contributed to the increase of the college population from about one-quarter of 1 percent of the population in 1882 to around 3 percent today.

I would like to discuss only a few of them—the desire of parents and their children alike for a better education for young people, the demand of the times for a more complete education if our citizens are to be able successfully to meet present economic and sociological challenges and, finally, "status."

There certainly cannot be a vestige of doubt that knowledge and training, plus the application of both, are more important at this particular moment than at any time in history.

But while there can be no question of the almost urgent necessity of a comprehensive and continuing education, I, for one, have considerable doubt that it must be acquired, in every single case, in a college or a university.

Our common desire for "status," for a place of respect in our society, has led many of us—especially parents, but also the young people themselves—to insist on being educated on a campus, in formal, long-established, "name" institutions.

To many of us, it seemingly has become more important where the instruction is given than how it is given or even why that particular phase of information is being transmitted.

Specialization in education, or anything else, can be overdone. A surgeon, for example, would be an unfortunate person indeed if all he knew or was interested in related to his science. A highly skilled craftsman equally would be handicapped if he had no knowledge of or interest in music or literature or community and world affairs.

I happen to believe that a fine career in America is to be found in the building trades. I also believe that a fine education is obtainable there, through apprentice training programs that continuously are becoming more advanced.

And yet, partly due to "status," many young people are turning their backs on well-paying, stable, happy blue-collar careers in favor of lower-paying, less-secure, more frustrating white-collar jobs.

Hugh C. Murphy, national apprentice director of the U.S. Dept of Labor, recently pointed out that a good journeyman can earn anywhere from $7,000 to $15,000 a year in the crafts and trades.

"Blue-collar jobs are going begging because there are not enough qualified young persons applying for them," he observed. "Status seems to be everything today and it must be the job of the skilled occupations to provide this necessary impetus . . . whether it requires new titles or special clothing or better public relations."

Much of the impetus, in my opinion, could be provided by the families of young people.

In this connection, the 17 affiliates of the Building & Construction Trades Dept. are making remarkable strides in their truly conscientious effort to attract members of minority groups to their ranks and to train them for successful and permanent careers.

Schnitzler on Labor Day:

Consumer Protection Begins at the Polls

By William F. Schnitzler

IT IS A LONG-STANDING tradition for the trade union movement to pause on Labor Day, not only to celebrate the last holiday of the summer season, but to assess the happenings of the year just past and the prospects for the year ahead. In a Presidential year, especially, political affairs are in the forefront.

In both directions, forward and back, the view is something less than clear. Real life, unlike television horse operas, does not divide neatly into good guys and bad guys. Most of the true-life actors, and their actions, fall somewhere in between.

This is most evident if we begin with the backward look—the record of what has actually taken place.

Obviously it is not possible to review the whole legislative record in a short statement. But there is one area which deserves special note. That is the whole area of consumer protection—of reasonable safeguards for the householder and the housewife from usury, fraud and poison.

Whatever else may be said of the 90th Congress, in this respect it took enormous strides.

It enacted a truth-in-lending bill, requiring lending companies and installment houses to tell buyers in clear and simple terms how much credit is costing them.

It adopted a truth-in-packaging bill which, while still inadequate in many respects, is at least a sound start toward clearing the jungle of deception on supermarket shelves.

It virtually eliminated the danger of contaminated meat by approving a strong federal inspection measure; and it followed this with a comparable statute covering poultry.

It began to move, in the face of bitter opposition from the powerful lobbies of the drug manufacturers and the American Medical Association, toward new legislation to curb the reckless introduction of dangerous drugs and the profiteering on brand name drugs. Unfortunately this movement has not gone beyond hearings, but it has already stimulated more vigorous enforcement of present laws, and perhaps brought about a measure of voluntary restraint on the worst practices of brand-name manufacturers.

All of this is most gratifying to us in the AFL-CIO. We and our affiliated unions have been the principal supporters of these measures. Consumer protection is one of our primary concerns—and for a very good reason.

The AFL-CIO is the largest organization of consumers in America.

WHEN BORROWERS or installment buyers are hoodwinked, union members are cheated.

When a housewife buys a "five-pound box" of soap powder and gets 76.23 ounces—or some other amount too difficult for easy translation—the difference is likely to come out of a union member's pocket.

When Americans are sickened or killed by bad food or lethal drugs, the toll among trade union families is heavy.

Of course, our interest is not confined to union members alone. We conceive it to be our role to serve as the champion of all the people—to serve, if you will, as the "people's lobby" on every matter that affects the general welfare.

It is that role—that obligation—which has led us to participate in many causes that at first glance seem remote from the labor movement. Foreign aid, agricultural policy, public assistance, urban renewal, the war on poverty, even the federal minimum wage appear to some to be far removed from the parochial interests of trade unionists, most of whom have won fair wages and working-conditions through collective bargaining.

There are times when special-interest lobbyists, and even members of Congress, reproach us on this account. They accuse us of "meddling." They suggest that we should "mind our own business."

Obviously this would be good for them, since we place the public interest above any special interest. But we will never follow that course.

The AFL-CIO and its predecessor federations long ago realized that workers and their unions can progress only as America progresses; that what is good for America is good for the labor movement. Conversely, nothing can be good for the labor movement which is bad for America as a whole.

FAILURE TO GRASP this basic fact has led some well-meaning Americans into a trap carefully prepared by others—including some editorial writers and columnists—who are not well-meaning at all.

The trap is a claim, advanced after almost every major labor-management agreement, that unions have grabbed for higher wages without caring whether higher prices would then penalize the "general public."

This is absolute nonsense. Union members comprise a very large part of the "general public." They are not exempt from higher prices. The notion that union members could—even if they wanted to—advance their selfish interests apart from the interests of the population as a whole is an impossible absurdity.

It is the labor movement, not its critics, which leads the fight against inflated prices, and—as I have described—the fight to make every consumer dollar count.

This is a continuing battle, and an endless one. Its course will depend upon future events—which brings me to the other half of this Labor Day assessment.

The future of consumer protection is indivisibly linked to the cause of social progress in general. Oddly enough the conservatives and reactionaries, who in other respects extol the delights of the past, have no interest in consumer values. They have much to say about the cost of government, which they wrongly equate with the cost of living. They have nothing to say about excessive consumer prices or the exploitation of consumers.

Therefore if the sweeping gains of the last year, gains which have paid off in hard dollars and cents, as well as in health security, for every American family, are to be broadened and strengthened, the liberal cause must prevail on Nov. 5.

I appeal to every American, and especially to the wives and mothers who are most directly concerned with household matters: Make sure every adult in your household is registered to vote. And be sure to vote in November for those who will carry on the battle to make every purchase an honest value and every home a safer place.

American Labor Hailed by ICFTU

THE MILLIONS OF WORKERS who form the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions unite on Labor Day to wish their fellow-workers throughout North America success in their endeavors.

For the workers in the United States the next few months will be of crucial importance as they and their families form a massive part of the electorate. Not only America, but the whole of the world will have its eyes on Washington when the votes are counted in November. We know that the American workers, for whom so much is at stake, will make a wise use of that dearly won right, to appoint the administrators of their choice.

In the ICFTU, there are many organizations which have to fight for social progress on two fronts: to make gains through collective bargaining by union strength at the negotiating table, and to exert pressure to force through legislation that will ease union action and make for the social advance of the nation. So our wishes will be with you in these fateful days.

We have watched with admiration throughout the year the success of the trade union movement in getting adopted progressive legislation favoring the disinherited, the old, the sick, the consumer. Your constant efforts towards achieving better educational facilities for American youth and better housing for the people have borne fruit.

Though much still has to be done in many fields, at least the American trade union movement is fully aware and actively engaged in making this legislation a reality, in bringing civil rights to the people, in leading communities to face the stark realities of inequality. New jobs must be found—and the trade unions are actually seeing to it that they are created.

The eminent place which the unions have attained in your society is a proud monument to your achievement.

In a historical convention, our friends in Canada have this year adapted their organization's structure to one better suited to the times. We take this opportunity to wish them success in their steadfast efforts to reach the goal of full employment and a decent wage for Canadian workers. May your demands for a democratically-planned economy bear fruit and bring with it an upsurge in economic activity. Recent industrial struggles, in which the unions have scored no mean advantages for their members, will have strengthened even further your will to achieve decent standards and decent housing for all.

The contribution of the trade union movements of North America, not only to the defense of the interests of their own members but also to the free trade union movement of the world, and their active solidarity with workers everywhere, remain an inspiration to us all. The ICFTU is proud to salute you on this Labor Day.

Industrial Union Dept. Says:

Labor Must Remain in Forefront Of Struggle for Social Progress

Excerpts from Labor Day statement of I. W. Abel, president of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept.

AS WE PAUSE to observe this Labor Day we should look about us and count our many blessings. The economy is still pushing upward, job opportunities and wages are expanding, general social progress is discernible, and our national leaders are actively and genuinely searching for world peace.

This is the time, however, not only to take stock of our joys, but to look ahead to the next year and take account of some of the unfulfilled promises of America.

On this Labor Day, 1968, I believe that we Americans stand at a crossroad in our national life. Despite our vast resources and recent progress, we still have not realized the American dream of freedom of opportunity and of equality. In sharp contrast to the rapid technological progress in our society, human progress has been painfully slow.

I believe that now is the time for all Americans to look into their hearts and consciences. I can think of no more worthwhile way to spend some time this holiday than in quiet contemplation of both our blessings and problems which still confront our country today.

The labor movement must never be satisfied with the achievements of the past. Its historic role is to be in the forefront of the struggle to improve the health and quality of our society.

Recognition of the issues and the role of the labor movement is particularly appropriate in an election year in which we face the task of choosing a President and a new Congress. The new Administration will either provide the leadership to move forward or will act as a brake and a deterrent to essential progress.

FOR THE MILLIONS of Americans who are without work, we must provide jobs which pay a decent wage and afford opportunities for jobs so that working people will not be forced to turn to public welfare or private charity to support their families. Where the private system has not or cannot provide work for all, jobs in the public sector must be created by the government. The National Advisory Commission on Civil Disorders, of which I was a member, recommended sound legislation to accomplish such ends.

We must make certain that the jobs available today and the jobs which we create will be accessible to all Americans—black, white, Mexican and Puerto Rican.

Our minimum wage laws must be amended to assure a higher and fairer rate to the millions of people now working at substandard wages. Close to 2 million Americans work at full-time jobs the year round and still earn too little to escape the grip of poverty.

While we provide employment for all who can work, we must not neglect those whose work and income are interrupted or who are unable to work because of sickness, disability, or family circumstances.

Millions of retired workers and their dependents are still forced to struggle along on social security benefits that fail to afford minimum standards of decency and self-respect. The minimum benefits of social security must be raised so that none of the aged will be left in a state of poverty, and so that all workers upon retirement can maintain a decent standard of living.

An adequate income must be assured to meet the needs of the blind, the disabled, and the destitute mothers of school-age children who are now forced to depend on the benefits of a destructive public welfare system. America has the resources to provide an adequate income to these people with compassion and in a manner which will insure dignity to the recipient.

We must take action to assure that the America in which we live provides decent homes, clean air and clean water and adequate recreation areas. A clean and decent environment must be available not only for suburbia, but for the citizens of the inner city and the isolated countryside.

This Labor Day we again face the eternal social challenge—shall justice prevail, shall the hungry be fed, shall the jobless be given meaningful work, shall tolerance and compassion grow, and shall the sweet fruits of democracy be spread equitably to all the people who inhabit this great and fair land? This is no small challenge and no small dream, but we can will it into reality!

Progress Is Linked to Election Outcome

President, Congress Set Pace for Nation

By Alexander Uhl

WHEN THE NEXT President takes the oath of office on Jan. 20, 1969, no matter what party he belongs to, the United States in general and its organized workers in particular will be entering a new era.

Jan. 20 will mark the end of the highly personalized administration of Pres. Johnson. It will mark the beginning of a presidency that will reflect the ideas of a new man in office, whether Vice Pres. Humphrey or former Vice Pres. Richard Nixon.

For the American people there are great political decisions to be made as to the Administration in the White House and the composition of the Congress. The results may signal grave setbacks to the great advances of the past eight years, or new, determined steps toward achievement of the many goals that have been set.

There is the state of the economy:

- Will today's inflationary forces be cooled off by the 10 percent income tax surcharge and the "austerity" cuts that are being made in the budget? Will today's expanding economy and relatively high employment give way to a recession and a boost in the rate of unemployment now hovering around the 4 percent mark?
- What will happen to the War on Poverty and the progress of the closely related civil rights movement? To what extent will the next Congress continue to fund the tremendous program of social advancement that has been passed during the past decade?
- What attitude will the next Congress and the new Administration take toward the pressing problems of crime and "law and order"?
- What about Viet Nam? The campaigns of the late Sen. Robert F. Kennedy and Sen. Eugene McCarthy, Minnesota Democrat, have served to crystallize much American opinion as between the "doves" and the "hawks" with both groups making peace their primary objective.
- What will happen in the wide field of the quality of American life? Such legislation as anti-pollution laws; meat, poultry and fish inspection; highway programs; urban renewal; restoration to remove the blights of urban ghettos and their threat to domestic tranquility, the advancement of education, whether from Head Start or university training; improvements in social security and closely related medicare and medicaid?

The AFL-CIO already has made clear its own position on these urgent matters. In appearances before the platform committees of both the Republican and Democratic conventions, Pres. George Meany presented the federation's program.

- In the field of economics, Meany called for tax reform through the elimination of immense tax loopholes enjoyed by wealthy individuals and corporations.

Even more important, he continued, "tax reform is needed to eliminate the hundreds of millions of dollars in federal income taxes collected from the impoverished, to reduce the relative tax burden on low and moderate income families and to restore the confidence of the American people in the fairness of the federal tax system."

- In the field of the war on poverty, Meany called for a continued fight against unemployment, for more meaningful manpower and training policies, for a better public employment service, for improvements in unemployment compensation, for creation of a public service employment program to create a million jobs for the unemployed and the seriously unemployed, for a better Fair Labor Standards law with a goal of $2 an hour and a 35-hour week.
- While citing the tremendous gains that have been made in the field of civil rights, Meany said that "greater and more effective efforts" must be made.

"We must wipe out slum ghettos by building adequate housing for all without discrimination in its sale or rental," he said.

"Violent and divisive cries on the right and the left must be rejected," he concluded. "Our goal must remain a truly democratic integrated society with opportunity for all, as well as equality before the law."

- Discussing the problems of crime and "law and order," Meany said:

"No believer in democracy can condone crimes of violence, no matter what the provocation. Riots, assaults, arson, looting and murder are not the avenues of protest; they are attacks on society."

Jobs, enforcement of civil rights statutes, better housing and education, "these, too," he said, "are tools of law and order."

- Finally, in the field of foreign affairs, the AFL-CIO leader rebuked those critics of American policy in Viet Nam who see nothing wrong with the war-like policies of Hanoi. He reiterated the AFL-CIO support of "the American effort to defend the freedom of the South Vietnamese people to run their country as they choose without outside interference by force."

At the same time, he supported efforts of the Johnson Administration to negotiate a peace in Viet Nam and its efforts to raise the standard of living of the people of the area.

Meany also called for strong American support for Israel.

"We firmly believe that Israel—the one bastion of democracy in that part of the world—must be preserved," he said.

When the American people, and notably union members, go to the polls this November, these are the wide national issues that will be presented to them. What party will respond to them with the greater sympathy and courage? Already numerous unions have spoken their minds; overwhelmingly for the Democrats.

Inextricably woven into the election results also are issues that affect American union members closely. COPE has left no doubt that a conservative victory will mean a renewed onslaught on the labor movement and on the rights that it has built up slowly and sometimes painfully over the years.

It is safe to say that a Republican victory will mean an end to all hopes for the repeal of Section 14(b) of the Taft-Hartley Act—the section that makes "right-to-work" laws possible on the state level.

It is equally safe to say that a Republican victory will give strong impetus to conservative efforts to undermine the National Labor Relations Board, if not destroy it entirely.

A PARADE FLOAT takes shape as Carpenters and Stage Employes speed up preparations for the big New York Labor Day parade. Vice Pres. Hubert H. Humphrey is scheduled to top the list of dignitaries who will review the marchers on Fifth Avenue. AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany will be grand marshal of the parade, sponsored by the New York City Central Labor Council.

Changes Punctuate Labor Year With Crises, Gains, Tragedies

By Harry F. Conn

IT'S LABOR DAY—1968.

The labor-won holiday provides time to give some thought to the events of the last 12 months.

It has been a harsh and uncertain year both at home and abroad, a year of the unpredictable. Frightening and unbelievable episodes have unfolded.

The labor movement's never-ending fight for a better life for all people, for rights and justice, for equal opportunity, for economic uplift looms more important today than ever in our history.

Every unionist can wonder, with justification, whether we would be facing some of our current crises if the economic and social programs urged so consistently over the last 30 years by labor had been carried out.

Of course, some of these programs have in part been realized: social security, medicare, minimum wage, civil rights, housing, education, a full employment economy, one man-one vote, protection for the consumer and many more.

The 89th Congress with a record of achievement for all the people will be a bright page in our history books.

When 51 liberal seats were lost in the 1966 elections, however, Congress returned to its familiar role of legislating for the status quo and moving, if at all, reluctantly.

And yet, as if suddenly aware of the damage wrought, there have been some bright spots: the housing bill and fair housing, some consumer protections on meat and lending, some progress in education and model cities.

Its failures were even more pronounced, though. Congress insisted on a $6 billion budget slash as its price for passing a 10 percent surtax designed to halt rising prices. Its harsh rules on welfare, refusal to act on urgently-needed health legislation, opening up wiretapping and undermining rights of defendants in courts as a supposed means of combatting crime were all part of that poor record.

On strictly labor issues, Congress did not knuckle under to the long-range goals of professional anti-unionists who called for a labor court, applying anti-trust laws to unions, outlawing coordinated collective bargaining, compulsory arbitration and taking labor out of politics.

Within labor during the year, there were an unusual number of mergers and steps toward merger. Most prominent was the tie between the Meat Cutters and the Packinghouse Workers, bringing into being a union of 500,000 workers.

Another merger united the Laborers and the Mail Handlers. The Transportation - Communications Union, by a narrow margin, turned down merger with the Railway & Airlines Clerks but left the door open to merger with BRAC and other unions in the future.

Merger moves involve four operating rail unions: Railroad Trainmen, Locomotive Firemen, Conductors and Switchmen.

The Auto Workers, suspended by the AFL-CIO Executive Council because it was three months in arrears in its per capita payments which were withheld pending the union's demand for a special convention, later formally disaffiliated.

Copper Settles

The year also saw the end of one of the longest and grimmest strikes in labor history, the copper dispute. It lasted one year, from July 15, 1967 to July 8, 1968, for many workers.

The other momentous strike of the year involved the UAW against Ford Motor Co. It lasted for 46 days and won an annual income for the 160,000 workers and other gains.

Other strikes of significance included the Communications Workers and Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers against Bell Telephone, newspaper strikes in Los Angeles and Detroit.

The grape workers and the United Farm Workers Organizing Committee, in their fight for organization, were so effective in their campaign for a boycott of California grapes in New York City that the UFWOC and five other union organizations were sued by grape growers. The boycott was spread to other cities.

Far smaller in numbers but with increasing meaning was the strike of sanitation workers, members of the State, County & Municipal Workers, in Memphis, Tenn.

Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr., in Memphis to aid the strikers, was slain by an assassin's bullet. It touched off wild outbreaks of violence, looting and arson in many American cities.

Two months later tragedy struck again. Sen. Robert F. Kennedy, campaigning in California, also was assassinated.

These two murders, with the memory of a similar fate suffered by Pres. John F. Kennedy five years before, brought a nationwide demand for strong gun control legislation which has wide labor backing.

Returning to the trade union front, there were a number of changes in top leadership during the year.

As was noted, Reuther resigned as president of the IUD and was succeeded by Abel. Paul Phillips retired as president of the Paperworkers to be succeeded by Vice Pres. Harry Sayre. Elmer Brown, president of the Typographical Union, died. His post was filled by John J. Pilch. George Leighty, who headed the Transportation-Communications Union (and its predecessor the Railway Telegraphers) for 25 years, retired to be succeeded by Vice Pres. Robert Lowry. Death also claimed Pres. Harry Damino of the Doll Workers. His post is being filled by Vice Pres. Louis Isaacson. James A. Suffridge, who headed the Retail Clerks for almost a quarter of a century, retired. The new president of RCIA is James Housewright, who takes office this fall. In conventions this month the Letter Carriers elevated Vice Pres. James H. Rademacher to president, succeeding Jerome J. Keating, who retired; Pres. William Buck of the Fire Fighters retired and Vice Pres. William H. McClennan was elected president, and the Teachers elected David Selden president to succeed retiring Charles Cogen.

On the AFL-CIO Executive Council, Iron Workers Pres. John Lyons took the spot left vacant by the resignation of former Bricklayers Pres. Harry Bates.

In Convention Windup:

Unity Emphasized By Teachers Union

Cleveland—The American Federation of Teachers healed a threatened convention split over community control of schools and closed ranks behind a new president committed to building rapidly "a single, strong, autonomous, militant teacher organization" in the United States.

As its last item of business at the 52nd convention here the union installed David Selden to succeed retiring Pres. Charles Cogen after voting more money for operating expenses, including organizing; adopting a compromise resolution on school decentralization, and mandating all local unions to join AFL-CIO state and central bodies within a year.

Selden set the AFT on its new course at a post-convention meeting of the new 21-member executive council. The council reelected Sec.-Treas. Robert Porter for a two-year term; directed the union's special Standing Committee on Racism and Civil Rights to bring an action program to the next council meeting in October.

The union's New Caucus, composed mainly of younger teachers from central-city schools, failed to elect any of its six council candidates. But it did win unanimous convention support for an amendment recognizing the union's responsibility for supporting parents and community groups in improving big-city schools and the need for community involvement "through elected representatives in the operation of schools in the black, Puerto Rican and other minority communities."

The compromise language headed off a floor fight over the type of community control which the union's New York City Local 2 has opposed in the Brownsville-Ocean Hill section of Brooklyn.

In New York, a coalition headed by a new School Board member, the Rev. Milton A. Galamison, has demanded that local communities be given total control of their own public schools—a demand which AFT Local 2 opposes unless contract rights are protected.

Another convention issue was a proposal to raise monthly per capita payments by local unions from $1 to $1.25. When a rollcall vote produced a tie, Selden challenged the vote of his own local and then, on another rollcall, was authorized to cast his vote for the proposal. It carried, 1,096-1,082, and the increase goes into effect next Jan. 1.

In other actions the convention:

- Presented its Stillman award for excellence to Rep. John Conyers, Jr. (D-Mich.) and certificates of merit to 100 AFT locals for "helping build the union."
- Adopted a 10-year program for achieving "nationwide educational excellence" based on a study by Leon Keyserling. The Washington, D.C., economist reported that the federal government can increase its public education subsidies from $28.3 billion a year to $70.1 billion through rising economic income and by reordering national values to "put first things first."
- Pledged support to teachers faced with possible strikes next month in St. Louis, Philadelphia, Pittsburgh, Toledo and 13 other school districts.

The delegates adopted a resolution condemning Maryland Gov. Spiro T. Agnew, the Republican vice presidential candidate, for his "anti-civil rights, anti-labor and anti- teacher attitudes" and actions.

They heard John J. Gilligan, Democratic candidate for the U.S. Senate in Ohio, name vocational education as one of the most neglected areas in school budgets and Cleveland Mayor Carl Stokes urge a cooperative effort by all elements of the community to improve city services and the quality of education.

Selden was elected president after four years as assistant to the retiring president. He promised delegates he would study ways to "streamline" future conventions to expedite their methods of transacting business. He told a press conference "we must double our organizing efforts and at the same time seek the possibility of merger with those teachers who are presently captives" of the National Education Association.

Four-Year Apprenticeship Training For Carpenters Termed Essential

Kansas City, Mo.—There is no short cut to apprenticeship, Carpenters Pres. M. A. Hutcheson stressed at the awards banquet for the union's first international apprenticeship contest here.

"There are those who continually pressure us to lower the requirement of four years on the ground that the industry does not need the all-around craftsman but, rather, the specialist trained in one or, at most, two of the skills needed in the industry," Hutcheson said.

"We have resisted and will continue to resist this pressure on the ground that all who enter the craft have a right to expect training that will prepare them to man any phase of the trade.

"This will assure them preparation leading to continuity of employment instead of facing sporadic employment because there is no need for their specialized skills."

Hutcheson said that highly skilled craftsmen should be able readily to adapt their basic skills and knowledge to new materials, techniques and methods and added: "To permit a shortage in the supply of skilled craftsmen could possibly destroy the very base of our organization."

"We need to double or even triple our number of apprentices," he explained. "But, to do this, employment opportunities must be provided. Our records show that if each employer affiliated with the Associated General Contractors Association and the National Association of Home Builders employed just one apprentice, the number of apprentices would nearly triple.

"Although the accusation sometimes has been made that the United Brotherhood of Carpenters has kept down the number of apprentices, when the facts are examined it is the rare or exceptional employer who has employed apprentices in keeping with the ratio provided by their local bargaining agreement. In fact, the majority have not employed even one, let alone the number permitted."

Contestants from 29 states and five Canadian provinces competed in an eight-hour "manipulative" test and a four-hour written test. Awards of $1,500, $1,000 and $500 were given in each of three categories.

Winner of the $1,500 first prize in the carpentry division was Larry F. Mulpas, Erie, Ohio. Second place went to Kenneth M. White, Portland, Ore., and third to Lee J. Struer, Marina, Calif.

The mill cabinet victor was Jimmie W. Payne, Arlington, Va. Second place went to Gary Norris, Sun Valley, Calif., and third to Charles Fischer, Philadelphia.

In the millwright division, the $1,500 first prize went to Daryl Wright, Plymouth, Mich. The $1,000 second prize was won by Robert S. McClellan, Manhattan Beach, Calif., and the $500 third prize by Kenneth A. McAllister, Gething, British Columbia.

Master of ceremonies at the awards dinner was Finlay C. Allan, first vice president of the union, which has a membership of more than 800,000 and 30,000 apprentices in training.

2 Unionists Named To Advisory Panel

Two union officials are among the five new members Sec. of Labor Willard Wirtz has appointed to the Advisory Council on employe welfare and pension benefit plans.

The new labor members are John F. Tomayko, director of the Insurance, Pension & Unemployment Benefits Dept. of the Steelworkers and Joseph H. Davis, president of the Washington State AFL-CIO.

The other new appointees are: Joseph L. Seligman, Jr., a San Francisco attorney, and Joseph Musher, an actuary with Murray W. Latimer, industrial relations consultants, Washington, D.C.; and James R. Beaird, law professor at University of Georgia.

Labor Day Messages Stress Role of Voters

cry for more police in the slums, cry also for more jobs, more housing and more schools. Those, too, are tools of law and order."

Meany expressed confidence that the appeals of the extremists will not prevail, however, if Americans will "not lose faith in themselves."

"It cannot happen, and it will not happen, if every American makes himself heard at the polls in November," he concluded.

AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler also emphasized that "political affairs are in the forefront" on this Labor Day. In addition, his statement underscored labor's many legislative battles on behalf of the public interest.

"The AFL-CIO and its predecessor federations long ago realized that workers and their unions can progress only as America progresses," Schnitzler said.

Schnitzler cited labor's drives for laws to provide truth-in-lending, truth-in-packaging, meat-poultry inspection and curbs on drug profiteering. "Consumer protection is one of our primary concerns for a very good reason," he said. "The AFL-CIO is the largest organization of consumers in America."

Pres. C. J. Haggerty of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. stressed the efforts of department affiliates to bring minority-group youths into their ranks.

He said unions are making "remarkable progress" in developing apprentice programs for poor youths; that such programs are now set up in more than 40 American communities; and that these programs have enrolled thousands of trainees in the past few months.

Pres. I. W. Abel of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept. looked upon Labor Day as a time for moving ahead to meet "the unfilled promises of America."

The needs, he said, are decent-paying jobs available to all Americans, extended benefits of social legislation, adequate homes, improved social security, a clean, healthful environment for all, and a complete end to all forms of racial discrimination.

Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz said the full meaning of Labor Day will be understood when "every man will realize the dignity of work because he will have labored in dignity, reaping the just rewards of his labor."

Recounting the progress that has been made in jobs, in wages, in job training, in education, Wirtz said, "We should look now to even greater accomplishments.

"We look to the day when no man or woman will be denied the opportunity to work because he or she couldn't get the necessary training.

"We look to the day when no man must contemplate a future which will see him always at the bottom of the employment ladder.

"We look to the day when every child will receive all the education his ability warrants."

The Intl. Confederation of Free Trade Unions, representing millions of unionized workers around the globe, said it was "proud to salute" fellow-workers in the United States and Canada on Labor Day.

Democrats Name Liberals Against GOP

Wide Support Marks Humphrey Selection

As he spoke, a Harris poll showed Nixon six points ahead in popular support, although this represented a strong comeback for the Vice President from a Gallup Poll taken just after the GOP convention.

Besides, Humphrey recalled to a breakfast meeting of trade unionists backing his candidacy, the pollsters had proved themselves fallible as long ago as 1948 when they predicted that he would go down to defeat for the Senate along with Pres. Truman.

The union officials, most of them members of the Labor Committee for Humphrey and more than 300 of them delegates or alternates to the Democratic Convention, roared their approval when the Vice President appealed for "Your support and your faith, so that you can say in November 'once again we helped elect a President of the United States'."

The three-hour debate over the Viet Nam plank in the party platform was the emotional climax of the convention. The majority report of the Platform Committee broadly backed Pres. Johnson's policies in prosecuting the war and seeking a negotiated settlement, calling for a halt in the bombing of North Viet Nam only when this would not endanger American troops.

The minority plank, offered by an alliance of McCarthy-McGovern forces, called among other things for an unconditional halt in the bombing and an immediate de-escalation of the fighting.

Upheld on Vote

In terms of noise, demonstrations, and turmoil, the minority plank supporters were way ahead. But these factors didn't count when the roll was called. The 1,567¾ to 1,041¼ vote upholding the majority reflected the basic Johnson-Humphrey strength among the delegates.

There was no division over the balance of the platform, which spells out in sharp detail the party's program for continuing the nation's economic progress and solving its social ills.

There were earlier disputes, however, over rules and the seating of challenged delegations. The results of some of these made party history and marked the beginnings of a major transformation of party procedures. The unit rule, for example, which binds all delegates to the will of the majority, was outlawed at every level of party affairs, and for the first time, a nearly all white delegation, representing the regular Mississippi party organization was refused seating and replaced by a contesting group made up equally of whites and Negroes.

Some elements of discrimination also were found in the selection of Georgia's delegation, but a compromise was voted that seated both the regulars and the challenging group and divided the state's votes among them.

In a case involving Alabama, 16 delegates refused to certify their loyalty to the party's candidates and were replaced.

The convention drew 337 Negro delegates and alternates, the largest number ever to take part.

It also saw the nomination of the Rev. Channing E. Phillips of the District of Columbia as a favorite son candidate backed by a number of Negro delegates who had formed a "black caucus." He was the first Negro ever nominated for the presidency at a major party convention.

Humphrey, who is 57, has long been one of the leading liberals in the Democratic Party.

His record as a public official dates back to 1945 when he became mayor of Minneapolis. In 1948, he was the leader of the fight for a strong civil rights plank in the Democratic convention platform, which led to the Dixiecrat walkout behind Sen. Strom Thurmond of South Carolina, who later turned Republican. That same year, Humphrey won election to his first term as U.S. senator from Minnesota. He became the Senate's majority leader in 1961 at the start of Pres. Kennedy's term. And in 1964 he was chosen by Johnson to complete the Democratic ticket as the vice presidential candidate.

In his 16 years in the Senate, Humphrey compiled a 100 percent record of voting for liberal and pro-labor legislation according to the scoreboard of the AFL-CIO Committee on Political Education.

His selection as the Democratic candidate for President followed a year of remarkable, stunning events involving major figures in the party.

These began last Nov. 30 when McCarthy announced that he planned to seek the Democratic nomination for President against Johnson, basing his opposition solely on the President's Viet Nam policies.

Sen. Robert F. Kennedy of New York who had also been at odds with Johnson over Viet Nam, announced his own candidacy soon after that.

Then, on Mar. 31, the President astounded the world by announcing he would neither seek nor accept nomination for reelection, but would devote the remainder of his term to the search for a peaceful solution to the Viet Nam fighting.

Humphrey entered the race within a month, but too late to become involved in any of the remaining state primaries. His support within the party was such, however, that moving from scratch he quickly piled up a strong lead in terms of convention delegates from non-primary states.

Then, once again the world was stunned this time by the tragic assassination of Kennedy on the night of his California primary victory over McCarthy.

By that time the state primaries were wrapped up and McCarthy's only hope was to woo the Kennedy supporters to his side. This he was unable to accomplish in significant numbers. Many of the Kennedy followers, especially those closely associated with the late senator, later shifted their allegiance to McGovern.

At mid-point of the convention, a minor boom developed for the only surviving Kennedy brother, Sen. Edward M. Kennedy of Massachusetts. But he quickly put a halt to it by declaring that he was not available, either for the presidency or the vice presidency.

Broadcasts Listed For Labor Day

Four major speeches by AFL-CIO leaders will be heard on nationwide radio networks on Labor Day, Sept. 2. The schedule:

Vice Pres. I. W. Abel, ABC, 7:20 p.m.; Pres. George Meany, CBS, 7:35 p.m.; Vice Pres. John H. Lyons Jr., Mutual, 9:15 p.m.; Vice Pres. John J. Grogan, NBC, 10:15 p.m.

All times are Eastern Daylight. Since radio programming varies from station to station, listeners should check local listings.

Convention Overhauls Its Rules To Broaden Base, Prevent Bias

two special groups—a rules commission to study and codify procedures for future conventions and a committee to assure that state party organizations offer full opportunity for participation in choosing convention delegates and alternates.

But the most dramatic changes took place at the 1968 convention in the banning of the unit rule, the historic refusal to seat the entire Mississippi regular delegation, and in compromise findings against two other regular delegations from the South—Georgia and Alabama.

The issue of the unit rule was the first dispute to reach the convention floor. Under the rule, a majority of a state's delegation controls its votes as a bloc. The rules committee recommended that enforcement be denied and that each delegate's vote be left to his "individual conscience."

Texas, one of six southern states still applying the unit rule, led the fight to keep it in effect this year. But the convention shouted down the effort by a voice vote.

Later, in adopting permanent rules, the convention accepted a minority report to extend the ban on the unit rule to all levels of party affairs. The vote on the proposal, submitted by Gov. Harold Hughes of Iowa, was 1,350 to 1,206.

It represented the first loss by a committee majority at the convention, but the credentials committee had already spoken out against application of the unit rule at the grass roots, and the issue did not pose a clear test between supporters of Vice Pres. Humphrey and Sen. Eugene J. McCarthy.

The credentials challenges involved more than 800 delegates from 15 states. Most of them were brought by McCarthy supporters who sought unsuccessfully to increase their minority representation on various state delegations. The major contests, however, came under a party directive adopted at the 1964 convention that a state delegation would not be seated if all voters, regardless of race, creed or color, had not been given the chance "to participate fully" in party affairs and elections.

Acting on this directive, the credentials committee refused to seat the regular Mississippi delegation and installed in its place the challenging group called the Loyal Democrats of Mississippi.

Headed by NAACP leader Charles Evers, the Loyalist group is half black and half white and is made up of liberals and moderates in the state, including a number of trade unionists.

The committee's ruling was not disputed on the convention floor.

In the Georgia case, the regular delegation—handpicked by the state party chairman with the approval of Gov. Lester Maddox—was initially challenged by the Georgia Democratic Forum, headed by E. T. Kehrer of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Civil Rights. This group later gave way to the Loyal National Democrats of Georgia, made up predominantly of McCarthy suporters.

The credentials committee found that issues of discrimination and party loyalty were present in the case but that it would be unfair to oust the entire regular delegation. A compromise was reached seating both delegations and requiring a loyalty oath. The state's 41 convention votes were divided equally between the two groups.

A minority report calling for the seating only of the Loyal Democrats was rejected by the convention, 1,413 to 1,041½.

The Alabama delegation was challenged by two groups, one of which argued that many of the regulars were loyal to segregationist third-party candidate George C. Wallace and the other made up mostly of Negroes, charging racial discrimination.

The credentials committee recommended replacement of 16 of the regulars who refused to certify their party loyalty. This was upheld by the convention, 1,607 to 881½, over a minority report to substitute the entire Negro delegation.

In another rollcall, 1,368 to 955, the convention upheld the recommendation of the credentials committee to seat the regular Texas delegation, which had the largest group of Negroes at the convention.

A number of other southern delegations were not challenged at all because they showed clear evidence of moving to carry out the 1964 ban on racial discrimination in the selection of delegates.

In all, there were 337 Negro delegates and alternates, the largest number ever accredited to a Democratic convention and far in excess of the 82 at the Republican gathering in Miami Beach earlier this month.

And New Jersey Gov. Richard J. Hughes, in presenting the credentials committee report, made it clear that the party would not let up in its efforts toward total elimination of discrimination.

Besides the 1964 directive, the call to the 1972 convention will state:

"It is the further understanding that a state Democratic Party, in selecting and certifying delegates and alternates to the Democratic national convention, thereby undertakes to assure that all Democrats of the state will have meaningful and timely opportunities to participate fully in the election or selection of such delegates and alternates."

This means that delegates are not to be chosen far in advance—as much as four years in some states—of the actual election campaign. And there will be no more handpicking of delegates a la Lester Maddox.

It will be the task of the special committee set up by the convention to help state parties change their rules or state laws to meet this requirement.

One in Four Fail To Register to Vote

An estimated 29 million Americans—about one-fourth of the potential electorate—are not yet registered to vote in the November elections, according to a Gallup Poll report.

Republicans, according to the poll, have the best registration record—84 percent of the potential. The Democratic percentage was only 76, and one-third of self-described independents were not registered.

Humphrey Presses Drive To Build Election Support

RECORD TURNOUT of union members for the New York City AFL-CIO's Labor Day parade was led up Fifth Ave. by Vice Pres. Hubert H. Humphrey and AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, the parade's grand marshal. Flanking them, from the left, are Pres. Matthew Guinan of the Transport Workers, Pres. Louis Stulberg of the Ladies' Garment Workers, Pres. Harry Van Arsdale, Jr., and Sec. Morris Iushewitz of the New York City Central Labor Council, and AFL-CIO Regional Dir. Michael Mann.

Joins Labor To Kick Off Campaign

By John M. Barry

Vice President Humphrey launched his campaign for the presidency by marching with the labor movement in the New York City Labor Day parade.

Humphrey was in the front rank of the nearly 150,000 marchers as the parade proceeded up Fifth Ave. and declared he would continue from there "right into the White House."

The Vice President made no speeches but shook the hands of hundreds of well-wishers along the parade route and waved to the marching trade unionists as he reviewed the balance of the parade along with AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany and other labor officials. (Story this page.)

"This is good Democratic territory," Humphrey commented.

It was his first public appearance following his nomination as the Democratic candidate for President. He used the occasion, in radio and television interviews following the parade, to renew his efforts to draw together party elements still chafing from the disputes that tore the Democratic National Convention in Chicago.

Humphrey praised his principal rival for the nomination, Sen. Eugene J. McCarthy of Minnesota, for compelling the nation "to take a good hard look" at Viet Nam and for bringing American youth "into the channel of politics." He expressed the hope that "before the campaign is too far along" Mc-

Backlog Confronts Congress

By David L. Perlman

Congress turned aside from the political conventions — but not from politics — to a logjam of major legislation it had left behind for a month-long recess.

In its first day back on the job, the House passed by voice vote a labor-backed bill modifying one of the needlessly restrictive sections of the Taft-Hartley Act.

The bill, which still needs Senate approval, would permit unions to negotiate employer contributions to scholarship programs and child care centers for workers' children.

The Clothing Workers, who are seeking these goals at the bargaining table, had support from the AFL-CIO and the Administration for legislation to expand the purposes for which joint union-management trust funds can be used.

On the second day, the House voted 315-0 approval of a three-year extension of the Manpower Development & Training Act, but added some restrictions to use of funds.

But most of the time in both legislative chambers was taken up in debate and commentary on the Democratic and Republican conventions, the pros and cons of the Chicago police force, and sundry suggestions for changes in the nation's nominating and election processes.

Off and on the floor, leaders of both parties came up with widely differing estimates of when Congress would be able to finally adjourn.

These ranged from a "two or three weeks" prediction by House Republican Leader Gerald R. Ford to the possibility raised by Senate Democratic Leader Mike Mansfield that a "lame duck" post-election session may be necessary to conclude the urgent business of the 90th Congress.

A certain Senate filibuster by a coalition of Republicans and Dixie Democrats against confirmation of Supreme Court Associate Justice Abe Fortas for Chief Justice was a key factor in Mansfield's pessimistic adjournment outlook.

The Senate Judiciary Committee put off action on the nomination after failing to muster a quorum for an opening day meeting.

The Senate also faces another major issue on which emotions run high—and debate may run long.

It still has to act on the Administration's request for stronger gun controls, including federal registration and licensing of firearms.

The House, before the recess, had voted to prohibit mail order sales of rifles and shotguns, strengthening a previously enacted ban on mail order sale of hand guns.

In Labor Day Address:

Opportunity for All Stressed by Meany

A society that offers wide opportunities to most of its members but almost no opportunity to the rest of them, "is a society that needs changing," AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany declared in a Labor Day radio address.

And "one of the most fundamental changes" needed in the American society, he pointed out, "must be the abolition of poverty—a goal of the trade union movement since its very inception."

Meany spoke over the Columbia Broadcasting System. Other nationwide Labor Day radio addresses were delivered by AFL-CIO Vice Presidents I. W. Abel, John J. Grogan and John H. Lyons, Jr.

Labor believes, Meany stressed, that the nation can do better than it has done.

The battle to eliminate poverty and resolve the urban crisis must begin, he said, with passage of legislation—now before Congress—to create 1 million public service jobs for the hard-core unemployed.

After jobs, Meany continued, must come decent housing to replace slums, "head start" and "catch-up" schooling for the deprived, effective distribution of surplus foods and "humane social welfare services."

Meany also called for an end to "the most indefensible form of poverty in America—the poverty of the working poor."

Higher Pay Floor

This can be done, he said, by building upon "a piece of sound, social legislation already on the statute books—the Fair Labor Standards Act."

"This means—at today's prices—a $2-an-hour basic minimum wage, with no discounts for agriculture or other categories, extended to cover the 12 million workers now excluded."

Turning to world affairs, Meany emphasized that there was no essential difference between communism's recent attack on "a small breath of freedom" in Czechoslovakia and the aggression of North Viet Nam against South Viet Nam.

He reiterated the AFL-CIO's support of the American effort "to

150,000 Join Big Parade In New York

New York—New York City trade unionists turned out in record numbers for the longest, largest Labor Day parade in the city's history.

Nearly 150,000 union members, led by Vice Pres. Humphrey and AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, the parade's grand marshal, marched up Fifth Ave. from 26th St. to 62nd St., as additional thousands of spectators lined the parade route.

Later, Humphrey and Meany returned to the reviewing stand before the New York City Public

Randolph Retirement Draws Wide Tribute

New Orleans—A grateful nation, labor movement and the union he helped found paid tribute to AFL-CIO Vice Pres. A. Phillip Randolph as he stepped down at age 79 as president of the Brotherhood of Sleeping Car Porters.

The President of the United States, the president of the AFL-CIO and the heads of the nation's leading civil rights organizations recalled in moving messages the contribution Randolph has made to the nation's social and economic progress.

Randolph stressed in his opening day address to the convention both the progress and the unfinished tasks of Negro workers but his basic tone was one of optimism.

He paid tribute to the Pullman porters who persisted during the "bitter, grey and hopeless days" of struggle for the right to organize and bargain.

"The Brotherhood gave the porter, and incidentally the Negro

Machinist Poll on Issues Backs Democratic Slate

Chicago—Delegates to the Machinists convention believe that the union's membership strongly backs Democratic presidential nominee Hubert H. Humphrey as most capable of handling critical problems facing the nation.

Humphrey drew heavy majorities as the candidate who would do the best job of improving labor laws, winning peace with freedom in Viet Nam, keeping the country prosperous and checking inflation and establishing justice and order in these cities.

The poll conducted at the convention was not a candidate preference poll but specifically asking the delegates' judgment on "how you think the majority of the members you represent feel about the qualifications of the nominee for President."

The poll disclosed that independent candidate George C. Wallace ran ahead of GOP nominee Richard M. Nixon in the four areas listed.

It gives Humphrey 92 percent on improving labor laws compared to 2 percent for Nixon and 6 percent for Wallace. Humphrey scored 82 percent on checking inflation compared to 8 percent for Nixon and 10 percent for Wallace.

On winning peace with freedom in Viet Nam, Humphrey scored 77 percent to 11 percent for Nixon and 12 percent for Wallace. On justice and order in the cities Humphrey's 67 percent compared to 7 percent for Nixon and 26 percent for Wallace.

Coast-to-Coast 'Get Out Vote' Parleys Slated

New Orleans — Bayard Rustin, executive director of the A. Philip Randolph Institute, told the Sleeping Car Porters convention that "get out the vote for Humphrey" conferences will be held coast-to-coast before the November elections.

"It is imperative for the Negro leadership to beat down the effort of segments of the Negro community to opt out the the political process, and to stay within the main political thrust of the nation," Rustin said at the convention's closing banquet.

"It is imperative that Nixon be defeated, and that Humphrey be elected, or the Negro will move backward."

The references to Humphrey were repeatedly applauded throughout the convention, even though the union traditionally does not endorse political candidates.

"There is confusion among the young Negroes who have now taken all the slogans of the Ku Klux Klan and applied them to the white man. This trend must be reversed," said Rustin.

He paid tribute to Randolph for having done more "than any other personality in the last 50 years" for the Negro in the labor movement and without.

Resolutions of the convention condemned "black unionism" as "irrational as dry rain, black sunshine or black mathematics," and urged Negroes to work for constructive political programs through COPE.

Delegates supported the Urban Coalition under former HEW Sec. John Gardner. They also favored implementation of the Kerner report, and paid tribute to the late Dr. Martin Luther King and the late Sen. Robert F. Kennedy.

Montana Labor Salutes Umber On Retirement

Glasgow, Mont.—Delegates representing 30,000 members of unions affiliated with the Montana AFL-CIO honored James S. Umber, retiring after 17 years as executive officer of the state body, at the 12th annual convention.

At a separate COPE convention, delegates voted unanimously to endorse Rep. Arnold Olsen for re-election and the Democratic candidate for the state's other congressional seat and top state offices.

The convention banquet was transformed into a farewell party for Umber, who was succeeded by James Murry of Helena. AFL-CIO Regional Dir. James J. Leary, banquet speaker, praised Umber for having tripled state AFL-CIO membership during his term in office.

The convention amended the constitution to permit the choice of two officers from one union—Murry and Vice Pres. John M. Miller, Jr., of the Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers. Also it voted active backing for the Farm Workers in their boycott of California grapes.

Area COPE Dir. Jack McCoy called in the keynote address for a "cleanout" in corporation domination of the Montana State House.

Assistant Dir. James R. O'Brien of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Social Security reported that the state workmen's compensation law is inadequate to protect injured workers and urged the delegates to work actively for improvements. Montana's law is inferior to those in three neighboring states, he said.

OPENING the convention of the union he helped found, AFL-CIO Vice Pres. A. Philip Randolph announced his retirement as president of the Sleeping Car Porters. The convention, held in New Orleans, echoed with tributes to Randolph who for more than half a century has been a crusader for equal opportunity, civil rights and justice.

Four Campbell Locals Approve Strike Pacts

Chicago—Four local unions accepted improved contracts in the nationwide strike against Campbell Soup Co. but two others rejected company offers and stayed on the picket lines.

Still out are members of the Meat Cutters at Chestertown, Md., and of the Teamsters at Sacramento, Calif. The latter union—Food Process Workers Local 228—voted 600-210 against the latest Campbell offer and asked that negotiations be resumed at the call of the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service.

Terms of a new two-year contract were ratified by members of the Machinists and Meat Cutters at Campbell plants in Camden and Moorestown, N.J.; Paris, Tex., and Napoleon, O.

Meat Cutters Sec.-Treas. Patrick E. Gorman said the striking unions achieved most of their major objectives except a common expiration date for all contracts.

The strikes, which began late in July, brought improved offers on wages, pensions, vacations and health benefits and broke a long pattern of take-it-or-leave-it offers which no union had previously been able to overcome, Gorman said.

Camden Local 80-A of the Meat Cutters settled first for a company offer to increase wages 13 cents an hour this year, plus 15 cents next year; company-paid health, medical and surgical coverage for employes' families instead of the former half-payment.

The agreement also provides four weeks' paid vacation after 20 years instead of the former 25; pension vesting for all employes after five years of service, and elimination of the age 30 vesting requirement that formerly existed.

Similar terms were approved by union members at Campbell plants in Moorestown, Paris and Napoleon. A clause continuing reporting-in pay for four hours or more was retained, though management wanted it eliminated.

Gorman listed these other advantages of a coordinated bargaining program which united the unions this year: Campbell's original offer was far better than its usual first offers; all contracts were improved after the strike though Campbell sent letters saying no further improvements would be made; an extra month's retroactivity was won at Camden and other locations.

The unions joined last February to coordinate their negotiations after years of fragmented settlements put into effect after one company offer. They walked out when contracts expired, and stayed out until Campbell offers were improved.

The strikers launched a nationwide Do Not Buy campaign with the full support of the AFL-CIO Executive Council. In a May 14 statement the council charged that "instead of collective bargaining, Campbell has attempted to use the obsolete and wholly unacceptable tactics of Boulwareism."

Settlements so far reached have indicated, Gorman said, that Campbell will no longer resort to the bargaining method named for Lemuel Boulware, retired General Electric Co. official noted for developing the one-offer system and then appealing to employes over the heads of union officials.

workers as a whole, a sense of racial and class identity and pride," said Randolph.

"While the Brotherhood fought to break down racial barriers in labor unions, it also fought against Negro workers permitting themselves to be used as scabs against their white brothers on strike."

First Meeting

At the Brotherhood's first meeting in the Elks Auditorium at 126th St. and Seventh Ave. in New York City on Aug. 25, 1925, Randolph presided, gave the prayer, began the singing of "Hold the Fort" and warned that no porter present should make a motion or ask a question "to avoid being reported by stool pigeons to the Pullman superintendents."

He traced the early organizing days, the first charter from the American Federation of Labor and the victory in a nationwide Pullman election in 1935.

He outlined gains in wages, working conditions, and said that the Brotherhood had lifted the porters "from a condition of semi-serfs to the status of middle-class wage earners."

Randolph credited the black militants with "deepening the American consciousness of the immediacy, magnitude and danger of the racial crisis in the cities."

He said, however, that a major liability of black militants is their "worship at the altar of the cult of violence." He called this commitment to violence "infantile leftism" and "a dangerous form of mindless madness."

He said the answer to riots and lawlessness is racial and social justice.

Claim Rejected

Randolph rejected the claim of some black power advocates to control of the so-called black community, as a solution to the unemployment problem of the Negro.

"Only big basic industrial and financial corporations national in scope can develop meaningful job opportunities," said Randolph.

On the 1968 election, he warned against the candidacy of Alabama Gov. George Wallace: "How bravely, you must remember, he stood in the door of the University of Alabama to stop and bar the entrance of young Negro students."

His remarks about Pres. Johnson drew repeated applause: "He has done more to advance the cause of civil rights than any president . . . appointments of Negroes to public office as American citizens of moral worth and capability . . . president of the war on poverty, the war on white racism and the father of the broadest and most far-reaching program of education, health and housing ever proposed . . ."

Randolph saluted AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany as "wholly committed to the policy that racial bias in labor unions is unsound, indefensible and morally wrong, and must go."

Randolph added: "The time will come, and soon, when not a single labor union bars a worker from membership or a seat in its policy-making bodies because he is black, and for this we must continue to fight.

"And the time will come, and soon, when no job will be denied a worker because of the color of his skin, and for this we must continue to fight."

Randolph spoke proudly of the establishment of the Dept. of Civil Rights of the AFL-CIO; the election of Negro trade unionists to the Executive Council of the AFL-CIO; increasing numbers of Negro workers on policy-making committees of national, international and local unions.

He noted the concept of fair employment practice as "the gift of the brotherhood," as a result of a proposed March on Washington of 100,000 Negroes for jobs in munitions plants and government in 1941, and the drive to abolish "Jim Crow" in the armed services.

Hailed in Messages

Congratulatory messages to Randolph were sent by Pres. Johnson, House Majority Whip Hale Boggs (D-La.) Meany and AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler; Whitney M. Young, Jr., executive director, National Urban League, and Roy Wilkins, NAACP executive director.

"Few men have had a more profound effect upon the social consciousness of Americans in this century than A. Philip Randolph," said the presidential message. "His courage, his wisdom, and his eloquent voice have been instruments of progress and justice for black people throughout our land. Where there was wrong, he sought to right it. Where there was bitterness, he sought to soothe it. Where there was hatred, he sought to end it.

"So much remains to be done to end second class citizenship in America. And because we have done so much together, because the good will, intelligence and passion of men like Phil Randolph continues to be available to our people, I believe we shall succeed in building the one, just and responsible America that is our common dream."

Donald Slaiman, director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Civil Rights, told the meeting that the Brotherhood and Randolph have made tremendous contributions to their members, the labor movement and to the country. "They have significantly demonstrated the need for co-operation between Negroes and other minorities with the American labor movement," he said.

The convention elected C. L. Dellums to succeed as president. Dellums, from Oakland, Calif., is a former vice president of the union.

Re-elected were Vice Pres. T. D. McNeal, Sec.-Treas. W. H. Bowe and five executive boards members, B. F. McLaurin, New York; C. L. Smith, Richmond; A. R. Daley, St. Louis; W. C. Isaacs, Los Angeles, and A. R. Blanchette, Montreal.

'Debt of Gratitude' Cited In Message from Meany

The American people and trade unions owe A. Philip Randolph a "great debt of gratitude" and "on behalf of the AFL-CIO I am proud to acknowledge it," Federation Pres. George Meany said in a message to the retiring president of the Sleeping Car Porters at the union's convention in New Orleans.

Expressing regret at Randolph's decision to step down, Meany said he is confident Randolph will continue "with undiminished vigor to serve the cause to which you have devoted your life—the betterment of all mankind.

The progress of recent years in the field of racial justice will be put to a crucial test in November, Meany said. He predicted the Nov. 5 elections "will determine whether full rights and full opportunity for all Americans will continue to be the major objective" of U.S. domestic policy.

"I am confident," Meany said, "your convention will do all in its power to see" that the social and economic gains of the last eight years "are accelerated by the election of candidates pledged to that end."

Elections Termed Crucial:

Machinists Hail 4-Year Gains In Members, Wages, Benefits

By Saul Miller

Chicago—The million-member Machinists union recorded a 20 percent membership growth, impressive wage gains and new bargaining breakthroughs in a fast and furious four years.

That was the record laid before more than 2,000 delegates from 49 of the 50 states and seven of 10 Canadian provinces by the IAM officers and Pres. P. L. Siemiller at the union's 27th convention here.

It was hailed by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany who told the delegates that the "tremendous strides" made in Machinists contracts proves once again that free collective bargaining and free unions "can provide economic justice" for union members and their families.

Siemiller in his keynote address to the convention commented that the union had passed through some of the "fastest and most furious years in our history" and noted that a strong strike fund is the key to a militant union.

He warned that the IAM and the trade union movement overall faces two basic problems keyed directly to the 1968 elections:

- The threat of a Congress "even more reactionary than the one that passed the Taft-Hartley Act."
- The threat of an economic recession that will increase unemployment and hinder bargaining for fair wages and decent standards.

Meany, reviewing the record of the AFL-CIO—which he stressed is the record of all of its constituent unions and not of the AFL-CIO itself—reported progress in better contracts, increased membership and new organization efforts.

"Trade unions in America as represented by the AFL-CIO today have contracts for the welfare, protection and advancement of its members that are far better than any previous contracts in any previous period in the history of the American labor movement or for that matter in any other labor movement," he declared.

The federation president called on the delegates to "burn this into your hearts and minds"—unless trade union members register and vote "we have no voice" and this is the key to the trade union movement staying in the forefront of the effort to build a better nation with a fair share for all.

"The answer to our problems," he declared, "is not to burn, but to build and to build an America which is truly a land of opportunity for all of the people . . . not just the majority. And let us seek constructive solutions, let us reject any idea of defeatism, dissolutionism and destruction and let us hold fast to the faith that we have in this nation; that we have the will and the power to achieve the good life for all of our citizens."

The problems of the cities, the poor, the minorities will be solved through political action that "puts into the seats of power in the legislative halls and the Congress of this nation people who understand the ideals of freedom; people who understand justice; people who understand what poverty is and want to eliminate it."

Siemiller in his keynote took sharp note also of the 1968 elections declaring that the basic economic issues "are overshadowed by racial and social issues which have deeply divided not only the nation but the labor movement. In an allusion to the third party candidacy of George C. Wallace, Siemiller said:

"If union members let their emotions overrule their reason—if they reject liberal, pro-union candidates for demagogues who offer nothing more than hard-nosed hatred and low wages, we will end up with a government that is not only racist but anti-union."

In his review of the past four years, the IAM president noted that a decision to eliminate constitutional changes or amendments from going to referendum imposes a "grave responsibility" on the delegates.

Charting membership growth over the past four years to 1,002,579 as of December 1967 he noted that it occurred during a period of increased strikes to win union objectives. The strikes not only resulted in large wage gains, he noted, but in new breakthroughs in bargaining—dental care plans, tool insurance, portable pensions, matched savings and other forms of job and income security.

Siemiller noted the campaign to reach the new, young members coming into the union—the efforts to offset the "apathy or even outright hostility of many youngsters coming into the workforce," as well as the creation of retired members clubs.

The government's recent steps to "cool the economy," he said, may cost 800,000 jobs. The move to slowdown the economy comes from big business which has racked up a 77 percent gain in after-tax profits and a 70 percent increase in dividends between 1960 and 1967.

"To really cure inflation," he asserted, "the place to start is not with the wages of the working people but with the profits and dividends of the big rich, because that is where inflation is."

As to the upcoming Congress, the IAM leader said that if the pattern of liberal losses in the 1966 elections is repeated this year "the results will most certainly be a far smaller, far weaker union when we gather for our next Machinists convention in 1972."

The officers report showed that of the five main classifications of membership in the union all showed increases in the past four years except on the railroads. The others are automotive, aerospace and electronics, air transport and manufacturing other than aerospace and electronics.

The union's total membership in transportation represents 21 percent of the total membership of the union, about 24 percent of the members are employed in aerospace. Six states—California, Illinois, New York, Washington, Missouri and Ohio—account for 54 percent of the U.S. membership.

The financial report showed that as of Jan. 1, 1968 the union had a net worth of $22.5 million and the strike fund balance at the end of 1967 was close to $7 million.

Strikers Win 6-Month Fight For Contract

El Paso, Tex.—Members of an AFL-CIO directly affiliated local union took everything that strikebreakers and a hostile management could dish out for six months, and won the "biggest ever" raise from W. R. Weaver Co., makers of telescopic rifle sights. In the process, placid workers turned into militant, determined unionists, their leaders reported.

The settlement was termed a major breakthrough for low-wage El Paso, across the border from a huge supply of unemployed labor.

The 275 workers won a pay raise of 7.5 percent; additional holiday and vacation time; a much higher guarantee for new employes after one year of service, and a better seniority plan in a new one-year agreement.

In addition, they defeated company insistence on removing an arbitration clause.

The local walked out Feb. 22 with more than 98 percent of the workforce, and no one abandoned the strike despite swarms of strikebreakers hired to take their jobs. They went back with an understanding that all strikers would return with the same seniority, pay increases and other benefits they would have had by remaining at work, Rep. David T. Lopez reported to AFL-CIO Regional Dir. Nicholas H. Kurko.

Texas AFL-CIO Pres. H. S. Hank Brown and Kurko assisted the union in the critical final week of negotiations.

Siemiller Attacks UAW on Raiding

Chicago—Machinists Pres. P. L. Siemiller charged here that officers of the Auto Workers are trying to justify a raiding program adopted by the union since it quit the AFL-CIO.

Siemiller's comments came after the UAW announced cancellation of the mutual assistance pact between the unions and claiming violations by the IAM.

The IAM president said the UAW is throwing around "wild charges and allegations for propaganda purposes," adding "there is no truth in them." The IAM, he declared, has never raided the UAW.

The Auto Workers disaffiliated from the AFL-CIO after being suspended for non-payment of per capita. The UAW had voted to withhold payment unless it was granted a special convention.

Straight-Time Pay 81% Of Workers' Income

Straight-time pay accounted for 81 percent of a worker's total compensation in 1966, Labor Dept. reports in its first study of what goes into the overall pay check.

Taking the "total private non-agricultural sector of the economy," the department's Bureau of Labor Statistics said that the other 19 percent covered pay for leave, overtime and other premiums, bonuses and terminal pay (9 percent) with employer contributions to legally required or private insurance and welfare programs making up the rest (10 percent).

In 1966 American workers averaged $3.40 an hour in total compensation — the straight-time pay plus the fringes.

Income in addition to straight-time pay totaled 32 cents a working hour. Eight cents was premium pay (mostly for overtime and work on weekends and holidays), 19 cents was pay for leave time (10 cents for vacations, 6 cents for holidays, and the remainder for sick, personal, and civic leave), and 5 cents was in the form of nonproduction bonuses and terminal payments.

Compensation which provides for deferred income amounted to 34 cents per hour of work and was about equally divided between legally required insurance programs and private welfare plans. Eleven cents of the legally required insurance payment was for social security and the remainder for unemployment insurance and workman's compensation.

The amount paid for private welfare plans included 7 cents for life, accident, and health insurance, 9 cents for pension and retirement plans, and the balance for vacation and holiday funds, severance, dismissal pay, and supplemental unemployment benefit funds, and savings and thrift plans.

Compensation was much higher for manufacturing employes ($3.67 a working hour) than for nonmanufacturing employes ($3.23). Manufacturing employes received 78 percent of their compensation in straight-time pay, compared with 82 percent for nonmanufacturing workers.

The current income in addition to straight-time pay accounted for 35 of the 44-cent compensation advantage of manufacturing employes.

New Officers Elected By Postal Motor Union

Atlanta—The Post Office Motor Vehicle Employes elected new officers, enlarged the executive board and raised national per capita payments at the union's 21st convention.

Delegates from 125 local unions in the United States and Puerto Rico heard Deputy Postmaster General Frederick C. Belen announce that he will meet soon with the officers and others to discuss the feasibility of making a cost study of intercity hauling by government-owned vehicles.

The convention gave Belen a standing ovation for giving what union Pres. Everett G. Gibson said was the first indication that the Post Office is willing to talk about the union's request for greater use of government vehicles in lieu of contract vehicles, and thus provide more work for union members.

The 225 delegates voted to enlarge the executive board from seven members to nine. When Gibson declined renomination, they elected Sec.-Treas. Chester W. Parrish as president for a two-year term.

Delegates also chose Vice Pres. Paul E. Jameson, St. Louis, to succeed Parrish, and named vice presidents in this order: Leon S. Hawkins, Detroit; Leon W. Hopton, Los Angeles; Ernest J. Romano, Pittsburgh, Pa.; Amedee Beaudry, Hartford, Conn., all incumbents; and new vice presidents Walter J. Marshall, New York City; Steven B. Louper, Seattle; Joseph B. Fleming, Dallas.

The convention heard reports that 20 new locals have been chartered in the last two years, with membership up from 6,800 to about 8,000. It voted to allow more funds for operating expenses by increasing per capita payments from $1.25 a month to $1.50.

Gibson will stay in office until Nov. 1, when new officers assume their posts.

42-Cent Gain Won By IBEW In Phone Pact

Philadelphia—Members of the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers in northwest Pennsylvania won elimination of wage zones and 42-cent wage increases in a new two-year contract with General Telephone Co. of Pennsylvania.

More than 2,200 plant workers and telephone operators in the Erie, Johnstown and Oil City areas are covered by the pact, which was reached without a strike vote.

Plant workers will get wage increases of 22 cents an hour this year and another 20 cents next year. Top rates for traffic department employes will go up by 15 cents an hour each year. Vacation improvements were won also, the IBEW's System Council T-1 announced.

Another System Council—T-4 in Illinois—voted Aug. 31 to reject an Illinois Bell Telephone Co. proposal on terms for settling a strike of 12,000 IBEW craftsmen that began May 8.

Management raised its previous offer of a wage hike from $24 a week to $27.50 over a three-year term and offered to upgrade more Illinois towns on the wage list. But the union intends to resume bargaining only for an acceptable wage increase confined to the remaining 18 months of its present contract, Council Chairman Robert A. Nickey said.

A Lie for Openers

FORMER VICE PRES. Richard M. Nixon, the Republican candidate for President, opened his campaign by lying to the nation's workers.

Nixon, in a statement released on Labor Day in New York City, charged that the average American worker had lost more than $1,000 in income through inflation since the last presidential election and that "new taxes and rising prices have more than wiped out all the pay raises he has won since 1965."

He said further that more than $2 billion of the social security trust funds "has disappeared in the government-generated inflation of the middle sixties."

Nixon made the accusations in charging that the Administration "has broken faith with the American workingman."

But, on both counts, the facts are just the reverse:

● An analysis of Labor Dept. statistics shows that since the last presidential election the average worker with a wife and two children has gained more than $400 in real wages, after deductions for all price increases and taxes.

● Social Security Administration figures show that over the same period OASDI trust funds actually rose more than $5 billion, despite major increases in retirement benefits and a steady rise in the number of workers drawing them.

Furthermore, the Nixon statement ignores other gains scored by the nation's working people under the current Administration, such as medicare and medicaid, increases in the federal minimum wage and extension of its protections to millions of additional workers.

These, too, mean income—the protection of income and savings for the elderly beset by catastrophic illness and bolstering of the basic wages of the lowest-paid workers.

So when it comes to advice on Labor Day, Mr. Nixon, don't do us any favors.

With No Apologies

I MAKE NO APOLOGIES for the fact that labor is strong in this country. I am very, very happy that it is strong. This is what I have lived to see.

What's wrong with power if it is used the way the American labor movement uses its power?

Now, look around for the results of labor's power.

We have the so-called affluent society. There are a lot of people left behind. But look around. There is a high wage economy in this country and it did not come as a gift of the great industrialists and the great captains of industry.

Yes, we have high wages, but only because we wrung them out of them. We used our power to raise wages.

The best customer of American business, the real life blood in this system is the mass purchasing power in the hands of the great mass of people in this country. That is the result of labor's power.

We can look around and look at the children of America. They are better housed, clothed, fed and better educated all over this great nation.

Well, if we have too much power, that's okay with me. Let's have some more of the same.

Looking At The Record:

Labor, Workers' Wages Suffer In Alabama Under Wallace

SOME PEOPLE who know George Wallace best—some of his fellow Southerners—have uncovered some facts concerning wages that ought to make workers think twice about the former Alabama governor who has presidential aspirations.

These southerners, banded together in an association known as the Southern Committee on Political Ethics (SCOPE), spelled out their findings in a pamphlet entitled "The Wallace Labor Record."

There's one section called "Working for Birmingham Wages." It says:

● If you're a carpenter it costs you more than $40 a week to work under George Wallace. Why? Birmingham wages (highest in Alabama) are $4 an hour compared to $5.45 in Chicago, $5.45 in Cleveland, $5.20 in San Francisco and $5.06 in Detroit.

● If you're a bus driver it costs you more than $30 a week to work under George Wallace. Why? Chicago bus drivers make $3.41 an hour, $3.25 an hour in Cleveland, $3.65 in San Francisco and $3.17 in Detroit.

● If you're a mechanic in a plant, it costs you about $20 a week to work under George Wallace. Why? You'd make only $3.09 an hour in Birmingham, but in Chicago $3.53 an hour, in Cleveland $3.53, in San Francisco $4.19 and $3.72 in Detroit.

● If you're a school teacher it would cost you $2,000 a year at a minimum to work under George Wallace.

Another section, titled "No Chance for New Jobs," refutes a Wallace "boast" that he has created a lot of new jobs in Alabama.

It cites Labor Dept. figures showing that from 1947 to 1966 the state had the lowest percentage increase in manufacturing jobs of any southeastern state, except for West Virginia, which suffered a decline.

It notes that Wallace "brags" over a 11.5 percent growth rate in employment in Huntsville, Ala., between 1960 and 1966, but doesn't mention that all but about 2 percent of it came from federal government space and defense program outlays.

In fact, the pamphlet declares, most of the job increase in the state in recent years is "the result of federal government expenditures."

SCOPE charges that Wallace "has loaded Alabama's tax structure against the working man in favor of the rich and well-to-do and the corporations."

It notes that Wallace, who ran for governor as a "friend of the working man," pushed through an increase in the sales tax after he was elected, despite his campaign against such an increase.

Further, SCOPE tells how he raised taxes on beer, tobacco, drivers' licenses and auto tags.

ALL OF THESE taxes "are easy for the rich to pay, but they come out of the working man's hide," the pamphlet stresses.

By contrast, SCOPE points out that Wallace let "the big corporations get off easy" by ramming through a law that requires a constitutional amendment to increase corporate taxes.

This is "literally an impossibility in a legislature which Wallace has stacked with rural legislators who are against the working man," SCOPE continues.

SCOPE also discloses that Birmingham wages and taxes aren't the only part of the George Wallace record where the working man suffers:

"He has denied the working man any real improvement in unemployment compensation laws, workmen's compensation laws.

"He draws his financial support from some of the biggest union haters in the country.

"He has kept the Alabama educational system among the poorest in the nation."

SCOPE was founded by Southerners including former Congressmen Brooks Hays of Arkansas, Carl Elliott of Alabama and Frank Smith of Mississippi. Barney Weeks, president of the Alabama Labor Council, AFL-CIO, is with them.

The list of its members is long, but it includes newsmen such as Ralph McGill, publisher of the Atlanta Constitution, Hugh Patterson, publisher of the Little Rock Gazette, and William Baggs, editor of the Miami News.

SCOPE also points out that organized labor has more than its share of trouble in Wallaceland. Between 1953 and 1964, for example, when union membership was increasing 64 percent in Arkansas, 47 percent in Florida and 20 percent in Kentucky, it was down 17 percent in Alabama.

Alabama under Wallace has been a land of strange contrasts, SCOPE says, where the sales tax is the highest and unemployment compensation is the lowest.

Rejects Silence, Evasion:

Humphrey Asks Nation to Back Firm Position for Human Rights

The following is excerpted from Vice Pres. Hubert H. Humphrey's speech accepting the presidential nomination of the Democratic national convention in Chicago.

OUR PARTY has debated the great issues before America in this very hall, and had we not raised these issues—troublesome as they were—we would have ignored the reality of change.

Had we just papered over the differences of frank, hard debate, we would deserve the contempt of our fellow citizens and the condemnation of history.

Yes, we dare to speak out and we have heard hard and sometimes bitter debate. But I submit that this is the debate, and this is the work of a free people, the work of an open convention and the work of a political party responsive to the needs of this nation.

Democracy affords debate, discussion and dissent. But, my fellow Americans, it also requires decision. And we have decided here, not by edict, but by vote; not by force, but by ballot.

Majority rule has prevailed but minority rights are preserved.

In the space of but a week this convention has literally made the foundations of a new Democratic Party structure in America. From precinct level to the floor of this convention, we have revolutionized our rules and procedures.

And that revolution is in the proud tradition of our party. It is in the tradition of Franklin Roosevelt, who knew that America had nothing to fear but fear itself.

And it is in the tradition of that one and only Harry Truman, who let 'em have it and told it like it was.

And that's the way we're going to do it from here on out.

And it is in the tradition of that beloved man, Adlai Stevenson, who talked sense to the American people—and oh, tonight, how we miss this great, good and gentle man of peace in America.

And my fellow Americans, all that we do and all that we ever hope to do, must be in the tradition of John F. Kennedy, who said to us: "Ask not what your country can do for you, but what can you do for your country."

And, my fellow Democrats and fellow Americans, in that spirit of that great man let us ask what together we can do for the freedom of man.

And what we are doing is in the tradition of Lyndon B. Johnson, who rallied a grief-stricken nation when our leader was stricken by the assassin's bullet and said to you and said to me and said to all the world—let us continue.

And I truly believe that history will surely record the greatness of his contribution to the people of this land.

Tonight to you, Mr. President, I say thank you.

Yes, my fellow Democrats, we have recognized and indeed we must recognize the end of an era and the beginning of a new day—and that new day, and that new day belongs to the people—to all the people, everywhere in this land of the people, to every man, woman and child that is a citizen of this republic.

YES, THE NEW DAY is here across America Throughout the entire world forces of emancipation are at work. We hear freedom's rising chorus—"Let me live my own life, let me live in peace, let me be free," say the people.

If America is to make a crucial judgment of leadership in this coming election, then let that selection be made without either candidate hedging or equivocating.

Winning the presidency, for me, is not worth the price of silence or evasion on the issue of human rights.

And winning the presidency—and listen well—is not worth a compact with extremism.

I choose not simply to run for President. I seek to lead a great nation.

And either we achieve through justice in our land or we shall doom ourselves to a terrible exhaustion of body and spirit.

I base my entire candidacy on the belief which comes from the very depths of my soul—which comes from basic religious conviction that the American people will stand up, that they will stand up for justice and fair play, and that they will respond to the call of one citizenship—one citizenship open to all for all Americans.

So this is the message that I shall take to the people, and I ask you to stand with me.

I am keenly aware of the fears and the frustrations of the world in which we live. It is all too easy, isn't it, to play on these emotions. But I do not intend to do so. I do not intend to appeal to fear, but rather to hope. I do not intend to appeal to frustration, but rather to your faith.

I shall appeal to reason and to your good judgment.

The American presidency is a great and powerful office, but it is not all-powerful. It depends most of all upon the will and the faith and the dedication and the wisdom of the American people.

So I call you forth—I call forth that basic goodness that is there—I call you to risk the hard path of greatness.

And I say to America. Put aside recrimination and dissension. Turn away from violence and hatred. Believe—believe in what America can do, and believe in what America can be, and with the vast—with the help of the vast, unfrightened, dedicated, faithful majority of Americans, I say to this great convention tonight, and to this great nation of ours, I am ready to lead our country.

To Protect Consumers:

Poultry Inspection Law Hailed, But Fight Looms on Fish Bill

A LEADING CONSUMER spokesman for organized labor hailed the new and stronger federal poultry inspection law that expands the scope and effectiveness of efforts to assure that poultry is clean and safe for human consumption.

Arnold Mayer, legislative representative for the Meat Cutters, said that while poultry "isn't inherently critical or unhealthful," it spoils easily and can carry diseases that can be transmitted to human beings. He said the new law will help assure consumers that they are buying wholesome birds that have been processed in clean plants, and are getting their "money's worth."

The union spokesman emphasized that in addition to safeguards in the processing of millions of pounds of uninspected poultry now sold each year, the law, for the first time, will apply to warehousing, distribution and retailing of the products.

Mayer was interviewed on Labor News Conference, broadcast Tuesdays at 7:35 p.m. EDT, on the Mutual Radio Network.

MAYER SAID he is confident that both the meat and poultry inspection laws adopted by the 90th Congress will be "effectively implemented" by the federal and state departments of agriculture charged with that responsibility.

"It is true that the state commissioners of agriculture fought certain provisions of the (poultry) law . . . and the major part of the meat inspection act," he noted. "But this is now the law of the land and I assume they will abide by it."

He also pointed out that the law requires regular reports to Congress and the public on its implementation and operation.

Mayer predicted that fish inspection will be a major consumer issue in Congress next year, and that the fight for such a program will be even harder than the battles for meat and poultry inspection. That is so, he said, because fish presents "more serious problems than meat and poultry," and there is now no mandatory fish inspection programs at either the state or federal level.

Reporters questioning Mayer were Nick Kotz of the Des Moines Register, and Alan Adams of Business Week magazine.

By Press Associates, Inc.

FOR SOME YEARS, Prof. Sylvester Petro of New York University's School of Law has been looked upon as a prime innovator and intellectual exponent of anti-labor philosophy.

His book, "The Labor Policy of the Free Society," sets forth in the most lofty language some precise steps to undermine effective trade unionism and strengthen the hands of the employer.

The American Conservative Union has just published a new pamphlet by Prof. Petro entitled "An Effective Labor Policy for the United States."

Some of the parallels between Prof. Petro's views and those expressed in the Republican Party platform drawn up at the Miami Beach convention are rather striking.

It seems hard to believe that either Petro or some of his students did not have a hand in writing the GOP plank and certainly, if Nixon should become a White House occupant, Petro intellectualism cannot be discounted.

The professor strikes an extremely patriotic note in his new pamphlet, stating, in effect, that if unions are not restricted and their pay demands held down, this country will cease to be a world power.

He completely ignores the whole question of a profit inflation and asserts that "the overwhelming power and privilege which trade unions have acquired, partly from Congress but mainly through maladministration of Congressional labor policies" has resulted in excessive wage increases.

We have been hearing a great many attacks on the National Labor Relations Board by opponents of organized labor. Petro joins in this outcry.

To put this in prospective, when the Eisenhower-appointed majority took over the NLRB in the 1950's, the board reversed numerous past precedents favorable to labor and substituted decisions favorable to management. However, it did not reverse a single pro-management ruling. The professor didn't complain.

Here are some of the proposals he had advanced:

Union Shop: He would wipe out all forms of union security, saying that when this is done, the National Labor Relations Act "will become in effect a national right-to-work law . . ."

Representation: Non-union members in the bargaining unit would not be represented by the union unless they desire it.

Free Speech: He would give far more latitude to employers to make any kind of promises or threats against workers if they vote for the union in representation elections.

Anti-Strike Action: Petro says that "if union members are free during strikes to take other work, then employers must be free to seek and obtain—without union interference—alternative methods of getting the work done that the strikers have abandoned."

Relief: Individuals should be free to go to the courts to seek relief—"to bring their suits before judges whose fairness and disinterest can be relied upon." With this statement Petro offers another slap at the NLRB.

THE REPUBLICAN PLATFORM, as always with politicians, does not hit these issues so bluntly, but the intent can easily be read into it.

For example, the GOP labor plank warns against "any administrative agency entrusted with labor-law enforcement from defying the letter and spirit of these laws."

In point of fact, no one has accused the NLRB of "defying the letter and spirit" of the NLRA except Prof. Petro and those who think like him.

The Republican platform, too, warns about wage settlements which have "contributed to inflation"—which is Petro's line, or vice versa.

On one thing the Republicans don't kid around—they are for so-called "right-to-work" legislation.

It is Petro who goes far deeper into the meaning of this approach and since he is the intellectual the anti-labor forces look to, what he says could be extremely important if Nixon is elected.

CONSUMERS will get greater assurance of wholesome poultry under the inspection law enacted in this Congress, Arnold Mayer, Meat Cutters' legislative representative, center, reported on Labor News Conference. Questioning him on the AFL-CIO program were Nick Kotz, left, of the Des Moines Register, and Alan Adams, of Business Week Magazine.

New York Parade—Labor Has Its Day

THOUSANDS of New Yorkers lined Fifth Ave. to watch the Labor Day parade by nearly 150,000 union members, the largest turnout ever. The parade lasted from 10 a.m. to 5:30 p.m.

QUEEN OF THE PARADE was Miss Union Maid, Robbie Wolf of the Television & Radio Artists, who rode this float with her union maids in waiting.

FARM WORKERS delegation spread the word on boycott of struck California grapes. Vice Pres. Humphrey and AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany reviewed parade from grandstand.

PARADE was a family affair for many of the marchers representing some 400 locals of 40 national and international unions, as with this group from Local 342 of the Meat Cutters.

CHINESE DRAGON and traditional Chinese masks were part of the display by Ladies' Garment Workers Local 23-25, a "melting-pot" local with members of varied national origins. Scene is directly in front of reviewing stand at New York Public Library.

MORE THAN 100 FLOATS took part in the parade showing the work, products and tools of the sponsoring crafts. This one, by Local 3 of the IBEW, displays another timely message.

Humphrey Marches:

Parade Tops Salute Of Labor Holiday

The marchers, representing some 400 metropolitan area locals of 40 national and international unions, stepped off at 10 a.m. under ideal weather conditions. Not until 5:30 in the evening did the last of the hundreds of parade units reach the finish line.

In the vanguard of the parade, besides Meany and Humphrey, were New York City AFL-CIO Pres. Harry Van Arsdale, Jr., Parade Chairman James L. O'Hara of the Hotel & Motel Trades Council and three deputy grand marshals—Presidents Fred O'Neal of Actors Equity, Louis Stulberg of the Ladies' Garment Workers and Matthew Guinan of the Transport Workers.

One of the lead floats bore the queen of the parade, Robbie Wolf of the Television & Radio Artists, along with her union maids in waiting.

In all, there were more than 100 floats, many of them depicting the work and the tools of the sponsoring union locals.

And there were more than 150 musical units—bands, fife and drum corps, and bagpipers—to set the cadence and add to the color and spirit of the parade. Filling in the intervals where the bands were widely spaced was march music played by a group of Local 802 Musicians stationed opposite the reviewing stand.

Taking part in the parade were members of the casts of Broadway and off-Broadway shows, circus performers, television and motion picture personalities—all members of the theatrical unions.

Among the guests on the reviewing stand were officials of labor federations in Ethiopia, Nigeria, Ghana, Senegal, Zambia, Japan, Austria and other countries.

But for the most part, the parade belonged to the rank-and-file working men and women of New York, young and old, black and white, craftsmen and factory workers, hotel employes and store clerks.

The three-pronged theme of the parade—civil rights, youth and the role of women in industry—was reflected in many of the signs carried by the unionists.

A number of the marchers wore the traditional costumes of their native lands. The most striking of these groups, perhaps, was Local 23-25 of the ILGWU, a "melting pot" local with a large number of Chinese members bearing the colorful masks and paper dragons associated with Chinese parades.

At this point, a young girl in the contingent came to the reviewing stand to present a fortune cookie to the Vice President, who was delighted by the message inside: "Wise citizen knows that vote for Humphrey is vote for better life."

A group from the United Farm Workers Organizing Committee carried banners advertising the boycott of struck California grapes. And New York City Painters, on strike against major contractors since Aug. 1, presented their case to the public via signs, placards and handbills.

The city's hotel workers joined the parade directly from a mass meeting in Madison Square Garden held to protest a lag in current negotiations.

Elsewhere around the country, Labor Day was celebrated by union members in traditional observances. There were countless picnics sponsored by central labor bodies, like those in Gary, Ind., and Odessa, Tex. And there were church services taking more solemn note of labor's role in American society.

In Washington, D.C., the annual mass of St. Joseph the Worker was celebrated at the Shrine of the Sacred Heart by Msgr. George L. Gingrass, with Patrick Cardinal O'Boyle presiding.

Following the mass, a wreath was placed by AFL-CIO Vice Pres. David Sullivan, head of the Service Employes, at the statue of James Cardinal Gibbons, pioneer supporter of the trade union movement.

And in Pennsauken, N.J., the man generally credited as the father of Labor Day was honored at ceremonies sponsored by the Camden AFL-CIO. A wreath was placed at the grave of Peter J. McGuire, the Carpenters Union official who proposed that a day be set aside in tribute to labor "at the most pleasant season of the year, nearly midway between the Fourth of July and Thanksgiving." Congress followed through by designating the national holiday in 1894.

TRADE UNIONISM in America is termed the single loudest voice speaking out for the poor and the underprivileged by AFL-CIO Vice Pres. David Sullivan at a Labor Day observance in Washington, D.C. Sullivan, who is president of the Service Employes, laid the traditional wreath at the statue of James Cardinal Gibbons, background, a 19th century leader in the fight for the rights of workers. Patrick Cardinal O'Boyle, seated, presided earlier at the annual Labor Day mass.

APARTMENTS AND TOWNHOUSES, which will rent from $67 to $145 for the various units, rise at the Oakland, Calif., Acorn project site. The Alameda County Building Trades Council is sponsoring the housing project for the racially-integrated community which will offer 780 apartments and townhouses when completed.

Freedom, Opportunity Theme of Broadcasts defend the freedom of the South Vietnamese people to run their country as they choose, without outside interference by force."

All of the nation's critical problems—the decision as to whether past gains are expanded upon and improved—make the 1968 elections "assume crucial proportions," Meany observed.

His plea to union members, and all other Americans, was to make sure they are registered to vote and then cast their ballots on Election Day based on "reason and logic."

Abel, president of the Steelworkers, spoke on the American Broadcasting Co. network of the "myth" that workers' wage increases are responsible for high living costs.

Cites Profit Figures

He cited figures to show that after-tax profits "skyrocketed" by 95.5 percent and stockholders' dividends rose 73.1 percent between 1960 and 1968, while workers' after-tax earnings increased by 26.6 percent during the same period.

Further, he pointed out, the weekly buying power of the worker increased only slightly in 1965 and started downhill in 1966.

Abel noted that some economists, government officials and newspapers are calling for restraint on wages. He asked: "What are the signs of profit-restraint on the part of business? There are none."

Grogan, president of the Marine & Shipbuilding Workers, urged listeners on the National Broadcasting Co. network to remember that millions of American workers still do not enjoy the holidays, vacations and wages won by unions.

In addition to the unemployed, he noted, there are workers who "are both unorganized and exploited like peons"—such as those in the southern textile industry. Also, he said, there are the "working poor" uncovered by laws.

Emphasizing that the lot of these workers can be improved by enforcing existing laws and bringing uncovered workers under them, he added: "It can be done; it should be done; it must be done."

Lyons, president of the Iron Workers, deplored the continuance of "tax loopholes" that allow wealthy families and corporations to escape a fair share of taxes at the expense of workers. He spoke over the Mutual Broadcasting Co.

If "loopholes"—such as excess mineral depletion allowances, capital gains schemes and other tax dodges—were closed, Lyons said, arguments that this country cannot afford social progress would be reduced to "absurdity."

Urging workers and all Americans to prod congressional candidates for their views on the tax structure—particularly the candidates who "talk about federal spending," Lyons said:

"It is up to us to fight for the election of a Congress committed to taking on the richest and most powerful lobby in the country—the tax-loophole lobby."

Naval Home Workers Switch to Affiliated Unit

Philadelphia—Employes of the Philadelphia Naval Home voted 62-9 to have the Philadelphia AFL-CIO Metal Trades Council represent them instead of the National Federation of Federal Employes, unaffiliated, which had bargaining rights for four years. The home houses more than 200 retired Navy men.

LBJ Cites Goals Of Labor, Nation

Labor's fight in these times, and America's fight, must be on behalf of the disadvantaged—"the victims of racism, poor education, no skills, language barriers and hunger," Pres. Johnson declared in a Labor Day message.

He called upon persons of all colors, ethnic groups and faiths to "open their hearts and work with a new sense of purpose to help the disadvantaged enter the mainstream of our society."

Among specific "goals," the President stressed that the nation "must bring the unemployment insurance system into the 1960's by extending coverage and increasing benefits to help ease the financial burden between jobs."

Homes Go Up In Oakland's Acorn Project

Oakland, Calif.—A new, moderately priced housing project is nearing completion here under the sponsorship of the trade union movement in cooperation with a cross-section of community groups.

When completed, Acorn will offer 780 apartments and townhouses in an integrated community with all the necessary facilities and approaches to make for a cohesive neighborhood.

The non-profit sponsor of this unique urban renewal project is the Alameda County Building Trades Council, whose members are involved in the construction and which will be responsible for the maintenance, management and racial integration of the complex.

The redevelopment of the area was first attempted in 1956 and failed. In 1965 the Acorn project was launched again, this time with union sponsorship and a combined effort by civic and trade union leaders.

The high level of cooperation between public authorities, minority groups and the unions has brought the project to its present stage of near completion.

On the basis of experience with the Acorn project, the Oakland Redevelopment Agency has launched a second project called Oak Center with the emphasis on rehabilitation with a minimum of disruption.

The Acorn project consists of townhouses with units ranging in size from studio apartments to four-bedroom units with completely equipped kitchens and carpeted resilient tile floors. They will rent from $67 per month for studio apartments to $145 per month for four-bedroom units.

Labor Rallies Vote to Lower Interest Rate

Spokane, Wash. — Delegates to the 11th annual convention of the Washington AFL-CIO cheered an announcement that a labor-sponsored proposal to lower the maximum retail credit interest rate from 18 percent to 12 percent true annual interest rate will be on the general election ballot for a statewide vote Nov. 5.

Earlier the convention gave a solid roar of approval when Council Pres. Joseph Davis asked the delegates if they wanted to endorse the proposal, sponsored by Davis and Sec.-Treas. Marvin L. Williams. The measure was put on the ballot as Initiative 245 with 122,565 signatures, 22,000 more than the state law requires.

Davis told the delegates to be prepared for an "expensive, massive" campaign by banks and big retail firms against Initiative 245.

He called on union members to work vigorously for the election of the Humphrey-Muskie presidential ticket, saying "you know we cannot support Richard M. Nixon."

The five-day convention took action on 104 resolutions. It endorsed Sen. Warren G. Magnuson (D) for re-election and other congressional, state and local candidates. The delegates approved granting 18-year-olds the right to vote; endorsed proposals for improvements in unemployment compensation and workmen's compensation. They called for genuine tax reform by the state legislature.

Magnuson told the delegates that while Congress has "passed a whole raft of consumer protection laws" including automobile safety and truth-in-lending legislation, "we still have much more to do."

Joins Labor Day Marchers:

Humphrey Starts Campaign, Pushes Bid for Party Unity

Carthy would "see fit to join us."

The moves toward party unity began, however, with Humphrey's acceptance speech, which electrified the convention delegates and brought them roaring to their feet. (Excerpts, Page 5.)

The Vice President made a direct appeal to both McCarthy and Sen. George McGovern of South Dakota, who had emerged as the candidate rallying supporters of the slain Sen. Robert F. Kennedy, "to help me in this difficult campaign that lies ahead."

And he reminded the delegates who had opposed his nomination "that all of your goals, that all of your high hopes, that all of your dreams, all of them will come to naught if we lose this election and many of them can be realized with the victory that can come to us."

McGovern and numerous other Kennedy and McCarthy supporters came to the podium to congratulate Humphrey and give evidence of their support following his speech, in which he proclaimed "the end of an era and the beginning of a new day."

The Vice President acknowledged the turmoil and the disputes that had marked the convention, but in a pointed contrast to the blandness of the Republican convention three weeks earlier, he observed:

"Had we just papered over the differences of frank, hard debate, we would deserve the contempt of our fellow citizens and the condemnation of history. . . . I submit that this is the debate, and this is the work of a free people, the work of an open convention and the work of a political party responsive to the needs of this nation."

Humphrey paid tribute to the party traditions set by Franklin D. Roosevelt, Harry S Truman, Adlai Stevenson and John F. Kennedy. And he saluted Pres. Johnson for accomplishing "more of the unfinished business of America than any of his modern predecessors."

He said the nation approached the presidential campaign at a time when three "realities" confronted it:

- "The necessity for peace in Viet Nam and in the world."
- "The necessity for peace and justice in our cities and in our nation."
- "The paramount necessity for unity in our country."

On Viet Nam, the Vice President noted that it had posed a "vexing and painful issue" during the convention. He called for recognition not only of the differences within the party over the war, but also of "the much larger areas of agreement."

"And," he went on, "if there is one lesson that we should have learned, it is that the policies of tomorrow need not be limited by the policies of yesterday."

Referring to the violent clashes between police and anti-war demonstrators that had wracked Chicago during the convention, Humphrey voiced "sorrow and distress" over the incidents and the resulting injuries, declaring:

"Surely, we have now learned the lesson that violence breeds counterviolence and it cannot be condoned, whatever the source."

Later, in an interview as the Chicago riots continued to provoke widespread comment, Humphrey defended the police and Mayor Richard Daley against criticism of their countermeasures against "acts of provocation almost beyond endurance," although he said he was sure Daley "didn't want the beating of people with those clubs."

The Vice President called for a full-scale investigation of the violence by a private commission from a university group, a foundation or a law association, with examination of the role of the demonstrators themselves, the police and the news media.

Meany, addressing the Machinists' convention the following week in Chicago, also defended the police against charges that they had "overreacted."

He said he had seen the "invaders" who came to Chicago "with the announced intention of upsetting the ordinary way of life of this city, of preventing the people of Chicago from welcoming the guests in their midst."

"What would you do," he asked the IAM delegates, "if some group advertised that they were coming in here to prevent you from doing business as you have a right to do, prevent you from holding this convention? I know what you would do with this dirty-necked and dirty-mouthed group of kooks. To be very frank, I am afraid that you might overreact."

The Machinists later adopted a resolution citing the objective of "many radical groups" to disrupt the Democratic convention and "commending Mayor Daley for his conduct and actions."

Injuries to newsmen covering the Chicago rioting drew a strong protest from Executive Vice Pres. William J. Farson of the Newspaper Guild against "unprovoked and brutal" attacks. He urged that the policemen responsible "be promptly identified and disciplined" and declared that when members of the working press fulfilling their duties are set upon by police or arrested, "every principle of freedom of the press and the people's right to know is being assaulted."

Humphrey's Republican opponent for the presidency, former Vice Pres. Richard M. Nixon, chose Chicago as the kick-off site for his own campaign following the Democratic convention.

Nixon rode through the Loop amid a shower of ticker-tape and confetti and crowds that gave him, he said, "the greatest reception we've ever had in Chicago." His aides asserted, however, that Chicago had been selected weeks ago for the initial campaign appearance and not to draw a contrast with the troubles that beset the Democrats.

Nixon ended his ride through the city's streets at the Sheraton-Blackstone Hotel, across the street from where the Machinists were meeting. He managed to avoid crossing the street, however, to address the 2,000 IAM delegates who had invited him to speak at their convention along with Humphrey.

House, Senate Return to Act On Backlog

tration and licensing provision had been optimistic that the wave of public outrage over America's political assassinations would make it possible to strengthen the bill. But vociferous protests prompted by the powerful National Rifle Association and other groups have caused a number of congressional supporters of strong controls to hedge or backtrack.

There are major budgetary decisions—which will affect major government programs—still to be made by Congress.

Action taken in the next few weeks will determine the level of aid to education, model cities and housing, the nation's foreign aid program, anti-poverty operations, food stamp expansion and the future of the farm program.

Hanging over the appropriations battle is the already-enacted directive to the President to cut billions of dollars from the money Congress has voted.

Pres. Johnson summoned Democratic congressional leaders to the White House to urge completion of action on some 40 Administration bills.

While the Administration is pushing for action, Republican congressional leaders are expected to seek to limit the remainder of the session to "must" appropriations bills and relatively noncontroversial measures.

Both the House and Senate can expect to face a growing absentee problem as Election Day nears—with the entire House and 34 senators up for election.

Democrats Pick Hughes For Iowa's Senate Seat

Democratic Gov. Harold E. Hughes of Iowa and David M. Stanley, a Republican state senator, will square off in the November election for the Senate seat of Republican Sen. Bourke B. Hickenlooper, who is retiring.

In Iowa's primary election, Hughes won the Democratic nomination over a single opponent while Stanley scored a victory over three primary foes.

The gubernatorial post will go to either Paul Franzenburg, state treasurer, unopposed in the Democratic primary, or Robert D. Ray, former GOP state chairman, who defeated two opponents.

In Nevada's primary, Republicans named Lt. Gov. Edward Fike to face Democratic Sen. Alan Bible who had no opposition for nomination to a third term.

GOP State Sen. James Slattery will challenge incumbent Rep. Walter S. Baring, a Democrat, for the state's single House seat, each having defeated single opponents in their party.

In North Dakota, Robert P. McCarney, a Bismarck auto dealer, edged out a single opponent to gain the GOP nomination to face Democratic Gov. William L. Guy, unopposed in a primary bid for his fourth term.

Voting in the state also produced the following line-up for other offices in November:

Sen. Milton R. Young (R) will be opposed by Democrat Herschel Lashkowitz, Fargo mayor. Representatives Thomas S. Kleppe and Mark Andrews, both Republicans, will face Democrats Rolland Redlin and Bruce Hagen.

Meanwhile, Republicans gained an additional House seat with the swearing in of Rep. James Collins of Texas. He won in a special election over Mrs. Elizabeth Pool, who sought to succeed her late husband, Rep. Joe Pool (D-Tex.).

Free Labor Seen Key To World of Well-Being

Blackpool, England—AFL-CIO fraternal delegates brought messages of free labor solidarity to the British Trades Union Congress here.

Musicians Pres. Herman D. Kenin told delegates to the centennial convention of Britain's trade union federation that free labor movements, working together, "can build a world of peace, freedom and human well-being."

He hailed the "100 years of progress and growth" marked by the TUC.

Pres. William A. Gillen of the Insurance Workers reported on U.S. labor's progress in "the never-ending struggle for economic justice and human dignity."

Not 'Sick'

Gillen told the delegates that remarks about America being a "sick society" are "utter nonsense." This nation faces tough, critical problems, he said, but such "meaningless talk" ignores steady progress made toward solving them.

Kenin, an AFL-CIO vice president, said that the struggle between freedom and dictatorship is "the overriding issue of our times."

"While it may be more complicated in form than it was in the days of Dunkirk," he said, "it is identical in substance and importance with the issue or the threat which confronted all liberty-loving mankind—and especially your country—three decades ago."

The confrontation is present in the "shame" of the Berlin wall, the Viet Nam crisis, the tension and conflict in the Middle East, in the splitting of Germany and Korea and in all disarmament talks, Kenin said.

Czech Tragedy

"And even as I speak," he added, "we have fresh and poignant before us the terrible tragedy which has befallen the long-suffering people of Czechoslovakia, where Soviet imperialists have brutally attacked their attempt to breathe the fresh and clean air of freedom."

Kenin said the AFL-CIO, "and I am sure you of the TUC," fully endorsed the Intl. Confederation of Free Trade Union's condemnation of the "brutal invasion" by the Soviets and their satellites.

The AFL-CIO and TUC must "work tirelessly" to make ICFTU "a most powerful force for building a world free from hunger, dictatorship and war," Kenin said.

Gillen traced American labor's progress since 1960 in helping to secure civil rights legislation, aid to schools, anti-poverty programs, minimum wage improvements, more housing, and "many new achievements in public policy."

"And still we are not satisfied because there is much more to be done," he declared.

The forces at work in American society are varied and the pressures are great, Gillen said, adding that "it would be unrealistic to expect it to be otherwise" considering the problems that "have gone too long unattended."

"You should, however," he pointed out, "clearly understand that the civil disturbances . . . in our cities are condoned by no right-thinking American, black or white."

In fact, Gillen said, the lawlessness has "compounded the difficulties" of those who seek progress by providing ammunition to "the proponents of no change who can be found in any society."

The AFL-CIO is certain that the present surge of lawlessness in the United States "will exhaust itself" and the ranks of those seeking meaningful progress "will steadily grow," Gillen stated.

Setbacks in the drive for a decent life and decent society are always followed by a surge to "a higher plateau," Gillen said. "This is the story of mankind. This is the story of unions. And so will it be, I am sure, the story of my country."

Unemployment Declines to 3.5 Percent

AFL-CIO News

Vol. XIII | Issued weekly at 815 Sixteenth St., N. W. Washington, D. C. 20006 $2 a year | Second Class Postage Paid at Washington, D. C. | Saturday, September 14, 1968 | No. 37

Teenagers Head Back To Classes

By Duane Emme

The nation's unemployment rate dropped by two-tenths of 1 percent between July and August to 3.5 percent, largely due to a reduction in youth joblessness, the Labor Dept. reported.

The rate had been at 3.5 percent—a post-Korean War low—in April and May, only to rise again in the summer with schools closing and an influx of teenagers into the job pool.

While teenagers begin to leave their jobs or job-hunting in August for a return to school, this August's exodus of the "seekers" was larger-than-usual, the department said.

As a result, the civilian labor force decreased by about 761,000 to 80.2 million between July and August. More than 550,000 of the decrease was in the teenage labor force. The 16-19 year old jobless rate dropped from 13.6 to 12 percent.

Another factor in the unemployment decline, according to the department's Bureau of Labor Statistics, was a less than seasonal increase in joblessness among adult women. Their jobless rate decreased from 3.9 to 3.7 percent between July and August.

The unemployment rate for adult men was 2.2 percent in August, unchanged from July.

The total of unemployed persons in August was 2.8 million, 450,000 fewer than in July and a decline of some 200,000 more than seasonally expected, BLS said. Unemployment was down about 170,000 over the year.

The jobless rate for nonfarm laborers fell from 8.5 to 7.5 percent between July and August, and the rate for service workers went down from 5.1 to 4 percent. Unemployment rates for white-collar workers (2 percent), skilled workers (2.5 percent) and semi-skilled workers (4.5 percent) were essentially unchanged in August.

The unemployment rate for nonwhite workers was 6.2 percent in August, down three-tenths of 1 percent from July. The improvement was credited to lower jobless levels for non-white teenagers and women. The jobless rate for whites, at 3.2 percent, was not significantly changed over the month.

On the employment side, the department reported that nonfarm payrolls increased by 200,000 between July and August to 68.4 million seasonally adjusted. Since May 1968 non-farm employment has risen by 600,000.

Humphrey Scores Nixon On GOP Tie to 'Reaction'

Fortas Still Under Fire Of Coalition

By David L. Perlman

A bitter attack on the Supreme Court and on Pres. Johnson's nomination of Associate Justice Abe Fortas to become Chief Justice continued into its third month under the leadership of a Republican senator from Michigan and a Democratic senator from Mississippi.

Sen. Robert P. Griffin (R-Mich.) reiterated his intention to lead a filibuster aimed at preventing the Senate from voting on the confirmation of Fortas.

He urged the Senate Judiciary Committee, headed by Sen. James O. Eastland (D-Miss.) to reopen hearings which it had completed more than a month ago on the Fortas nomination.

Griffin had a new "accusation"—a report that Fortas had a hand in writing the President's 1966 State of the Union address and in drafting a bill to provide Secret Service protection for presidential candidates after the assassination of Sen. Robert F. Kennedy.

Eastland promptly complied but agreed, at the insistence of other committee members, to let the committee vote on confirmation Sept. 17.

The committee spent some time looking at so-called "dirty pictures" involved in Supreme Court decisions on obscenity laws and Sen. Strom Thurmond (R-S.C.), an Eastland ally on the committee, said Fortas should be brought back "to Back Humphrey Ticket:

Machinist Delegates Roar Endorsement

Chicago—Vice Pres. Hubert Humphrey won endorsement and a noisy, marching demonstration from more than 2,000 delegates to the Machinist union's 80th anniversary convention here.

The uproar came after the Democratic presidential candidate called IAM Pres. P. L. Siemiller from California and spoke to the convention by telephone.

Only a handful of delegates declined to join in endorsing Humphrey and his running mate, Maine Sen. Edmund Muskie. None indicated a preference for Republican candidate Richard Nixon, who snubbed an invitation to speak, although he was just across the street from the convention hotel. Delegates responded to the snub by handbilling Nixon's street-corner rally with copies of his voting record, reprinted from the Machinist.

Gratefully recalling early aid from Minnesota Machinists, who helped him launch his career, Humphrey called on IAM members and other unionists to repeat that effort in November.

Citing Republican votes against increases in minimum wages, social security, medicare, aid to education and the model cities program, Humphrey reminded the delegates that "during the last eight Republican years in the 1950s, we had three job-killing recessions." In the Democratic years that followed, he declared, "we have had 90 consecutive months of economic growth, an all-time record."

"My program is the one you have been talking about: jobs, more jobs, training for jobs and decent housing."

Turning to other social issues, Humphrey declared:

"No one can justify the filthy

Hate, Fear Bid Linked To Wallace

By John M. Barry

Vice Pres. Humphrey waded into his first full week of campaigning for the presidency by declaring he would make the November election "a referendum on human rights and opportunity in America."

Humphrey accused his Republican opponent, Richard M. Nixon, of "openly competing" with third-party candidate George C. Wallace for the votes of those who "want to put the brakes on our progress toward full opportunity."

The Vice President called Nixon a "fair and just man," and no "racist."

"But he and the Republican Party have chosen this year to join forces with the most reactionary elements in American society," Humphrey declared. "This compact was signed and sealed in Miami Beach in full view of the American people."

As for Wallace. Humphrey said the former Alabama governor "owes his political existence to the fears and hates aroused" by the issue of human rights and the problems it poses for the nation.

His remarks came in his first campaign speech following his nomination by the Democratic National Convention and were addressed to an audience of 2,000 at the biennial convention of B'nai Brith in Washington.

He said he would have "wel-

Meany Renews Appeal For Hearst Strike Aid

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany received a boycott report from four touring Los Angeles Herald-Examiner strikers and urged all unions and union members to give the 2,000 embattled Hearst employes they represent "the fullest possible support."

The delegation, which started a cross-country tour Aug. 7, brought Meany up to date on developments since June, when the AFL-CIO Executive Council established a special strike relief fund with a $25,000 donation.

"Contributions to this fund are now needed more than ever," the AFL-CIO president said. He added: "The determination of these strikers has earned the admiration of the labor movement. Every union has a stake in the defeat of this key attack on trade unionism in the nation's most populous state."

Two unions on the Hearst paper—the Newspaper Guild and the Machinists—walked out Dec. 15 when contract negotiations reached a dead end. Eight other unions were locked out by Hearst, said the strikers, who will have traveled 35,000 miles by Oct. 30 telling the story of the boycott against Hearst

Which Side Is Nixon On? For 14(b), Grape Growers

Richard M. Nixon assured anyone who may have been wondering that his views on key issues are "miles apart" from those of Vice Pres. Hubert H. Humphrey.

The Republican presidential candidate gave these examples in speeches in Texas and California:

Humphrey favors repeal of the "right-to-work" Section 14(b) of the Taft-Hartley Act. Nixon said states should continue to have the power to outlaw the union shop.

Nixon noted that Humphrey as a senator sought to reduce the 27.5 percent tax exemption on profits made from oil. "I oppose reduction of that allowance," the Republican candidate said.

And Humphrey "has gone on record publicly" in support of the boycott of California grapes conducted by the striking United Farm Workers Organizing Committee with the solid support of the labor movement. Nixon denounced the boycott as "illegal economic pressure."

Nixon said the differences between himself and Humphrey present voters with "the most clearcut choice of any election in this century."

Strikers Win Sanitation Pact In Baltimore

Baltimore, Md. — City garbage and rubbish collectors voted to accept wage increases averaging 15 cents an hour and returned to work here after a four-day strike—one of four walkouts in the country by sanitation workers.

Baltimore City officials signed a memorandum of agreement giving the 1,300 strikers, and some other city workers, immediate wage hikes of 2.5 percent now and an additional 1.25 percent next Jan. 1. Negotiators for Local 44, State, County & Municipal Employes, said the ssanitation workers got raises of only 2.5 percent last year when most other city employes got 5 percent.

In Atlanta, 25 striking members of AFSCME Local 850 and the Rev. Ralph D. Abernathy, successor to the murdered Dr. Martin Luther King as head of the Southern Christian Leadership Conference, were arrested on charges of blocking a driveway where strikebreakers waited to make "emergency" garbage pickups.

The 800 Atlanta sanitation workers struck Sept. 3 for a minimum hourly wage of $2.50, instead of the present scale of $1.66 to $2.05. One offer from Mayor Ivan Allen, Jr., was rejected by the striker Sept. 7.

In Chicago, more than 2.000 members of Laborers Local 1001 returned to their garbage collection after winning a one-day strike over unresolved grievances. New Orleans sanitation workers, represented by the Teamsters, stayed out two days to win contract betterments for the 800 city employes.

SANITATION WORKERS picket Baltimore City Hall during four-day strike that halted waste collections. Members of State, County & Municipal Employes Local 44 stopped work to win wage increases totaling 3.75 percent over two years, approximately 15 cents an hour. One issue, symbolized by picket with "I Am A Man" sign, was fair treatment for the 1,300 sanitation workers.

IBEW Names Pillard To Succeed Freeman

The Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers has announced that Pres. Gordon M. Freeman, who has headed the IBEW for the past 13 years, is retiring, effective Oct. 1.

The union's executive council, in accepting the resignation with "deep regret," named 49-year-old Charles H. Pillard, a member of the council since May 1961, to succeed Freeman.

The council, holding its quarterly meeting in Washington, also appointed Harry Van Arsdale, Jr. of IBEW Local 3 in New York, and president of the New York City Central Labor Council, to the post of treasurer. This office was left vacant last month by the death of Jeremiah P. Sullivan, also a member of Local 3.

Freeman, now 71, was chosen by the council to head the IBEW in July 1955, as successor to the late J. Scott Milne. He was unanimously re-elected at all subsequent union conventions.

Before becoming president, Freeman served for 11 years as an IBEW vice president, heading up the union's fourth district—Kentucky, Maryland, Ohio, Virginia, West Virginia and the District of Columbia.

A 55-year member of the union, having been initiated in IBEW Local 575, Portsmouth, Ohio, in 1913, Freeman also has held many other union offices during his long career, including service as an international representative between 1930 and 1944.

In accepting Freeman's resignation, the council also acted to appoint him president emeritus upon his retirement. He will remain in the Washington area and be available as an adviser and consultant to the union.

Pillard, who was initiated into the IBEW in 1940, has been business manager of the union's Local 41 in Buffalo, N. Y., since 1952.

He is also president of the New York State Association of Electrical Workers, vice president of the Maritime Trades Dept. Buffalo Port Council and a vice president of the New York Building & Construction Trades Council.

Bay State Delegates Go All for Humphrey

Boston—More than 1,500 delegates to a Massachusettss COPE conference here—the largest ever held in the state—shouted their unanimous endorsement of Vice Pres. Hubert H. Humphrey for president.

The conference was held following the 11th convention of the Massachusetts AFL-CIO which called for a broad-ranged legislative program at the state and national level and voted to back it up with an all-out political effort.

When endorsement of the Humphrey-Muskie ticket was placed before the COPE conference, State AFL-CIO Pres. Salvatore Camelio cited Humphrey's long support of labor's programs compared to Richard M. Nixon's long-standing anti-union record.

He warned that any division in the ranks of labor or failure of workers to get to the polls could mark the beginning of an era of "extreme reaction" and a wave of legislation to weaken unions.

"We cannot meet this challenge with apathy and we dare not look to Nov. 5 as just another election," Camelio declared.

The conference delegates, representing unions throughout the state, also unanimously endorsed the reelection drives of House Speaker John W. McCormack and seven other incumbent congressmen.

Endorsed, besides McCormack, were Democratic representatives Edward P. Boland, Philip J. Philbin, Harold D. Donohue, Torbert H. MacDonald, Thomas P. O'Neil, Jr., James A. Burke and Republican Rep. F. Bradford Morse.

The convention adopted a resolution stressing the urgency of the COPE voluntary dollar drive and voter registration campaigns "to help insure the election of our friends and defeat of our enemies."

Delegates approved a state legislative program for the coming year keyed to securing improvements in workmen's compensation and unemployment insurance laws.

The program calls for payment of unemployment benefits to workers made jobless as a result of a labor dispute, sickness and disability benefits to workers made jobless as a result of illness, and improved jobless and workmen's compensation benefits.

The convention also urged the elimination of present exemptions from the state minimum wage law and updating of many state labor and social laws.

In the federal area, resolutions urged extension of federal labor laws to cover farm workers, congressional passage of an on-site picketing bill, federal standards for jobless benefits, effective controls on textile imports and legislation setting union recognition for federal employes.

In a special tribute to the memory of the late Sen. Robert F. Kennedy (D-Mass.) and Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr., delegates pledged labor's efforts "to achieving their dream of a better America" with full and equal rights for all.

CSA Staffer Named To Consumer Board

Buffalo, N.Y.—Sam Lanza, AFL-CIO Community Services staffer here, has been appointed to the board of directors of the Consumer Credit Counseling Service of Buffalo, Inc.

LBJ Appoints Lyons To Peace Corps Panel

Pres. Johnson has named AFL-CIO Vice Pres. John H. Lyons to the Peace Corps National Advisory Council.

Lyons, president of the Iron Workers, was among nine new appointments made by the White House to the 25-member panel.

Lyons has served on a number of presidential committees under John F. Kennedy and Lyndon B. Johnson, including a post as chairman of the Labor Advisory Committee to the President's Committee on Equal Employment Opportunity.

After 2-Day 'Stayout':

N.Y. Teachers Win Job Security Pact

New York—Union teachers, 53,000 strong, stayed out of school two days to win a guarantee of job security and the right of due process from a reluctant Board of Education.

The city's 900-plus schools opened for the school year only after United Federation of Teachers members ratified an agreement protecting all UFT members and officers from arbitrary dismissal by the city board or by newly decentralized "community" school boards.

As the AFL-CIO News went to press the application of the agreement was in doubt. When teachers reported some community leaders had barred them from their posts, Local 2 threatened to renew its stayout unless the agreement is fully enforced.

The agreement, reached after long negotiation, calls for:

- Return to their jobs of 10 ousted teachers if they want to resume their duties in Brooklyn's Ocean Hill-Brownsville district, or reassignment to other districts for those not wishing to return.
- Backpay for 300 other teachers who stayed away from eight district schools after the local board fired selected teachers without notice and without giving them a chance to be heard.
- All past understandings and agreements between Local 2 and the city board will be binding on local school boards when the proposed "decentralization" of 30 districts takes effect.

The agreement provides also that no union chairman or executive board member may be transferred without the prior approval of Supt. Bernard Donovan.

It specifies that any school employe who is dismissed or disciplined by a local board may secure final and binding arbitration by a three-member hearing panel—one chosen by the fired teacher, one by the board and the third by mutual agreement of the other two panel members.

The teacher stayout was triggered by the refusal of the Ocean Hill-Brownsville district to rehire teachers it fired last May. The local board and its administrator refused to reconsider, even when directed to do so by the city board, but changed their minds at a meeting Sept. 8 with Mayor John V. Lindsay.

Union members, however, refused to report for school until the agreement was in writing.

As public schools across the country opened for the fall term, the AFT reported that 62,825 teachers—a third of the union's membership—stayed out in contract disputes. Still out at the close of the first week were teachers in East St. Louis, Madison and East Chicago Heights, Ill.; Taylor and Ecorse, Mich.

The union reports contract settlements in Philadelphia, Pa.; Bradley-Bourbonnais, Ill.; Inkster and Heintzen, Mich.; Toledo, O.; and Duluth, Buhl and Columbia Heights, Minn.

Philadelphia union teachers won an average raise of $900 a year for 12,500 school employes, and a reduction in average class size from 39 to 37 this year, and to 35 next year.

The Toledo AFT local, which won a representation election last June, accepted raises in the present salary schedule to a starting rate of $7,000 a year and a top of $10,200, and for teachers with a master's degree, a range of $7,300 to $11,000 in yearly steps.

N.Y. Painters' Strike Gains Wage Parity

New York — Union painters voted to end a five-week strike after winning a three-step wage increase and a single wage rate for 6,500 members by the start of the last contract year.

Local unions in Painters District Council 9 stopped work Aug. 1 after 140 contractors in the Association of Master Painters & Decorators refused to end the six-year-old differential between those who repaint "old" work and those who paint new buildings.

The strikers voted 1,838 to 900 in American Arbitration Association balloting to accept wage increases totaling $1.40 an hour to a top of $5.60 for those now doing "old" work and raises totaling 60 cents for the new-work group. Both will reach the $5.60 rate by Aug. 1, 1970.

Sec.-Treas. Frank Schonfeld said that, in addition to the "biggest single raise" in rates, the contractors agreed to changes permitting union members to select their own stewards, a pioneering grievance procedure culminating in an impartial umpire, major pension improvements including disability pensions, survivors' benefits and a $10 monthly raise for 1,700 current pensioners.

The new pact raises fringe benefit payments from the present 13 percent to 15 percent by 1970, and continues an emergency savings fund of $3 a day for most of the painters, Schonfeld said.

CHANGE IN LEADERSHIP lies ahead for the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers as Pres. Gordon M. Freeman, left, announced his retirement effective Oct. 1. The union's executive council has appointed Charles H. Pillard, right, of Buffalo, N.Y., to succeed him.

New Procedure Approved:

IAM Rail Shopmen To Vote on Contracts

Chicago—Railroad Machinists have regained the right to accept or reject contract settlements affecting them. Action by the Machinists' union convention here provides that IAM railroad shopmen will hereafter receive a report on the tentative national agreement worked out with the nation's railroads and "will be afforded the privilege of voting acceptance or rejection of this agreement."

"For too long our railroad membership has been denied the right to ratify an agreement," IAM Pres. Roy Siemiller told the nearly 2,000 delegates.

The convention also voted to abandon an eight-year effort to establish industrywide bargaining in the air transport industry and to return to carrier-by-carrier bargaining.

Future negotiations will continue to be co-ordinated among districts, but each district will set its own bargaining goals.

The convention voted to establish an IAM National Aircraft Crash Committee to investigate airplane accidents and to protect the interests of IAM aircraft mechanics.

Guidelines for state or federal laws that may require licensing of automotive mechanics were adopted. To protect mechanics, the convention urged that such laws provide for registration of all repair shops, automatic licensing of mechanics after four years in the trade, equal representation on any licensing or registration board, and mandatory vehicle inspections to be performed by licensed mechanics.

Among aerospace plants, the convention urged further development of a plan now used in California under which one company with a labor surplus loans workers to plants suffering shortages. The employe remains on the payroll of his original employer and retains all seniority, but is spared layoffs.

The IAM convention warned against fragmentization of skills through job evaluation plans and more and more detailed job descriptions. The latter should be eliminated or at least reduced to as broad a base as possible in order to protect skilled workers from overspecializing, the convention declared.

It also called for programs to update and broaden skills and for special efforts, including tax incentives, to enlarge apprenticeship programs.

A series of conferences to meet problems arising from numerical control of machines was projected, to include classifications and wage structures for workers involved.

Among changes in the IAM constitution approved by the convention was a redefinition of its provisions for mandatory retirement at age 65 for union officers and employes. Henceforth, candidates will be ineligible to run unless they can fill at least two years of their four-year terms before reaching 65. In effect, the change limits future candidates to 63 or younger.

CHEERING DELEGATES to the Machinists' convention in Chicago overwhelmingly endorsed the presidential candidacy of Vice Pres. Hubert H. Humphrey. They also heard an address from the Democratic standard-bearer telephoned from California.

slums of today. We need better schools and better-paid teachers, health care for our young and for our elders. Above all, we need a new feeling of belonging together and unity in this country, where we don't let a few loud noisy extremists of the left or right or black or white tear us apart, lead us down the road to disaster.

"I have made no promises to yesterday. My promise is to tomorrow. I want to appeal not to your fears, but to your reason. I ask you to vote your hopes, not your hates. I ask you to vote for me, to give me your helping hand and let's go out and be confident that this election can be won.

"I believe what you believe. I have been with you. I believe you want to help me win this election, and I want to help you win a better America."

Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz reviewed his relations with the labor movement during his six years in office and warned that the fate of collective bargaining is in the balance in the November elections.

"There is a lot of pious talk about improving the collective bargaining system in this country," he declared. "It isn't perfect. It just happens to be the best one in the world. And anybody else in any other country who realizes the price that has been paid in terms of freedom for a sure answer to the matter of major industrywide strife is willing to pay the price in America."

Wirtz wryly acknowledged that the government's 3.2 per cent wage-price guidelines, which he defended unsuccessfully in the 1966 strike negotiations between IAM members and the nation's airlines, "haven't worked."

"We have got to get a better system to work out the broad equities of this situation," he said. "First, there has to be a strong economy as the basis of the maintenance of full employment in this country. Second, there has to be a better answer to inflation than to throw a lot of people out of work and ask the poor and unemployed people in this country to provide the stabilization for the well-to-do."

Of one inequity that he said ought to be redressed, Wirtz declared:

"There is a law prohibiting racial discrimination. In addition, there is an executive order that says we, as a government, will not do business with anybody who discriminates on a racial basis. Exactly the same ordinance applies to anybody who violates the National Labor Relations Act, whether it is J. P. Stevens or any other company, and that business ought to stop."

Scholarship to Aid Job Corps Graduate

Spokane, Wash.—The Washington State Labor Council has set up a $300 scholarship to extend the education of a graduate of the Moses Lake Job Corps Center for Women.

Pres. Joe Davis of the 200,000-member state AFL-CIO body said the scholarship may be used at any training school, college or university in the state. He added that it is the hope of the council that the action will stimulate other organizations to establish similar scholarships.

The Jobs Corps center trains women 16 to 22 years old who come from poverty areas and are unable to find adequate jobs.

Utilities Try to Pass Surcharge To Users, Consumer Panel Says

By John Oravec

There is increasing evidence that utilities companies are attempting to pass on to consumers the federal surcharge tax, the President's Consumer Advisory Council reports.

The council expressed concern over this tactic and declared that the consumer is prepared to pay his own federal surcharge, but is not willing—nor should he be asked—to pay for the utilities too.

Bronson LaFollette, chairman of the CAC, pointed out that utilities in Wisconsin—where he is the state attorney general—are asking for an increase in rates which appears to be tied to the surcharge. He noted that Betty Furness, the President's special assistant for consumer affairs, found similar evidence in Florida.

The council also declared strong support for enactment of the Deceptive Sales Bill now pending in the House and cited opposition to give-aways linked with retail sales, especially gasoline games.

The Deceptive Sales Bill passed the Senate in July. LaFollette said the CAC has urged that hearings be held on it as soon as possible by the House Commerce Committee since it affects consumers at all levels of the economy.

"Some states and local jurisdictions have passed protection laws" against deceptive sales, he noted, "but we believe the time has come for appropriate action at the federal level to supplement and complement state and local action."

The council, which includes Pres. Louis Stulberg of the Ladies' Garment Workers, will pass on to the White House a comprehensive report exploring state action against fraud and deceptive sales practices.

Give-Aways Hit

A CAC resolution states that it regards as unfair to the consumer all give-aways which do not disclose the odds of winning and do not cite how long a contest runs or over what areas prizes will be distributed.

It also notes that the games are unfair where inadequate precautions are taken to prevent gasoline dealers or others from knowing which coupons are winners and diverting such tickets to themselves.

The council said that where premiums are offered, the consumer should have the choice of collecting the fair cash value of the premium.

Referring to the gasoline games, Miss Furness said, "We are gambling and we don't even have a choice . . . and we want to know who is paying for it and what are the odds."

LaFollette expressed particular concern for victims of fraud and deceptive sales in the ghettos. He said:

"The Kerner Report documented that consumer grievances are among the deeply held concerns of the ghetto residents which contribute to alienation, tensions and frustration that make rioting possible. People of ghettos are prime targets of con artists and others" who benefit from deceptive sales practices.

He said greater efforts must be made to inform these people about consumer rackets.

One such effort was tested this summer in Milwaukee, he noted. It was a special low income consumer protection project aimed at the ghetto dwellers.

The program cost less than $3,000 and it succeeded in saving more than $7,000 in specific cases of consumer problems, LaFollette said.

Signs in stores, taverns, barbershops and announcements on local radio stations established a pattern of close communication with people most in need of help and made them aware of consumer protection services, he reported.

On another front, Miss Furness said that there is little likelihood that the clean fish and seafood bill will clear the 90th Congress. But she urged that hearings be held soon on the legislation since it is as important to the consumer as the poultry and meat inspection laws which were passed earlier this year.

Humphrey Ticket Gets Randolph Endorsement

New York—AFL-CIO Vice Pres. A. Philip Randolph has endorsed Vice Pres. Hubert H. Humphrey for the presidency as the only one of three candidates "equal to the great challenges facing America."

In a statement issued here, Randolph warned that Humphrey's election is vital to heading off a "perilous threat to all of the social and economic progress black and white workers have struggled to win" in recent years.

Noting that he had never publicly backed a presidential candidate prior to 1964, when he endorsed Pres. Johnson to head off a similar threat from the candidacy of Barry Goldwater, Randolph declared:

"Today as I survey the political scene I find that this threat has not diminished. Indeed, it has assumed proportions that were inconceivable only three years ago. What is more, the forces of reaction this year to a much greater extent than in 1964 are almost in reach of victory."

He compared the "critical test" of 1968 with the election of 1876 when the entire Negro population was "being pilloried" for the alleged corruption of a reconstruction government in the South and for the rioting and violence of a few Negroes.

He pointed out that the electoral process broke down in that election and Southern Bourbons came into power paving the way "for a new era of racial segregation, disenfranchisement and brutality."

In one respect, Randolph continued, today's situation is worse because "the white backlash fields not one but two presidential candidates" and the third party candidate seeks the same type of breakdown as occurred in 1876.

However, in two respects he saw a more encouraging picture than existed in 1876. One, "the civil rights revolution has come too far to be turned back." Two, if Humphrey is elected the nation will have "a champion of racial equality."

The Vice President, he emphasized is a candidate "who understands that the fate of the black people. the vast majoirty of whom are workers, is inextricably tied to the fate of the labor movement."

"He has understood better than any other candidate," Randolph added, "that economic justice, elimination of poverty and the nation's welfare depends upon a free, fully open, strong and growing trade union movement.

"He is a candidate around whom all of the working people can rally with enthusiasm."

NEW CONTROLS OVER CRIME and narcotics were called for by Sen. Alan Bible (D-Nev.) in an address to the opening session of the 70th convention of the Bricklayers in Las Vegas.

New York AFL-CIO Delegates Vote Solid Support of Humphrey, Muskie

Kiamesha Lake, N.Y.—Nearly 2,000 delegates to the 1968 convention of the New York State AFL-CIO voted without dissent to endorse the Democratic candidates Hubert H. Humphrey for President and Sen. Edmund Muskie for Vice President.

At the same session, but after considerable debate, a substantial majority endorsed Republican Sen. Jacob K. Javits for a third six-year term.

Overwhelmingly defeated after lengthy discussion was a resolution that the State AFL-CIO urge the national AFL-CIO to reassess its support of Administration policy on Viet Nam.

In another unanimous action, the delegates soundly condemned the Russian-and-satellite suppression of liberty in Czechoslovakia and urged presidential, congressional and United Nations action in support of the aspirations of the Czech people for a fuller measure of freedom and democracy.

Re-elected to fourth two-year terms were Pres. Raymond R. Corbett and Sec.-Treas. Louis Hollander. Twenty-four incumbent vice presidents and three new vice presidents were chosen. The latter are James Beamish, president of Local 1-2, Utility Workers; Michael Maye, president, Uniformed Firemen's Association of New York City; and Albert Shanker, president of the 50,000-member Local 2 of the American Federation of Teachers.

A Teachers' union representative reported to the delegates on alleged firings of more than 200 union teachers—14 without any charges against them and the rest for supporting the 14—by a local area school board. He said the local community board was asking replacement applicants: "Do you favor the union or do you favor the community?"

The convention pledged solid backing of the Teachers in any actions its members deemed necessary to insure justice and observance of their contract.

Approved were resolutions calling for a $3 minimum wage, federal standards for job safety and unemployment insurance benefits and eligibility, revision of the entire welfare program along national lines and immediate expansion of job training and employment opportunities, both public and private.

The endorsement of Javits was a rejection of the Democratic nominee, Paul O'Dwyer, who is on record as refusing to support the Humphrey candidacy. Also a major basis for the Javits endorsement was the fact that during eight years in the House and 12 in the Senate he had voted right on issues crucial to labor 87 percent of the time—a COPE voting tally of 73 right, 11 wrong.

The convention called for full equality in all aspects of life and condemned extremists of both left and right "who inject hate and fear in public issues." It pledged to "fight vigorously against lawlessness in all its forms," but warned that mere repression of disturbances without effective action to correct their causes "will only intensify the basic conflict."

The convention committee on press, radio and television took news media to task for published reports of disturbances that at times appeared to lay total blame on one side, rather than exposing provocations that led to them. It urged the media to show greater care so that a fully unbiased news report would be assured.

Schools Open, Jobless Rate Dips to 3.5%

August employment figures on an industry basis, seasonally adjusted, were:

Manufacturing, 19.9 million, up 171,000 from July; construction, 3.5 million, up 52,000; transportation, 4.4 million, up 31,000; wholesale and retail trade, 14.1 million, up 16,000; finance, 3.4 million, up 26,000; services, 10.6 million, down by 9,000, and government, 11.8 million, down by 49,000.

The department said that the average factory workweek in August, seasonally adjusted, was 40.8 hours, down slightly from July. Since May this figure has remained relatively stable at 40.8 to 40.9 hours.

For rank-and-file workers on all private non-farm payrolls, the seasonally adjusted workweek was 37.9 hours, where it has remained since June.

Average hourly earnings for rank-and-file workers were unchanged in August at $2.85. Average weekly earnings were $109.16, up about 29 cents over the month because of the slightly longer workweek.

Over the year, average hourly earnings have risen by 16 cents, or 5.9 percent, and weekly earnings have increased by $5.86, or 5.7 percent, the department said.

Marine Engineers Re-Elect Calhoon

New York—Members of the Marine Engineers voted in a mail referendum to retain Pres. Jesse M. Calhoon for a five-year term and to elect Charles A. Black of the Pacific Coast district to succeed Sec.-Treas. H. W. Peters, retiring. Calhoon won from Russell J. Woodman, 3,879-682, and Black from Norman A. Talbot, 3,763-766.

Bonus on Gold Standard In New Pact for Miners

Lead, S.D.—Instead of cost-of-living increases the 1,500 gold miners at Homestake Mining Co. installations in this area are getting cost-of-gold increases.

The miners, members of Steelworkers Local 7044, will get about $2 million in bonuses within the coming year under a newly negotiated contract which establishes a wage premium tied to the price of gold.

At the current price of $39.50 per ounce, premiums average about 35 cents an hour, according to the USWA. The scale ranges from 7 cents an hour bonus when the price of gold is $36 an ounce to 85 cents if the price reaches $49.

A drop in the price of gold would result in smaller bonuses but no wages can be reduced below the rates in the basic labor agreement.

The Homestake mine had been an open-shop operation from 1904 to 1966, when the employes picked the USWA as their bargaining agent.

'Winterproof' Jobs, Bricklayers Urge

Las Vegas, Nev.—The Bricklayers were challenged at their 70th convention to prepare for the "greatest building boom" in modern history by helping perfect all-weather construction, training more skilled craftsmen and taking a more active role in community affairs.

The American economy would gain the equivalent of 35,000 trained bricklayers, masons and plasterers by extending the average workweek from 35 hours to 45 through the use of enclosed construction in winter weather, union Pres. Thomas F. Murphy told 800 delegates from 350 U.S. and Canadian local unions.

Murphy said all-weather construction has been proved practical, and would be adopted by more builders if the U.S. government would show the way, as the Canadian government has done.

The point was driven home also by Pres. C. J. Haggerty of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept., who said more use of "winterizing" techniques could add the equivalent of 300,000 more workers to building construction.

Sessions of the 103-year-old union's five-day convention—the best-attended in its history—are being held in Caesar's Palace here. Scheduled speakers include Sen. Alan Bible (D-Nev.), Executive Vice Pres. George Miller of the Mason Contractors Association of America, and Dallas architect Thomas E. Woodward.

The delegates applauded a message from Democratic Presidential candidate Hubert H. Humphrey urging the nation to "march forward into a new day of economic security, truly full employment, first class education and unity" with Humphrey and his running-mate, Sen. Edmund Muskie (D-Me.).

In its early stages the convention voted new four-year terms for Murphy and 12 other incumbent officers. It prepared to act before adjournment on 58 appeals cases from members, 111 resolutions, officers' recommendations and other business.

Murphy listed the major problems facing the union after a two-year period in which more than $500,000 was spent to bring in 3,500 new members. He urged that small local unions join area executive committees as an organizing device, and reported that the greatest area of organizing potential is the home construction field.

"As our convention opens," he said, "we are but a short distance away from a national election whose results can have portentous meaning for labor. Labor's work in this election, as in the past, is to make sure that Congress has the liberalism, and determination, to achieve a better nation and a better world."

Haggerty stressed the need for more low-cost housing and predicted that work will start in the next decade on 1 million new classrooms, 375,000 new bridges for interstate highways and many new homes and office buildings.

Building tradesmen now work an average of 1,400 hours a year and lose up to 600 hours because of failure of many contractors to enclose their projects against the weather, he declared. The average tradesman with three dependents had take-home pay of $139.75 a week in June 1968—an increase of $6.25 in a year, with all but 50 cents of the increase eaten up by the rising cost of living, Haggerty said.

Soviet Blitz Denounced By Free World Labor

Brussels, Belgium—The continued occupation of Czechoslovakia by the Soviet Union and its satellites was unanimously denounced by a conference of the Intl. Confederation of Free Trade Unions here.

Called to deal with the Czechoslovakian crisis, the conference was attended by members of the ICFTU executive board sub-committee, ICFTU affiliated European trade unions and representatives of international trade secretariats.

The conference reaffirmed an earlier ICFTU condemnation of the armed invasion of Czechoslovakia as "a flagrant violation of human rights," the principles of international law and the United Nations' charter.

It branded the continuing presence as evidence "that the Soviet rulers' concept of totalitarian and dogmatic communism makes it impossible for them to accept any changes towards freedom."

"It reveals the bankruptcy of this system which has to resort to force and repression to maintain its grip on the peoples striving for freedom and democracy," the conference statement added.

It saluted the Czechoslovakian people and pledged "the continued solidarity of the whole international free trade union movement with their heroic struggle" for human and trade union rights.

In conclusion the statement appealed to the UN, all governments and world public opinion "to exercise all possible pressure" to secure the withdrawal of Soviet troops and guarantees of independence for Czechoslovakia.

Engineers Set Training Plan For Minorities

Union locals of the Operating Engineers have set up programs in Ohio and Pennsylvania with contractors' associations to hire and train members of minority groups as operating engineers.

The Labor Dept.'s Office of Federal Contract Compliance accepted the plan for the two programs for apprentices and journeymen to replace contract-by-contract guarantees of equal employment opportunity, said Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz.

The programs are aimed at reaching persons who otherwise might be disqualified and preparing them for training as apprentices in the industry.

Another phase of the programs will provide members working in the industry with skills to expand their job opportunities.

Urges Bargaining Law:

Muskie Backs Rights Of Federal Workers

Las Vegas, Nev.—Sen. Edmund S. Muskie, the Democratic vice presidential candidate, pledged "first-class citizenship" and support for a strong collective bargaining law for federal workers in a speech to the American Federation of Government Employes convention here.

The 1,600 delegates greeted Muskie with repeated applause, cheers and standing ovations in his first speech to a union convention since his nomination.

"The time has arrived when we should appreciate the fact that you who work for the government are also citizens," Muskie told the AFGE delegates. "Your proposals for collective bargaining legislation and your call for revision of the Hatch Act are designed to give workers a louder voice in their own business. This is necessary."

The Hatch Act sharply restricts political activity by federal employes and the AFGE has sought its revision.

A sustained spurt in membership has more than doubled the number of AFGE members in four years and has added 95,000 to the union's rolls in the two years since the last convention, delegates heard.

Pres. John F. Griner reported that as the convention opened, AFGE membership had passed the 294,000 mark and the union held exclusive collective bargaining rights for well over 400,000 federal workers.

He and Exec. Vice Pres. Clyde M. Webber credited the growth rate to the development of "team" organizing techniques. National representatives have been assigned to an area director of organization and this coordinated group has been especially effective in drives at large installations, they noted.

Griner itemized the many legislative gains during the past two years, but cautioned the delegates that much remains to be done. He promised continued efforts to enact 13 bills now pending which have passed either the House or Senate.

To illustrate that the life of the federal worker is no bed of roses, Griner pointed to 4,848 grievances that have been processed by the national office during the past six months. These grievances entail firings, suspensions, discrimination charges, classification appeals, and compensation cases. Griner recommended a further expansion of the national staff to assist in solving these problems.

Turning to the code of unfair labor practices as it operates in the federal sector, Griner claimed that the cards are being stacked in management's favor. He told the delegates that "the true intent of the code will never be accomplished until hearings are held before an impartial arbitrator, as contemplated in the NLRB system."

Griner promised therefore that AFGE's legislative program will continue to push for a "little NLRB" for federal workers.

Twelve convention committees are considering 1,005 resolutions submitted by local lodges.

Lively and spirited debate developed as the resolutions covered such controversial areas as the no-strike constitutional provision, the need for union security, functions of the national executive vice president and secretary-treasurer, and an amendment to increase the per capita tax by 50 cents.

The convention will conclude with the election of AFGE's national officers. Griner is opposed for the presidency by District 5 Vice Pres. Dennis Garrison. Webber faces opposition for executive vice president from former District 12 Vice Pres. Richard Steck. Sec.-Treas. Esther Johnson is opposed by customs inspector Charles Famulari and naval employe Phyllis Keen.

Meany Renews Appeal For Hearst Strike Aid

publications and 12 major advertisers.

The boycott team includes Michael Mulcahy of the Printing Pressmen, Jack Dyer of the ITU Mailers, Stan Progar and Richard Houdek of the Newspaper Guild.

They reported that picketing goes on around the clock at the Los Angeles plant, where 300 professional strikebreakers produce one edition a day that is studded with errors and at least 24 hours behind competitors on the news.

The delegation, questioned at a press conference at ANG headquarters, said Hearst is not engaged in good faith bargaining but conducts token negotiations to avoid refusal to bargain charges.

They reported that the struck paper has lost $40 million in revenues and 5 million lines of advertising. It has a press run of 450,000 papers a day but paid circulation of an estimated 222,000—down two thirds from normal home delivery and street sale totals.

The boycott team won votes of support from AFL-CIO state central body conventions in Nevada, Utah, Montana and New York; from conventions of the Steelworkers, Teachers and Machinists. Members ran out of leaflets during the Labor Day parade in New York City. They went back to their on-the-road itinerary after thanking Meany for his support.

They told newsmen that in Albany, N.Y., Times-Union management had them escorted out of the plant, and the assistant publisher, a Hearst employe, advised them to "get out of town." In Cleveland, a union representative was requested to take the travelers out of the King Feature Service offices. Elsewhere their reception was friendly even at the home offices of two Herald-Examiner advertisers—Sears, Roebuck & Co. and the J. C. Penney Co., they said.

The 10-union Do Not Buy campaign is directed not only at Hearst but also at 12 business firms which advertise consistently in the struck paper. Besides those above, they are the May Co. chain, four major tire companies, Seagram and Calvert distillers, Kraft Foods, the American Tobacco Co. and General Motors Corp.

Hearst has rejected all offers of mediation by public and private agencies. The unions said in a statement that he "is clearly determined to break the strike and clear the way" for a return to the open shop, antiunion policies that prevailed in southern California in the 1920s.

Pavilion on Labor Urged for '76 Fair

Sen. Joseph S. Clark has proposed a History of Labor pavilion for the Bicentennial Exposition scheduled for Philadelphia in 1976.

The Pennsylvania Democrat said that the nation's working men and women should be honored with their own pavilion during the 200th anniversary celebration of American independence.

He noted at a Labor Day rally that "the long, rich and eventful history of organized labor has its basic roots and beginnings in Pennsylvania," and that political action by organized labor also had its beginnings in Philadelphia.

NLRB Notice Seeks To 'Tell It Like It Is'

The National Labor Relations Board continued its campaign to translate its orders into plain English in a decision ordering a Lexington, Miss., pipeline company to stop discriminating against members of the Plumbers.

The board found Lipsey, Inc., guilty of refusing to hire or test union members, firing union men because they refused to cross a picket line and threatening union workers and officials.

Where an NLRB trial examiner recommended the company post a notice saying "We will not interrogate employes or applicants concerning their union affiliations, or their intentions concerning concerted activities," the board substituted this simplified notice:

"We will not ask you whether you are a union member or are helping Local 798" of the Plumbers.

"We will not ask you to withdraw from Local 798.

"We will not fire you because you are a union member."

Where the examiner used the phrase "loss of employment" the new notice used the word "fired." Where the examiner said Lipsey should not "interfere with, restrain or coerce," the board substituted "we will not threaten to harm anyone asking for a job because he supports the union."

All similar notices should, the board has said, avoid 10-dollar words and use direct, everyday language whose meaning will be clear to all.

HEARST STRIKERS from Los Angeles lead a group of printing trades marchers in New York's Labor Day parade. The strikers, shown in the station wagon they are using on a cross-country trip, were cheered repeatedly by the parade audience. They have been telling the story of the 2,000 Los Angeles Herald-Examiner employes on strike or locked out since last Dec. 15.

North Carolina Labor Presses Election Drive

Asheville, N.C.—The 11th annual convention of the North Carolina AFL-CIO called for a vigorous register-and-vote campaign among 80,000 union members this election year, and endorsed the Humphrey-Muskie presidential ticket with only 10 opposing votes.

The convention, with some 250 delegates, was one of the best attended in years. In approving a program recommended by its Committee on Political Education, it called on all affiliated unions to help set up voter registration committees, to man telephone banks and to work with COPE and its Women's Activities Division in arousing every member to the danger of seeing labor's gains of past years wiped out by "big business" candidates.

"All they're waiting for," Federation Pres. W. M. Barbee told the delegates, "is the election of 31 illiberal congressmen, three conservative senators, and Dick Nixon as president. Then their assaults on labor will make the Taft-Hartley and Landrum-Griffin Acts seem positively pro-labor."

Barbee said he hopes work can be started before Dec. 31 on a proposed new state AFL-CIO building on land the state central body owns in Raleigh. He urged all union members to cooperate in raising the money.

Threat from the Right

IN A VERY REAL SENSE the bitter-end Dixiecrat-GOP coalition that is planning to gag the Senate on the confirmation of Justice Fortas is as much a threat to law, order and justice as the new anarchists of the streets.

In its own way the coalition is contributing to the breakdown of orderly processes in American society by a wild, swinging attack on a basic institution of our democratic system—the Supreme Court.

The coalition has decided that to keep the liberal and courageous Warren court in its place it will try to deny the post of chief justice to one of its members—Fortas. And to get other liberals to run for cover, the coalition is making it clear that it will not allow the Senate to vote on confirmation because Fortas has upheld the basic doctrines of civil rights and civil liberties for all.

This is the politics of confrontation in one of its ugliest forms, a politics destructive of the spirit of democratic government.

Richard Nixon, a former vice president of the United States now a candidate for the presidency, apparently does not extend his concept of law and order to protecting the sanctity of the Supreme Court.

A basic evidence of the "new Nixon" would be to hear his voice raised on behalf of decency and calling on his GOP colleagues to drop their Fortas filibuster plan and to allow a vote on confirmation.

Wallace, the Pitchman

GEORGE WALLACE'S pitch to the "dark, demonic side of the American spirit," says Newsweek magazine, will put him on the ballot in all states but Ohio and the District of Columbia by Election Day.

The American Independent Party candidate, the magazine notes, has forged a coalition of the "discontented and the disaffected," and part of his appeal is "a violent strain in his rhetoric, a tendency to reduce the most subtle issue to the glandular metaphor of physical combat."

The basic appeal is racism and reaction and a form of anti-intellectualism that is a throwback to the Know-Nothing Party.

Wallace packages the ingredients to sell to what he calls the "folks." But the "folks" are being taken in a classic example of fraud and deception—if they buy the package.

As the governor of Alabama Wallace compiled a basic record of loading up the worker with a 6 percent sales tax on food (a combined state, county and city tax), raising taxes on beer and tobacco, drivers licenses and auto tags. In contrast he prevented any increase in property or personal income taxes, levies that would hit the wealthier groups more heavily.

The Wallace record discloses that he has denied the worker any real improvement in unemployment compensation laws and workmen's compensation laws. He has kept Alabama's education system among the poorest in the nation.

He draws his financial support from some of the most notorious anti-union forces in the country.

None of this comes through in the Wallace rhetoric. It's all carefully hidden away where it won't show, where it won't get in the way of his pitch to the "folks," of his pitch to the "dark, demonic side" of American political life.

Humphrey Cites Gains:

Family Income Up 32% in 60s, Compared with 9% Under GOP

The following is excerpted from a statement by Vice Pres. Humphrey comparing economic gains in the Fifties and Sixties.

THE RECORD SHOWS that the Democratic Party took charge of a sluggish and stagnant economy from the Republicans in 1961, and in the next eight years managed the longest and most productive period of economic growth in American history.

We have had 90 consecutive months of economic expansion with no recessions since early 1961. This contrasts with three recessions in the 1953-60 period. In fact, under the eight years of Republican leadership from 1953 through 1960, the United States suffered three of its four recessions in the 22 years since World War II.

The gain in real family income has been 32 percent under the Kennedy-Johnson and Johnson-Humphrey Administrations, compared with 9 percent in the earlier period.

Profits in the first quarter of 1961 were barely above their level of early 1953; since early 1961, they have more than doubled.

The number of jobs has grown 10.5 million since early 1961, compared with a gain of 4.5 million in the comparable 1953-60 period. Unemployment rose 2 million from 1953 to 1960 and has dropped 2 million since 1961.

The record of the Sixties has demonstrated again the vitality of our American economic system—its ability to produce, to create jobs, and to generate rewards for efforts and enterprise. To be sure, we haven't yet solved the riddle of coupling prosperity and price stability. We are determined to lick that problem—but not by following the recession, sluggish growth and unemployment prescriptions of the Fifties.

Clearly recent rising prices are the principal exception in the nation's proud economic record. It is vital that this problem be seen in perspective.

After several years of reasonably stable prices, the inflationary problem has been particularly acute this year. In the past 12 months, consumer prices have risen more than 4 percent. In early 1967, they were rising a little more than 2 percent a year.

THIS RECENT acceleration is particularly regrettable. It was avoidable and it would have been avoided if there had been bipartisan support for the tax bill a year ago. While we must be concerned and act against inflation, we must also see the economy in broad perspective.

Three out of every four dollars of our increase in gross national product since early 1961 represent a gain in real production; only one out of four is the result of rising prices.

Of our total increase of $350 billion, $265 billion has been real. In the period 1953-1960, the rise in real total output was less than $100 billion. Under the Democrats, the gain was 45 percent; under the Republicans, it was less than 20 percent.

Per capita disposable income was $1,942 in the first quarter of 1961. Because of rising prices, it would have taken $2,207, or $265 more income per capita in the second quarter of 1968 to hold one's own at that earlier real level. For four persons, the required extra income is $1,060 to keep up with the cost of living advance since early 1961.

But the average family has that extra income, and it has a lot more in addition. Per capita disposable income in the second quarter of 1968 was $2,918, up $976 over early 1961: The real gain is $711, after allowing for $265 to cover price increases. For four persons, the average total gain in real terms is $2,844. This compares with a rise, also in real terms, of only about $800 per family between 1953 and 1960.

The average American family of four can live as well in 1968 as it did in 1960 and still have enough left to buy a new car out of its 1968 income . . . or pay for a year in college—without dipping into savings and without borrowing.

The net financial wealth—assets minus debt—of American households has risen by over $500 billion since 1961, a gain of two-thirds. Even adjusted for higher prices, the real rise has been nearly 50 percent.

The problem of rising prices has long troubled the U.S. economy. Over the period since early 1961, consumer prices have risen 16 percent. In the previous period—from 1953 to 1960—consumer prices rose less but still significantly—by 11 percent.

This is the most unfavorable comparison one can make. Wholesale prices have actually risen a little less since early 1961 than in the comparable previous period. Our most comprehensive price index, the "GNP deflator," rose 16 percent from 1961 to 1968, compared with 17 percent for the comparable 1953-1960 period.

59 'Wrong' Votes:

'New Nixon' Can't Hide Scars Of His Old Political Record

The following is excerpted from "The Political Lives of Richard Nixon" by Ben Albert which appears in the September 1968 issue of the AFL-CIO American Federationist.

IN NOMINATING Richard Nixon for the presidency, the Republican Party has put forward a standard-bearer who:

- Has not won an election on his own in 18 years and lost his two most recent campaigns.
- Was Vice President of an administration that plunged the nation into three major recessions in eight years, with accompanying heavy unemployment.
- Clinched the vice presidency in 1952 with a melodramatic national television appeal that immortalized a dog, made cloth coats the "in" thing and still stands as a monument to television's capacity to elevate embarrassment into triumph.
- Inspired one of the most cutting political slogans of all time—"Would you buy a used car from this man?"
- Performed in the office of Vice President in such fashion that his leader, Pres. Eisenhower, when asked by a newsman what key decisions Nixon had helped reach, responded, "Give me a week and I'll tell you."
- Has boasted, "As a member of the House Labor Committee, I helped write Section 14(b) into law," the section of the Taft-Hartley Act that made possible the so-called right-to-work law attacks on unions.
- Proclaimed on his first day in the House, Jan. 3, 1947: "I was elected to smash the labor bosses and my one principle is to accept no dictation from the CIO-PAC."

Nixon has been so long in politics, he escapes precise definition. He does not fit smoothly into either the ultra-conservative or liberal wings of the GOP. He is popular with the southern wing of the party (Dixiecrat-turned-Dixiegop Strom Thurmond was one of his biggest boosters at the convention). He is clearly not unpopular with the Goldwater wing and the liberal-to-moderate wing accepts him uneasily and with reservations.

This suggests the one characteristic about Nixon that threads through his 22-year political career: He is nimble. He won election to the House from California in his first campaign in 1946 by accusing his Democratic opponent of being "soft on communism," anticipating Sen. Joe McCarthy by a good three years.

He sensed the continuing—indeed, mounting—popularity of the communism issue in 1950 when he defeated Rep. Helen Gahagan Douglas for the Senate by distributing a "pink sheet" linking her voting record in the House to that of New York leftist Rep. Vito Marcantonio, asking "Would California send Marcantonio to the Senate?"

By 1956 the tide had turned on the issue of domestic communism, Joe McCarthy had been discredited as a man and as a senator. Campaigning again for the vice presidency, Nixon shifted gears to a low-key attack.

In fairness, the second-decade Nixon has been less vehement than the first. His unsuccessful 1960 campaign for the presidency against John F. Kennedy and his woeful 1962 California gubernatorial campaign against Pat Brown were relatively free of personal invective.

HE SLIPPED ONLY after being defeated by more votes for governor in one state, California, than he was defeated for President nationally. At a final press conference, he accused the press of doing him in.

In 1964 he kept close to the right-wing and conservative Republicans. While others were bolting Goldwater, Nixon campaigned for him. Hence, the support in 1968 of Thurmond and Texas' Sen. John Tower.

His political resurrection has prompted widespread speculation about a "New Nixon." Outwardly he is new. The Nixon of 1968 is a more self-confident man than the Nixon of eight years ago. His relations with the press in the pre-convention period were impeccable. He has grown capable of self-deprecating humor.

Has he changed ideologically? This is harder to answer, for Nixon has never been a truly ideological man. He is a strategist and technician, not a theorist. If he has a talent for innovation, either in government policies or social issues, there is no visible record.

In a sense he has been lucky. He has had to fit no one pigeonhole since he left the Senate and he has not been called upon to vote his convictions in the past 16 years with the exception of a handful of votes cast as Vice President to break Senate ties.

His record in the years 1947-52 was abysmal. On labor issues, he had no "right" votes and seven "wrong" votes on COPE's official voting records. On consumer issues, two "right," 10 "wrong." On housing, 0-5; taxes, 0-11; civil rights, 2-3. His overall score was 10 "right," 59 "wrong" votes.

On his record and on his recent statements, a Nixon presidency would be conservative in economic policy. His approach to social problems would focus on business involvement as a substitute for government action. This means that critical problems of the cities, their slums, their ghettos, their people, would be tied to tax incentives to business for solution. While business could help—and is helping—this type of solution would tend to exacerbate, rather than relieve, the urban crisis because these are basically social problems.

So Richard Nixon again goes before the American voter. This may be a 1968 model Nixon, but his nimbleness remains underneath. So near the abyss after his last defeat, he is now halfway back to the summit.

Wide Support Noted:

Anti-Union Growers Feel Pinch Of Mounting Grape Boycott

THE AFL-CIO'S top organizer reported mounting success of organized labor's boycott against California table grapes, launched by the farm workers to help win employer recognition of their union.

Local boycott teams are now operating in most major cities, and the boycott has solid cooperation and support from AFL-CIO unions from coast to coast, said William L. Kircher, director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Organization, as he was questioned by reporters on Labor News Conference, broadcast Tuesday at 7:35 p.m., EDT, on the Mutual Radio Network.

Kircher declined speculation on the percentage of grape production and sales affected by the boycott. "It is always difficult to measure the success of a boycott until it is over," he explained, "because the opposition simply tells you that you are not hurting them right up until fifteen minutes before they capitulate."

But there are indications that the grape producers are feeling the boycott's effects, he asserted, citing the $25 million lawsuit the growers recently filed against the union.

"We just don't think you sue for $25 million unless you are being hurt," he said.

Kircher denied that the boycott is hurting innocent people. The grocers and market operators aren't really "innocent," he said, and won't "lose a penny's worth of business" by not selling grapes, which are not a product that "attracts people into the markets."

CHARGING THAT "farm workers are one of the most oppressed and impoverished groups of workers in this nation," Kircher declared: "It is perfectly correct, proper and normal for the buying public to have the opportunity to be informed of the conditions under which foodstuffs are produced, and to make a decision as to whether or not they want to buy those things."

"We don't think the American buying public wants that impoverishment to continue as a sort of subsidy that the farm worker pays to permit the American buying public to purchase foodstuffs at a little lower price," he said.

Reporters questioning Kircher on the AFL-CIO produced interview were Stanley Levey of the Scripps-Howard Newspapers and Neil Gilbride of the Associated Press.

NOW THAT THE GLOOM and doom columnists have had their lugubrious say on what happened at the Chicago Democratic convention, it would seem worth while to set down some of the really important and even historic achievements that were scored there by the party.

On the surface, some of these achievements were merely procedural and technical. Yet they can, and surely will, have important consequences for subsequent conventions. Some of the changes, especially those concerned with selection of delegates, reach down into the state and local party structure. Taken all together, they represent a great step forward in the democratization of the party.

Among the important steps taken by the Democrats was the elimination of the unit rule which enables a majority in a delegation to thwart the will and the votes of the minority. This is in line with the 1936 abolition of the two-thirds rule which made it necessary for a candidate to get a two-thirds vote before he could be nominated.

Again the party this year turned its back on some of the more flagrant examples of segregated politics in refusing to seat the "regular," but unrepresentative, Mississippi delegation and in splitting the Georgia delegation in two. Half of the seats went to the non-segregated delegation.

Negro representation at the Democratic convention showed much improvement over previous years when Negroes could barely get a toe-hold. At Chicago, 7 percent of the delegates and alternates were Negroes as compared with 2.2 percent at the Republican convention.

WHATEVER THE bitterness that may survive over the Chicago police action in preventing mob interference with the convention's work, the fact remains that the Democratic Party came out of Chicago with a more democratic structure than when it came in.

The Democratic Party has opened the way to all Americans to participate in the process of selecting the party's presidential candidate. No more important, or even revolutionary, action could be taken by a political party in its search for democracy within its own ranks. For rank and file Democrats, black and white, to turn their backs on these reforms would be tragic, both for the party and the country.

None of the great social advances of the past eight years was rejected or repudiated. In fact, it would take more than one Congress to carry out all of the social and economic planks that were part of the platform.

For organized labor, the Democratic platform represents welcome reading as compared with the business-oriented, labor-management plank adopted by the Republicans. Repeal of 14(b), extension of the National Labor Relations Act to cruelly exploited farm workers and situs picketing are in the Democratic platform and conspicuously absent from the GOP one.

Nor was the issue of "law and order" ignored by the Democrats. The party plank and Vice Pres. Humphrey's subsequent comments have made it unmistakably clear that the Democrats are not "soft" toward crime in the streets, toward looting and burning.

Yet the party, as has organized labor, made it equally clear that "law and order" must not be used as a hypocritical excuse to neglect so many of the social and economic wrongs that still exist among us.

Vice Pres. Humphrey, in his acceptance speech, sounded his determination not to look backward, but to look forward, to make a new start in his handling of the many problems that now confront the nation.

He dramatized this by his use of the phrase "New Day," which in the course of time may well match Franklin Roosevelt's "New Deal," Harry Truman's "Fair Deal" and Lyndon Johnson's "Great Society."

What Humphrey and his running mate, Sen. Edmund S. Muskie of Maine, have stressed are unity and national reconciliation. This plea will play an increasingly important and healing role in the weeks that lie ahead.

LABOR'S BOYCOTT against California table grapes, launched by the farm workers to help win employer recognition of their union, shows signs of mounting success, AFL-CIO Dir. of Organization William L. Kircher, center, reported on Labor News Conference. Questioning him on the Mutual Radio interview program were Stanley Levey, left, of the Scripps-Howard Newspapers and Neil Gilbride of the Associated Press.

How to Buy:

Careful Shopping Prescribed To Outwit Stores on Markups

By Sidney Margolius

LIVING COSTS will hit a new peak this September before they level off for the fall. Among the problems to be outwitted this month by careful buying, are higher prices for clothing, bread and housing.

Clothing prices, which have been relatively stable during the recent years of inflation, now are catching up with the price raising parade — especially shoes. You'll notice the difference when you shop this month for school clothes, although prices will ease in October when the fall sales begin.

The truth is that retailers have pyramided the clothing price rise by boosting their tags even more than the increase at wholesale. The stores are taking a bigger profit both in percentage and dollars.

Here's the situation. While wholesale prices of apparel in general have risen 3.6 percent in one year, retail prices have gone up 5.6 percent. Normally if retailers raised prices the same percentage as the wholesale increase, they would still get a larger dollar profit.

For example, the store's cost for the $100 worth of clothing you buy for your family usually is about $65. If wholesale prices go up 3.6 percent, that means stores pay the manufacturers $2.34 more. If stores raised their prices only the same 3.6 percent, you would pay $3.60 more, which is bad enough. But this time they are trying to get $5.60 more for that $100 of clothing.

To help restrain your costs, you have to understand that not all stores and manufacturers raise prices by the same amount or at the same time, you should comparison-shop more widely.

This is noticeable this year in the disparity in prices of children's school clothes, with some stores and manufacturers charging significantly more than others. This situation also is noticeable in food. In preparing this report, we found round roast priced from $1.09 a pound to $1.59; bacon, 69 cents to $1.19, and pork loin from 49 to 79 cents.

Fortunately, some styles of children's clothing the stores and manufacturers are pushing this fall happen to be practical ones. The turtle neck knit shirt is not only currently "fashionable" for youngsters of all ages, it also makes sense because of its warmth, no ironing and reasonable cost (at some stores).

September is the month auto dealers cut prices to clear this year's models. But watch out for high-pressure selling. Before you ask the salesman for a quotation, look at the price sticker that all new cars must have. This shows the "suggested retail price" and destination and handling charges.

FIGURE THAT on moderate-price cars the dealer has 18-20 percent margin, or $450-$500 on a $2,500 car. In some cases at this time of year he may also get a "merchandising allowance" of $50-$100 from the factory to help move the factory's remaining inventory. Thus a discount of $200-$300, depending on the dealer's inventory situation and the popularity of the model, may be feasible.

Watch out for so-called "demonstrator" and "executive" models. Not that these are necessarily poor buys if the price is reasonable enough. But you should not consider them the equivalent of a new car, especially if they do not carry the full new-car warranty.

The small imports have been pushing "durability" in their ads. You've heard the commercials for the "10-year car," "our speedometer provides six digits," etc.

We advise taking these claims with a grain of salt, especially for some parts of the country and uses. The average American-made car does last 10 years before being scrapped. We asked the government's Bureau of Public Roads about these claims. Their Highway Statistics Division told us:

"We do not believe that the small foreign car has as high a life expectancy as the standard American car (assuming a reasonable mix of travel of high speed highways, local roads and city streets). Most of the small cars are not built to take the sustained high speeds commonplace in our Western Plains states, and becoming common nationwide as the interstate highway sections are connected."

Pollution, Overcrowding:

Cities New Concern Of Conservationists

POLLUTED AIR AND WATER, overcrowding, loss of living space and of wild nature, huge amounts of waste—all are dangerous by-products of great technological advances. But it doesn't have to be that way if we insist on a "rational use of the environment to achieve the highest quality of living for mankind."

That is the new meaning and concern of conservation, explained in An Environment Fit for People, by Raymond F. Dasmann, a new Public Affairs Pamphlet. Dr. Dasmann is director of environmental studies for the Conservation Foundation and writes for both scientific and popular publications.

"Cities have become focal points in a threatened decline in the quality of human life," Dr. Dasmann points out. He said that the conservationist, "once involved mostly with the natural world and the rural scene," has today shifted his attention to encompass too the problems of the urban areas, where 70 percent of America's population live.

The problems of the cities—whose needs are interdependent with those of the rural and marine environments—are outlined by Dr. Dasmann in these terms: "the nature and arrangement of living space; the problem of transportation; the provision of essential water, materials, and energy; the availability of outdoor recreation space, including areas in which some appreciation of wild nature can be obtained; and, perhaps most compelling of all, the problem of pollution."

POLLUTION, he emphasizes, has become all-pervading.

- Air in many regions of the country is reaching a degree of pollution that threatens the health and welfare of the people.
- Water pollution is present in all urbanizing areas and much of our surface water is unfit for recreational use and can only be used for water supply after expensive purification.
- Land pollution through solid wastes, the garbage and junk of an industrial society, is growing more severe and its effects range all the way from serious health hazards to the psychological hazard represented by 'uglification' of the landscape and cityscape.
- Pollution by increasing levels of noise at times threatens our hearing and may have broad effects on our health.

In addition to a discussion of the specific problems of urban areas—including a plea for cities to "provide diversity if human differences are to be maintained"—Dr. Dasmann stresses the related importance of conservation of rural lands.

He also notes the need for continued attention to the serious international problem of soil erosion, for a halt to the destructive exploitation of rangelands and forests, for the conservation of wildlife and protection of natural areas, and proper care of the valuable aquatic environments that are "the great regulators of the world's atmosphere and climate" and the source of a growing share of man's food supply.

He places on the individual citizen responsibility for insisting that our technology "be used for man's benefit and not his detriment, so that it may serve the welfare of all and not just the profits of a few."

Soup to Nonsense:

Tiring 9-Hour Balancing Act Adds Up to Mathematic Circus

By Jane Goodsell

MY HUSBAND, bless his heart, has always balanced my checkbook for me. Although he occasionally left town for a week or so, we agreed (that is, I pleaded and he finally relented) that it was simpler to let our family finances drift until his return. But now he is going to be away for seven (yes, seven) weeks, and this time he was adamant. I had to learn how to balance my checkbook.

"But why?" I asked. "You said yourself that the bank is sure to be right, so why not just take their word for it?"

"It's a matter of tidy bookkeeping," he said, and the way he said it made "tidy bookkeeping" sound sort of sacred—like "truth and beauty."

"But you know I can't add," I wailed.

"Oh, of course you can," he said impatiently. "Any dunce can add."

As it turned out he was right. I can add—as long as I'm not dealing with sevens (which I'm hung up on) and if the column doesn't involve more than seven numbers. Naturally, I'm speaking of a vertical column. Horizontally, I'm lucky to get into three figures. Still, as I say, I can add, sort of. What I can't do is subtract.

But to start from the beginning. I read the instructions printed on the back of my bank statement. It was headed How to Reconcile Your Checkbook Balance to the Statement Balance.

This comforted me a little. It sounded as though the bank truly expected me to succeed. I obediently sorted my checks numerically, checked off the checks which had cleared, added my deposits, subtracted the handling cost, added up the sub-total, subtracted the total of outstanding checks . . . and ended up with a figure that was $19.87 less than the balance I'd written in my checkbook.

WITH A SIGH, I started over from the beginning. I found three errors (one addition and two subtraction) and ended up with a new set of figures that put the bank and me $22.87 apart.

At 6 p.m. (it was 3:15 when I began my ordeal) I was sitting at the kitchen table, surrounded by sheets of paper covered with figures, and chewing my nails and making small whimpering sounds.

At 10 p.m., the bank and I were only 63 cents apart. But an hour later, I discovered a check for $4.87 which I'd forgotten to enter.

I won't bore you with more details (mercifully, they have faded from my mind like the pains of childbirth) but at 1:10 a.m. my checkbook balance reconciled to the penny with the statement balance.

UNION LABEL AND SERVICE TRADES DEPT., AFL-CIO

At TUC's Centennial Convention:

British Unions Seek Repeal Of Government Wage Curbs

Blackpool, England—Motions condemning the economic measures of Britain's Labor government dominated the centenary meeting of the British Trades Union Congress.

Employment & Productivity Minister Barbara Castle arrived from London to hear spokesmen of the 1,050 conference delegates attack climbing unemployment and laws that give government officials power to delay wage increases negotiated through traditional collective bargaining.

After the key debate on the government's Prices and Incomes Bill, in which a call for its repeal cruised through by 7,746,000 votes to 1,022,000, Mrs. Castle told newsmen that the Labor government had no intention of changing its wages policy.

So intense was the opposition to wage controls, or incomes policy as it is known here, that the TUC's own voluntary wage setting system also came under fire.

After a spirited defense of the system by TUC Gen. Sec. George Woodcock, a motion proposed by young TUC Gen. Councillor Jack Peel applauding the TUC system squeaked through by a paper-thin majority of only 34,000 votes.

Leader of the attack on the government's policies was Transport Workers' leader, Frank Cousins, who stated: "I do not want to fight the government more than anyone else, but if they pick a fight, I won't go into a hole."

Cousins was speaking from personal experience of government intervention in collective bargaining. Mrs. Castle's ministry has stopped some of his busmen members from getting a negotiated wage increase.

The motions were passed against a background of rising unemployment in Britain. TUC economic committee chairman, the railwaymens' leader Sidney Greene, warned the government that trade unionists would not accept the forecast winter unemployment level of 700,000 jobless.

He warned that workers will not cooperate with employers and government officials who want to relate every wage increase to higher industrial productivity unless there is full employment.

Greene demanded that the government lift many of its restrictions on economic growth so that unemployment will begin to fall. Aware of the precarious position of the nation's balance of payments, he also proposed that restrictions on overseas sterling investment be introduced. Other speakers called for import controls to back Labor's policies for economic recovery.

Few delegates at this 100th TUC Congress believed that there was much to celebrate. Dispirited after four years of Labor government, some leaders demanded that the congress reject its annual motion proposing support for the government's policies, and Labor's electoral effort.

Printers' leader, Richard Briginshaw, demanded that the motion be defeated as a mark of the TUC's independence of the party, whose pursekeeper it has always been. Cousins also demanded that the traditional motion either be withdrawn or rejected. In the end it passed, by a show of hands, in the dying minutes of the congress.

Government officials were also unsympathetic to another of the congress demands—a call for equal pay for women to be introduced in two years. The delegates even went against general council advice and demanded that all affiliated unions support strikes called to try and force equal pay on unwilling employers.

The Labor government is thinking of making a firm pledge to introduce equal pay, but ministers are talking in terms of a gradual seven-year introduction instead of the TUC's two-year limit.

On the international front, the congress unanimously condemned the Soviet invasion of Czechoslovakia and accepted the general council's decision to cut off all links with Communist block trade union movements, except those which opposed Russia's attack.

Chairman of the TUC's international committee, Fred Hayday, demanded that all links be cut until the Soviet Union and her Warsaw Pact allies have withdrawn their troops from Czechosolvakia, "and leave the Czechs to find their own salvation."

First action under the ban was to withdraw the invitation offered to the Russian trade union movement to send fraternal delegates to the 100th Congress.

The congress also passed, without opposition, a motion calling for new initiatives to end the war in Viet Nam.

Nursing Home Rebuked On Refusal to Bargain

The Mar Salle Convalescent Home committed an unfair labor practice when it refused to bargain collectively with Service Employes Local 536 in Washington, D.C., a National Labor Relations Board examiner ruled.

Examiner Charles W. Schneider recommended that the board order the home, whose practical nursing and service staffs have been on strike since July 7, to bargain with the union and sign a contract if an understanding is reached.

Schneider also recommended that the union's first year of bargaining rights under the law be extended from May 2, when Local 536 was first certified, to a year from the date that management commences to bargain in good faith.

The strike is one of the first in the nation since the NLRB voted to accept election petitions from employes of nursing homes. It will continue with SEIU support, Pres. David Sullivan said, until the home recognizes the rights of its employes.

The home's 122 employes voted Apr. 2 to have the union represent them. Their employer has refused to recognize the union or bargain with it, and has challenged not only the results but the right of the NLRB to allow an election in such homes.

All the strikers are Negroes who had been receiving wages of $1.30 to $1.45 an hour—below the poverty level, according to Local Pres. Peter Sheehan.

The union said that widespread public support for the strikers' seven-month struggle has developed. Besides the local labor movement, encouragement has been offered by members of the Catholic Interracial Council, Citizens for Fair Employment Now and the Medical Committee for Human Rights.

The Fair Employment group includes Pres. J. C. Turner of the Greater Washington AFL-CIO, Rev. Geno Baroni of the Catholic archdiocese, Rev. Channing Phillips of the D.C. Council, Joseph Rauh, and Bishop Smallwood Williams of the Bible Way Church of Christ. The group helped stage a support rally on the picket line on Labor Day.

Sullivan has condemned the home's operators for violating the legal rights of the strikers by refusing to obey an order to bargain, and their human rights by paying wages below the poverty level.

"The real disgrace here," Sullivan said, "is not only that the nursing home industry is heavily subsidized by federal medicare, welfare and other payments but also because it has been and is continuing to be subsidized by the underpaid men and women who work for nursing and convalescent homes."

The union is "100 percent behind this strike that was caused by flagrant disregard for law and justice," Sullivan said.

Union Leaders Join Stars In Health Fund Telethon

New York—With a big assist from the trade union movement, more than $1.4 million in donations and pledges was raised in a 19-hour telethon for the national campaign to wipe out muscular dystrophy.

Headliner Jerry Lewis led a parade of entertainment stars on the show sponsored by the Muscular Dystrophy Association of America. The program was beamed over a five-station network in New York City, Buffalo, Rochester, N.Y., Boston, Providence, R.I., and New Bedford, Mass., Sept. 1-2.

Vice Pres. Hubert H. Humphrey the Democratic presidential candidate, was a surprise guest in the closing hours of the show.

Pres. George Meany was among the labor leaders helping Lewis raise funds for the March Against Muscular Dystrophy and the Institute for Muscle Disease in New York City.

Other participants included James H. Rademacher, newly elected president of the Letter Carriers; William D. Buck, retiring president of the Fire Fighters; Pres. Thomas F. Murphy of the Bricklayers; Sec.-Treas. Stanley Ballard of the Musicians; Sec.-Treas. Sol Stetin of the Textile Workers Union of America; Leo Perlis, director of AFL-CIO Community Services, and Vice Pres. Jim King of the Fire Fighters.

Central Bodies Lauded As 'Vital' to AFL-CIO

Kankakee, Ill.—Central bodies play a vital role in the organizational structure of the AFL-CIO, federation Pres. George Meany said in saluting the Kankakee AFL-CIO at a 60th anniversary celebration of its chartering.

Meany and Illinois Gov. Samuel Shapiro (D), a member of the Musicians who once was local federation president, headed a list of dignitaries at a reception in the local labor hall and a George Meany Day program at the county fairgrounds.

Meany reminded an audience of 600 that the AFL-CIO is a federation of 125 autonomous national unions.

It is not the parent body of the national unions, but a coordinating organization to unify their efforts, he explained, adding: "It does not have any executive authority" over the unions, but does have a strong influence "because of the type of structure which we main tain" in the union movement.

Under that structure, local central bodies "do the same job at the local level as the AFL-CIO does in Washington." Contacts between the community at large, local and state governments, and between citizens in all the communities of America are maintained, Meany said, "not by the AFL-CIO in Washington but by the central labor union at the community level."

The federation depends on the local central bodies not only for legislative action, for contacts with neighbors and friends, but for "political action which is part and parcel of the job of the AFL-CIO," he explained.

Importance of Local Bodies

"So never underestimate the importance of a local central body," Meany advised. "It is in that spirit, on behalf of the AFL-CIO, that I congratulate the Kankakee Federation of Labor on its 60 years of existence."

Gov. Shapiro welcomed Meany to the state and, on behalf of local unions, presented a plaque praising him for his "devotion and service to organized labor."

Sixty years ago, when the central body was established, the average pay check was $9.74 for a 51-hour week, the governor recalled. He praised local and state labor for their "vigorous representation" of union members and promised to consult with them "in the next four years."

Kankakee Mayor Thomas Ryan lauded the central body for its cooperation in every major civic function and reported that for the ninth straight year it will be host to the opening dinner for the town's Community Chest fund drive.

Other guests included Pres. Reuben G. Soderstrom of the Illinois AFL-CIO, Pres. Thomas F. Murphy of the Bricklayers, Pres. James M. Roberts and Executive Vice Pres. Fred Keller of the Stove Workers, Sec.-Treas. O. T. Satre of the Painters, AFL-CIO Regional Dir. Daniel J. Healy and other labor and community leaders.

Shipyard Pact Ends Strike of Eleven Unions

Groton, Conn.—Members of 11 shipyard unions won protection against indiscriminate layoffs in a four-year agreement that ended a 22-day strike here against the Electric Boat division of General Dynamics Corp.

Seniority was the major issue in a strike that began July 14 with the sanction of the Metal Trades Council of New London County. The walkout ended in a 2,457-2,332 vote to accept a company offer to some 7,500 members of the Boilermakers, Carpenters, Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Guards, Laborers, Machinists, Molders, Office & Professional Employes, Painters, Plumbers, and the unaffiliated Teamsters.

Electric Boat management agreed to drop a $1 million lawsuit against the unions on contract ratification.

The new pact provides wage increases of 26 cents an hour this year and further annual increases of 3 percent, 3.5 percent and 5 percent, for an overall average hike of 67.1 cents an hour.

Special pay increases will add 17 cents an hour to the wages of specialists, 25 cents for working leaders, 30 cents for workers on jobs 40 feet or more above the ground, and $2 a shift for those who work under a submarine or on other hazardous jobs.

It was agreed that divers are entitled to an extra $20 a day besides regular pay for work on construction.

Other contract changes include improvements in insurance coverage, sick leave, pensions, funeral leave, and two more paid holidays for a total of 11.

The Groton yard builds nuclear-propelled submarines and does refitting work on all types of undersea boats, Council Pres. Anthony L. DeGregory said.

MORE THAN 100 representatives of unions in the state attended the annual Florida Labor School in Jacksonville, where they studied labor history, political action, and heard addresses by state officials. George T. Guernsey, AFL-CIO assistant director of education, conducts one of the classes.

Rail Trainmen Warn Carriers Of Drive for Safety Standards

Hollywood, Fla.—The Trainmen warned the nation's railroads that greater safety is a major goal of the union and "if necessary, we will make it a matter of negotiation."

Charles Luna, in opening the 33rd convention of the 180,000-member BRT, pointed out that the accident rate on U.S. railroads has gone up since 1961.

"Every major transportation service is regulated from the safety standpoint except the railroads," Luna told the 1,100 delegates. "We need, we must have passed, a bill to provide the Dept. of Transportation with authority and funds to administer broad safety programs over the railroads."

He urged backing of the two rail safety bills now before Congress, one introduced by Rep. Harley Staggers (D- W. Va.) and the other by Sen. Warren Magnuson (D-Wash.).

Luna also pledged continued support for development of high speed rail transportation and cooperation with railroads to meet this goal. But, he pointed out—it's time to start moving up toward good service with the best possible equipment.

"We can no longer be satisfied with the placing of a couple of jet engines on top of obsolete equipment, as the New York Central did not long ago," he said. "The Central tried to fool the public with publicity releases, but actually fooled no one.

"The carriers have walked away from their responsibilities to the traveling public, but the responsibility still exists," Luna said. "There is no doubt in my mind that passenger service must return to this country.

"It is embarrassing to find that other countries are way ahead of us in transportation. Europe and Japan have done things with trains that American railroads don't even think is possible."

Commenting on the proposed unification of the BRT with three other rail operating unions—the Conductors and Brakemen, the Locomotive Firemen & Enginemen, and the Switchmen's Union—Luna called the move "the beginning of a greater unification of transportation crafts."

The unification action has been agreed to by the four unions and will soon go to a referendum vote of the members, the final step in creation of a 250,000-member organization.

Vice Pres. Hubert H. Humphrey sent a message to the delegates urging their help in his presidential campaign, which he said is aimed at bringing "a new day of economic security, truly full employment, first class education and unity as free people."

The alternative, he warned, is to "follow the Republican reactionary coalition back into an old era of unemployment and cyclical recession, marginal education . . . and irrevocable tension and hatred."

One of the highlights of the convention will be an address by Sec. of Transportation Alan S. Boyd.

The convention will also hear from Under Sec. of Labor James J. Reynolds; Betty Furness, special assistant to the President for consumer affairs; and two members of the National Mediation Board—Chairman Leverett Edwards and Francis A. O'Neill, Jr.

Also expected as guests are the presidents of the three unions considering unification with BRT—H. E. Gilbert of the Firemen, C. F. Lane of the Conductors and N. P. Speirs of the Switchmen.

Rep. Goodell Appointed To RFK's Senate Seat

The Senate seat of Robert F. Kennedy will be filled by a conservative Republican whose voting record on key issues was almost 100 percent opposite that of the slain New York senator.

New York Gov. Nelson A. Rockefeller has appointed Rep. Charles E. Goodell, 42, five-term congressman from Jamestown, N.Y., to fill the remaining two years of Kennedy's term.

Goodell's appointment placated the state's party leaders who reportedly were disturbed over the possibility that Rockefeller might name a New York City liberal to the vacancy. The name of Rep. Ogden R. Reid, a liberal Republican from suburban Westchester County, had been prominently mentioned.

The youthful, articulate Goodell has the reputation of a moderate and was a strong supporter of Rockefeller's unsuccessful bid for the Republican presidential nomination.

But his voting record—by COPE standards—is among the most conservative of any eastern Republican.

On key votes from the time he entered Congress in 1959 through the close of the 89th Congress in 1966, Goodell had 42 "wrong" votes and only two "right" votes in labor's scorebook.

He voted for minimum wage amendments to deny coverage to retail employes and farm workers and to delay the second stage minimum wage increase another year. He voted against repeal of Taft-Hartley's Sec. 14(b) and against the aid to education bill.

Goodell's COPE record in the 90th Congress shows 9 wrong and 3 right votes. He supported efforts to slash funds for model cities, anti-poverty and rent supplement programs.

By contrast, Kennedy's voting record on similar issues was 100 percent right by COPE's tally.

Unionists Lauded For Emergency Aid

Several trade union members have been cited by the Red Cross for their volunteer help following the crash of an airliner at Charleston (W.Va.) Kanawha Airport in which 32 of 37 passengers were killed.

Blood transfusions were administered. An information center for relatives was established. Emergency transportation was provided. Nurses were brought to the scene, and a Red Cross mobile canteen was set up.

Among those cited by the Red Cross are Cecil Martin, Communications Workers, who is chairman of the subcommittee for manpower of the Red Cross Disaster Committee; James Glaspell and his son of the United Federation of Postal Clerks; Ernest L. Ritz and Walter Brady of the Machinists; John Sander and Charles Kinder of the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Charles Morton of the Windowglass Cutters and Wendell Drake, AFL-CIO Community Services Activities staffer.

Joseph Coakley Dies, SEIU Legislative Aide

Worcester, Mass.—Joseph Coakley, who retired July 1 after 25 years as legislative representative for the former AFL and the Service Employes, died here at 65 while visiting friends and relatives.

Coakley came from Syracuse, N.Y., to Washington, D.C., during World War II. He had been a police reporter for the Worcester Telegram and a correspondent for the New York Herald Tribune, the Associated Press and United Press. His wife survives in Arlington, Va. A son, William, is on the SEIU staff in Boston.

A 'Clear-Cut Choice':

Humphrey Endorsed By Clothing Workers

New York—The Amalgamated Clothing Workers endorsed the presidential candidacy of Vice Pres. Humphrey and his running mate, Sen. Edmund S. Muskie, and called upon the union's more than 400,000 members "to work for their victory, to register and to vote on Nov. 5."

In a statement on behalf of the executive board, Pres. Jacob S. Potofsky and Sec.-Treas. Frank Rosenblum declared that "in this critical year of 1968, the Amalgamated Clothing Workers of America urges its members and friends to rise above fears and frustrations and to cast their votes on the basis of solid fact, not on the basis of slick political merchandising or demagogic, over-simplified cure-alls."

The union statement asserted that the "American people know that the 'new' Nixon is nothing more than chrome-plated 'old' Nixon." It charged that the Republican platform would "halt social progress," "hamstring" labor unions, and "pave the way for serious recession."

The ACWA statement charged that the "oversimplified appeals of George C. Wallace will bring not peace but more hostility, not law and order but more friction and violence among all the groups which make up our modern democratic America."

The union statement pointed out that "the American people want peace in Viet Nam—and the Humphrey-Muskie ticket offers far more promise for achieving a negotiated peace at the earliest possible time. Nixon, in contrast, still echoes the slogans of the cold war period, and Wallace offers no road to peace at all. With either, we face the danger of more escalation, not the hope of peace."

Thus, the statement declared, "In the elections of 1968, the American people are offered a clear-cut choice. The effects of the choice we make will influence our own lives and those of our children and grandchildren."

The ACWA cited Humphrey's "brilliant record of service to the cause of social advance in our country" and said "he has been a steadfast friend of labor."

"In the Senate he sponsored or supported a tremendous variety of legislative measures that had the support of organized labor and of the vast majority of citizens in all walks of life. Because of Hubert Humphrey's efforts in the United States Senate, Americans today have made progress toward better health care, better housing, improved education, more jobs, higher pay, more secure savings and a more comfortable old age.

"Hubert Humphrey has always stood fast against those who would tear down our effective system of collective bargaining relationships. He has resisted the attacks on labor of those who would divide and destroy the trade unions of America. Hubert H. Humphrey long ago, on his record of achievement, earned our esteem as a true 'friend of labor'. . . .

"In contrast to the double standards offered by Nixon and Wallace, the team of Humphrey and Muskie offers America the promise of more progress and continued prosperity."

America, the statement continued, "clearly wants change. But in the name of change we cannot afford retrogression and reaction, which are the stock in trade of Nixon and Wallace." Humphrey and Muskie, it said, "have demonstrated that they are truly committed, in heart and mind, to change for progress, to change for peace, to change for domestic tranquility, to change for opportunity and economic advance."

ACWA Funds Mini-Park in Poverty Area

New York—Affiliates of the Clothing Workers here have made a grant of $40,000 to the New York Urban Coalition to construct a mini-park in a poverty area.

ACWA Pres. Jacob S. Potofsky presented a check for the amount to Saul Wallen, coalition president, at the site of the proposed park, 118th Street and Park Avenue.

The park, part of a rehabilitation program being undertaken by an East Harlem community group, will be the first of 100 mini-parks which the coalition has pledged to build in the city's poverty sections.

The ACWA grant is part of a $250,000 commitment by the union to urban coalitions around the nation. Earlier, the union contributed $50,000 to the National Urban Coalition in Washington.

A BRASS LANTERN of early-day railroading vintage is presented to Fred Verrier, left, San Jose, Calif., during the National Association of Model Railroaders' convention in San Francisco. Verrier won a Railroad Trainmen's contest to convert a model rail passenger car to make it more attractive and comfortable. BRT Vice Pres. John H. Shepherd examines Verrier's winning entry.

'Lives at Stake':

Clark Pushes Fight For Gun Controls

The attorney general of the United States told the Senate bluntly that it should pass a strong gun control law if it really wants to fight crime.

"Those who stridently call for law and order, yet oppose controls, fail to face the issues, fail to protect the public and raise questions as to their own purposes," Atty. Gen. Ramsay Clark charged.

His three-page letter was delivered to the desk of each senator as the Senate opened debate on the controversial, emotion-charged gun control issue.

Both a House-passed bill and legislation approved by the Senate Judiciary Committee would add rifles and shotguns to the ban on mail order sale of handguns previously enacted. The bills would also, with some big loopholes, restrict interstate sales of both guns and ammunition.

Neither bill includes the licensing and registration provisions sought by Pres. Johnson after the assassination of Sen. Robert F. Kennedy.

"Those who quibble about the inconvenience of registration and licensing, knowing lives are at stake, cannot be much concerned about life or crime either," Clark said.

He reiterated that the purpose of the legislation is to protect the public by keeping guns from criminals, assassins, the mentally disturbed and drug addicts.

Sen. Joseph D. Tydings (D-Md.) planned to lead a fight for strengthening amendments to the Senate committee bill.

The chances for major strengthening of the bill appeared much dimmer, however, than they would have been last June when Congress was flooded with letters and petitions demanding the strongest possible gun control law.

Since then, the National Rifle Association and other opponents of registration and strict controls have massed a powerful grass roots protest. In a number of communities whose local governing bodies appeared ready to pass gun control ordinances, public hearings brought out throngs of opponents and cautious legislators backed off.

In other congressional developments:

- House and Senate conferees reached agreement on a $1.9 billion foreign aid authorization bill—$1 billion less than the President had requested and the lowest amount since the program began. It was virtually certain that the actual amount appropriated in a later bill would be considerably less than the amount authorized.
- The Senate voted overwhelmingly to exempt federal "impact" grants to schools attended by children of servicemen and government employes from the economy axe. Liberals and conservatives joined in exempting the program from the mandatory $6 billion budget cut Congress has ordered the President to make.
- The House Commerce Committee voted 16-14 approval of a Senate-passed bill to allow television and radio stations to give free time to a Humphrey-Nixon debate without having to offer equal time to a host of minor party candidates. The networks have said they would give comparable free time to George Wallace, but would not include him in the debate. Similar legislation in 1960 paved the way for the Kennedy-Nixon debates.

The bill, however, must still clear the House Rules Committee or be brought up under a suspension of the rules procedure requiring a two-thirds vote for passage.

- Pres. Johnson acknowledged that "it is late in the session" but sent Congress proposals for closing loopholes in the Coal Mine Safety Act and strongly urged action before adjournment. He said coal mining remains "the most dangerous and hazardous occupation" and an overhaul of the safety law needs "immediate attention."
- The House Labor Committee filed its report on a compromise bill tightening the existing Welfare & Pension Plans Disclosure Act. But there appeared little likelihood of final congressional action on the legislation this year.

McGinley Appointed Deputy In Labor Dept.

J. Timothy McGinley has been named Deputy Assistant Secretary of Labor to assume the number two position in the Labor Dept.'s Wage & Labor Standards Administration. He has held the acting deputy's post since January.

McGinley, a former All Big Ten basketball player at Purdue University and an honors scholar at Harvard University, has also served as a special assistant to Labor Sec. W Willard Wirtz.

'Just Taking Notes'

PRES. JOHNSON is welcomed by Sec. of Housing & Urban Development Robert C. Weaver at ceremonies dedicating a new HUD headquarters in Washington. It provides space for 4,300 employes who had been scattered in 20 separate buildings throughout the city.

Johnson Names Meany To New Housing Unit

Pres. Johnson has named AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany among a group of distinguished Americans to serve as incorporators of the National Housing Partnership, whose task will be to stimulate construction of low-income housing.

The President announced the incorporators while participating in ceremonies dedicating a new Washington headquarters for the Dept. of Housing & Urban Development.

The Partnership was created under a provision of the 1968 Housing Act to provide a means of uniting private capital and local builders to help close a gap in low-income housing.

Johnson named ten incorporators and said more will be selected later. He said they will have the job of creating an "adequately capitalized, professionally managed" corporation under the Partnership.

The corporation's purpose, the President stressed, is to help the nation reach a goal of 600,000 new low and moderate income housing units a year—"a tenfold increase in the current rate of production."

Also, he added, the corporation can get neighborhoods and citizens involved in planning projects and "formulate labor agreements which insure the training and employment of neighborhood residents."

Edgar F. Kaiser, chairman of the board of Kaiser Industries, Inc., was named chairman of the incorporators, all of whom are subject to Senate confirmation.

Kaiser said the incorporators hope to "line up" some $200 million from private investors and said the corporation would have a "borrowing base" of $4 billion to encourage small builders to increase housing construction.

In dedicating the strikingly modern, $26 million HUD headquarters—in the heart of Washington's urban renewal area—Johnson spoke of the "staggering" job of meeting a goal of 26 million new houses and apartments over the next 10 years.

Describing the 1968 housing law as a commitment to that objective, he said the urgent question "is not can we build all of this?" but "can we build it better and more beautiful?"

An environment of beauty and harmony "cannot be a luxury," the President said. "It is a necessity if we are to build . . . new order and new meaning into the lives of our fellow Americans."

Three days before the new HUD building was dedicated, ceremonies also were held there to unveil a bust of Catherine Baurer Wurster, who pioneered and promoted public and labor supported housing for 30 years until her death in 1964.

Pres. John W. Edelman of the National Council of Senior Citizens, a speaker at the occasion, traced her career and described the bust as a symbol of "the struggle still ahead" to secure "true urban development as the basis for a better America."

Family Income Climbs for 63% Of Households

Ann Arbor, Mich.—About 63 percent of the nation's families have increased their income over the past four years and 49 percent are making more than a year ago, according to a report released here.

The projection for the nation was made by the University of Michigan's survey research center based on interviews conducted with families across the nation as part of an extensive study of consumer finances.

The report also projects that about 40 percent of all families expect to have more income next year than they have now, and 50 percent anticipate greater income in four years.

Although the average income of Negro families is much lower than that of white families, the report said, "substantially the same proportion of Negro and white families experienced and expected income increases."

In another area, the report said that an analysis of the change in distribution of income, financial assets and major expenditures over recent years "indicates some progress in the war against poverty."

The analysis of findings showed a small but continuous decline in the proportion of families with extremely low incomes and no financial assets.

Also, the study showed a growth in the proportion of families with higher income. The percentage of families with income above $10,000 before taxes increased from 27 to 32 percent between 1966 and 1967.

Fortas Still Under Fire Of Dixie-GOP Coalition

answer questions about pornography and obscenity."

Newspaper head counts indicated a majority of both the committee and the full Senate would vote for confirmation of Fortas. But the key problem would be to muster the two-thirds needed to break a filibuster.

Before the Judiciary Committee set a firm date for its vote, Senate Majority Leader Mike Mansfield had served notice that he would, if necessary, move to take the nomination out of the hands of the Judiciary Committee and put it directly on the Senate calendar.

Mansfield also said he is prepared to call the Senate back into session after the November election if the nomination is not acted on before then.

Earlier Pres. Johnson called a news conference to denounce the conservative coalition's attempt to prevent a vote on confirmation.

Johnson said that "a little group," which disapproves of some Supreme Court decisions, should not be able, "by parliamentary tricks, to filibuster and prevent the majority from expressing its viewpoint."

Also held up is the nomination of Homer T. Thornberry as associate justice. Chief Justice Earl Warren's resignation is effective on the confirmation of his successor, and if Fortas is confirmed there would be a vacancy for associate justice.

While Senate Republican Leader Everett McKinley Dirksen has indicated his support of Fortas, Griffin has apparently succeeded in rallying the majority of Senate Republicans behind his filibuster with the argument that a Nixon victory in the election would enable a Republican president to appoint the Chief Justice and fill the court vacancy. There was speculation, however, that Warren—a former Republican governor and the GOP's 1948 vice presidential candidate—might withdraw his resignation if the Senate did not act this year.

Increasingly, the attacks on Fortas have become essentially attacks on the Supreme Court and its controversial decisions on rights of defendants, civil rights, censorship and individual liberties.

Union Saves Jobs of N.Y. Fire Chaplains

New York—A mail and telephone campaign by Fire Fighters Local 94 saved the jobs of the New York Fire Dept.'s six chaplains, threatened by an "economy" move.

The campaign got rolling when firemen learned of Mayor Lindsay's proposed 1968-69 budget that would eliminate the chaplains and their $4,500-a-year salary. It coasted past the victory line when members of City Council kept the salary item in the budget.

Officers of Local 94 fought for more than a month to arouse the public, and city officials, to the threatened loss of the chaplain corps. They drove home these points:

The chaplains are on call 24 hours a day, 365 days a year—building morale, consoling the families of firemen killed in line of duty, calling on sick and injured firemen, counseling on personal problems, attending official functions, visiting fire houses and fire units in Greater New York as friends of the men in uniform.

Since the clergymen are on call day or night, they must get a replacement when parish duties detain them.

'Old Coalition':

Humphrey Hits GOP On Reactionary Ties

comed" a contest that included a joint declaration to remove human rights from campaign debate, a contest that focused on urban problems, foreign policy, agriculture and other issues.

"But instead," Humphrey observed, "we are confronted not only with third-party extremism, but with the old Republican-reactionary coalition that has always held America back."

Declaring that it is in the "dollars-and-cents self-interest" of the nation to pursue programs to assure equal opportunity for every American, the Vice President said the 1968 election poses "a fateful choice" for the voter:

"Shall we—as a nation—move forward toward one society of opportunity and justice, or shall we abandon this commitment out of fear and prejudice and move instead toward a fractured and separated society?"

Humphrey's B'nai Brith address kicked off a coast-to-coast campaign tour that brought the candidate to Philadelphia, Denver and Los Angeles, then back to the East for appearances at Detroit, Wilmington, Del., and Pittsburgh.

Early in the week, the Vice President issued a position paper contrasting the 32 percent gain in real family income during the eight years of the Kennedy-Johnson and Johnson-Humphrey Administrations with a rise of only 9 percent during the previous eight years of Republican rule. (Excerpts, Page 6.)

The week also saw a solid endorsement of the Democratic ticket by Sen. Edward M. Kennedy. In his first political appearance since the assassination of his brother, Robert, Kennedy toured areas of western Massachusetts in support of Rep. Edward P. Boland's reelection. But he paused to call Humphrey and his running mate, Sen. Edmund S. Muskie, the candidates "best equipped to provide the kind of programs and plans we need to move this country ahead," adding that he would have more to say on the subject "at a later date."

Meanwhile, Nixon, too, was criss-crossing the country in search of votes. He also addressed the B'nai Brith convention, but directed his speech largely to the hostilities between Israel and her Arab neighbors, pledging if elected to "find a just peace."

Nixon's campaign thus far has been couched largely in generalities, avoiding specific commitments on such issues as race relations, Viet Nam, the nomination of Supreme Court Justice Abe Fortas.

His appeal is directed to those he calls "forgotten Americans," and in White Plains, N.Y., he made it clear that suburban dwellers, most of whom are middle-class whites, make up the nucleus of this group.

On issues of immediate concern to union members, the Republican candidate has clearly opted to write off their support in exchange for the backing of organized labor's foes. In Houston, for example, he proclaimed his opposition to repeal of Section 14(b) of the Taft-Hartley Act which permits Texas and other states to outlaw the union shop. And in San Francisco, he issued a statement condemning as "illegal" the boycott of California table grapes being pressed across the country by striking members of the United Farm Workers Organizing Committee. (Story, Page 1.)

The "new" Nixon so far has refrained from personal attacks on his Democratic opponents. But the GOP candidate for vice president, Maryland Gov. Spiro T. Agnew, resurrected tactics that the "old" Nixon employed in running for Congress and the Senate in the 1940s. Agnew charged that over the years Humphrey has been "soft on inflation, soft on communism and soft on law and order."

THE GRAPE STRIKE is a family affair for farm workers like Roberto Bustos, left, his wife and three sons, shown as guests of Eldred Kleeman, research director for Machinists Dist. 9, and his wife Faye, right, secretary of the Southwest Missouri AFL-CIO at Joplin. Eleven local unions pledged monthly contributions to the strikers after Bustos and his wife told of the United Farm Workers Organizing Committee's three-year fight for union protection.

Sen. Morse Hits Employer Plot To Kill NLRB, Sap Union Strength

The nation's most powerful employer organizations have begun a large-scale, well-financed drive to destroy the National Labor Relations Act and weaken unions.

They've hired one of America's biggest public relations firms to try to convince the nation that unions are "too strong" and that the National Labor Relations Board has been outrageously pro-union.

The drive is frankly tied to the hope that the November elections will put into office a Congress which will pass an employer-written labor law and a President who will sign it.

Sen. Wayne Morse (D-Ore.) terms this employer campaign "serious and dangerous" in an article in the September issue of the American Federationist, the AFL-CIO's magazine.

The article is based on a speech Morse made in the Senate in which he warned that "if this campaign succeeds, I fear that it will lead to a new era of labor strife which will merely add to our already lengthy list of national problems."

Morse traces the buildup of the drive to gut the NLRB to the 1965 appointment of a "blue ribbon" committee of management lawyers by the National Association of Manufacturers and the U.S. Chamber of Commerce.

Its report is a 167-page analysis of proposed amendments to the present labor law and, Morse says, "it is punctuated by broadside attacks on the integrity of decisions of the NLRB and the federal courts."

While agreeing that "the legislative remedy should be aimed at the chief offender, the NLRB itself," the management lawyers were apparently divided on whether the labor board's jurisdiction over unfair labor practice cases should be transferred to a new national labor court or to the regular district courts. Either solution would be satisfactory, the committee said.

Morse gives this summary of the employer-proposed "ripper" amendments:

They "begin by deleting from the policy objectives in the law's present preamble any reference to protecting self-organization and freedom of association.

"They go from there to limit the scope of the bargaining obligation, to restrict the board's power in unit determinations, to toughen a number of sections limiting labor's conduct, to ease various restrictions on employers, to confine the board's none-too-strong remedial authority within much narrower limits, to change the venue provisions for court review and to reverse over a score of Supreme Court, courts of appeals and board decisions in leading cases."

Morse noted that, "however profitable for lawyers, this wrecking operation, based as it is on faulty and distorted analysis, would undoubtedly produce new instabilities and conflicts which would severely damage our labor-management progress."

Morse documents the role of the Hill & Knowlton public relations firm, which has a reputation as an "image maker" for conservative interests. These, Morse told the Senate, have included "the gun lobby, the tobacco lobby, the steel industry in the 1937, 1952 and 1959 strikes, the oil and gas lobby in the early 1950s when a scandal resulted from an oil company's attempted 'campaign contribution' to Sen. Francis Case just before a crucial vote."

Morse suggests dryly, "If one is inclined to credit the revised aphorism that 'when there is smoke, there is often a smoke machine,' Hill & Knowlton seems to be one of the main smoke machines in this effort to becloud public understanding."

The Oregon senator agrees that some amendments are needed to the National Labor Relations Act—but not of the type the employer groups are pushing.

The type of amendments necessary, Morse stressed, would strengthen rather than weaken "the objectives of sound labor legislation."

Primary Elections in Ten States Produce Victories for Incumbents

Primaries in 10 states brought victory to all incumbents seeking renomination and the return of some familiar names to the political arena.

Vermont's 76-year-old Sen. George D. Aiken, a liberal Republican, won re-election as well as renomination. He easily won the GOP primary and was named the Democratic candidate on a write-in vote. No Democrat had filed to oppose him.

Vermont Republicans, however, picked the more conservative of two candidates, Deane C. Davis, as their gubernatorial choice. Democrats are running Lt. Gov. John J. Daley.

Barry Goldwater will seek to return to the Senate and Arizona Democrats picked 37-year-old Roy Elson to oppose him. Elson is an aide to Sen. Carl Hayden, who is retiring after 56 years in Congress. Former Democratic Gov. Sam Goddard will run against GOP Gov. Jack R. Williams.

The New Hampshire senatorial election will match the best vote-getters of the two parties. Incumbent Republican Sen. Norris Cotton will be opposed by the state's three-term Democratic Gov. John W. King.

The race for governor will be between Walter R. Peterson, Republican speaker of the state House of Representatives, and Democrat Emile R. Bussiere.

Bronson C. LaFollette will test the political staying power of his family name by running as the Democratic candidate for governor in Wisconsin against GOP incumbent Warren P. Knowles. Sen. Gaylord Nelson will be opposed by Republican Jerris Leonard, majority leader of the state Senate.

Maryland's Democratic Sen. Daniel B. Brewster will be challenged for re-election by GOP Rep. Charles McC. Mathias, Jr. The race is complicated by the independent candidacy of George P. Mahoney, who in 1966 was the unsuccessful Democratic candidate for governor. Three incumbent Democratic congressmen survived strong primary opposition—George H. Fallon, Samuel N. Friedel and Hervey G. Machen.

Colorado Democrats named former Gov. Steve McNichols to run against incumbent Republican Sen. Peter H. Dominick. McNichols beat a lesser-known candidate who had urged withdrawal of U.S. troops from Viet Nam.

In Utah, two former officers of the John Birch Society failed to defeat conservative Republican incumbents, Sen. Wallace F. Bennett and Rep. Sherman P. Lloyd. Democrats chose Milton L. Weilenmann to run against Bennett. Incumbent Democratic Gov. Calvin J. Rampton had no primary opposition and will face Republican Carl W. Buehner.

Incumbent congressmen had easy primary victories in Minnesota and Rhode Island.

A liberal former congressman from Atlanta, Charles L. Weltner, won the Democratic nomination in Georgia's primary and will seek to regain his congressional seat from Republican Fletcher Thompson. Weltner had resigned as a candidate for re-election in 1966 rather than accept a party loyalty oath to support Lester Maddox for governor.

Sen. Herman E. Talmadge won his expected renomination in the Democratic primary but his Negro opponent, Maynard Jackson, polled more than 100,000 votes with the tally still incomplete.

Fred Stewart Dies, SIU Staff Member

New York—Fred M. Stewart, headquarters representative for the Seafarers here since 1960, died. He was 55. Stewart had been active in early organizing campaigns when the SIU was first established in 1938 and continued to be active in the union for the past 30 years.

U.S. Pledges Consultation In Pay Studies

The government has promised to do a better job of consulting with unions of federal employes when it develops annual comparisons of civil service salaries with private industry pay for comparable jobs.

These comparability findings are submitted to Congress each year, along with the President's recommendations for pay raises.

The AFL-CIO Government Employes Council had complained sharply of unilateral changes in the areas surveyed, a reduction in the size of the firms covered and failure to adjust for shorter workweeks in private employment.

In a joint reply, the chairman of the U.S. Civil Service Commission and the director of the Bureau of the Budget offered to expand the area of consultation on salary surveys, including discussions with union representatives before key decisions are made.

Unions Go All Out to Elect Humphrey-Muskie Ticket

WARM WELCOME was given Sen. Edmund S. Muskie when the Democratic vice presidential candidate met with the AFL-CIO Executive Council in New York. Later, the AFL-CIO's endorsement —unanimously voted by the General Board, on which every affiliated union is represented—went to the Humphrey-Muskie ticket.

Board Spurs Drive With Endorsement

By Saul Miller

New York—The American labor movement will marshal all its energy and resources behind Hubert Humphrey and Edmund Muskie in the crisis-ridden 1968 presidential election.

If America is to solve its problems and continue its progress there is no alternative to these highly and uniquely qualified men and the policies espoused in the Democratic Party program.

The nation cannot risk the election of Richard Nixon, "a man who so sorely fails to measure up to" presidential responsibilities. And George Wallace has no platform, no policies "and no program for America save racism and hatred."

These were the positions taken by the 160-member AFL-CIO General Board, representing every AFL-CIO affiliate and department, after an exhaustive study of the issues and the men.

The recommendation for a strong, unequivocal endorsement of the Humphrey-Muskie ticket came to the board from the AFL-CIO Executive Council.

The General Board documented its stand with a 22-page statement examining the state of the nation, the major issues in the party platforms and the candidates for President and Vice President. It concluded:

"It is our deep conviction that both the Democratic candidates and the Democratic platform merit the wholehearted support of American workers. We do therefore recommend, advise and exhort all members of each affiliated union to support the Humphrey-Muskie ticket with all the energy at their command." (Excerpts, Pages 8 and 9.)

Taking special note of Wallace's candidacy, the board declared "his pretense to be the friend of the worker is especially galling to the American labor movement. The record of low wages, poor working conditions, high crime rates, high illiteracy rates, anti-unionism, segregation and prejudice in Alabama testifies to the falsity of that claim."

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany told a press conference after the board meeting that the labor movement is in high gear in support of the Humphrey-Muskie ticket and that in the final six weeks "we can turn around" Humphrey's underdog position.

He stressed that the sentiment for the Democratic candidates at

For More Effective Attack:

New Dept. of Urban Affairs, Jobs Unit Set by AFL-CIO

New York—The AFL-CIO has tooled up for a more effective attack on the nation's urban problems, creating two new instruments to give a greater thrust to its programs.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany announced at the federation's Executive Council session at the Hotel Commodore here:

- Establishment of a new Dept. of Urban Affairs at AFL-CIO headquarters to seek more effective solutions to America's urban problems.
- Creation of the Human Resources Development Institute, a non-profit corporation to recruit, train, employ and upgrade the unemployed and under-employed in 50 major cities using the talent, experience and resources of the labor movement and the Dept. of Labor.

The announcement of the new programs—the latter at a joint press conference conducted by Meany and Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz—topped the two-day council sessions which included a strong recommendation to the AFL-CIO General Board on the endorsement of the Democratic ticket of Hubert H. Humphrey and Edmund S. Muskie. (Story this page.)

The sessions also warned that membership in or support of the Alliance for Labor Action formed by the Auto Workers and Teamsters constitutes "sufficient and valid grounds" for suspension. (Story Page 2.)

The council unanimously voted its strong support for the strike of New York City teachers and the continuing struggle at the Los Angeles Herald-Examiner, reaffirmed its strong backing of the Farm Workers' grape boycott and the Textile Workers' "don't buy" campaign at Kayser-Roth. It voiced strongly also its support for the nomination of Justice Abe Fortas to be chief justice and struck out

Wage Law Violations Add Up to $80 Million

By Eugene A. Kelly

American employers continue to underpay their workers at an $80 million-a-year clip, according to the latest Labor Dept. reports.

Despite a stepped-up program of inspection and education, department staffs made no dent in the steadily climbing volume of wage chiseling, deliberate and otherwise, from the pay envelopes of workers. Their income is supposed to be protected by U.S. laws governing minimum hourly rates, overtime, equal pay for equal work, and public service contracts.

For the year ended last June, the department's reports show that inspectors visited 75,022 business establishments—the largest number ever—and found more than 17 percent of the 2.4 million employes had been underpaid in violation of wage-hour laws.

They uncovered underpayments totaling $80,009,717—a figure ex-

Bigotry, Politics Laid To Fortas Opposition

New York—The AFL-CIO challenged the motives and tactics of the campaign to block Senate confirmation of Supreme Court Justice Abe Fortas as Chief Justice.

The motives, the federation's Executive Council charged, include religious prejudice, bigotry and partisan politics.

The tactics—a threat to filibuster to keep the Senate from voting on the appointment—find "once again a minority . . . undertaking to thwart the will of the majority."

After nearly three months of delay, the Senate Judiciary Committee voted 11-6 approval of the nomination. Eight Democrats were joined by three Republicans in support of Fortas. Three southern Democrats, including Committee Chairman James O. Eastland of Mississippi, and three Republicans, including South Carolina's Strom Thurmond, opposed confirmation.

As Eastland stalked out after the vote, he told newsmen, "I do not think Mr. Fortas will be confirmed by the Senate."

In three years on the Supreme Court, the council statement said, Fortas "has demonstrated pre-

ENTIRE RANGE of labor's concern, from strike support to world affairs, from political action to problems of the cities, was on the agenda as the AFL-CIO Executive Council met in New York.

Nixon Hit for Anti-Union Stand In Grape Strike, Ignorance of Law

New York—The AFL-CIO Executive Council sharply criticized former Vice Pres. Richard M. Nixon, the Republican presidential candidate, for his "ignorance" of the Taft-Hartley law and reiterated its support of California grape strikers who are excluded from the law's coverage.

Council members adopted a statement again urging all federation affiliates to support the grape boycott; thanking Vice Pres. Hubert H. Humphrey and others aiding the boycott, and declaring:

"We intend to continue to support" the United Farm Workers Organizing Committee "in their just determination to have a union, despite the ill-informed and reactionary statements of candidate Nixon."

Last May the council endorsed UFWOC's boycott against struck California table grapes. Its statement said "we noted then that farm workers do not enjoy the legal protections of the right to organize which the National Labor Relations Act gives other workers, and that they must rely on their own strength, and that of other union's to secure recognition.

"We pointed out that the California grape growers had entered into a combination and conspiracy to destroy the farm workers' union, and we called on every AFL-CIO affiliate to join in a national consumer boycott of struck California table grapes."

The statement said the boycott has had wide support from religious and civic groups and others "concerned with bettering the miserable lot of America's farm workers." Several cities have decided not to buy such grapes for their institutions, and Humphrey, the Democratic candidate for President, endorsed the boycott.

"Unfortunately candidate Nixon has also been heard from," the statement said. "In a prepared statement released . . . Sept. 5, Mr. Nixon asserted, several times, that the grape boycott is illegal." Nixon declared:

"We have laws on the books to protect workers who wish to organize; we have a National Labor Relations Board to impartially supervise the election of collective bargaining agents and to safeguard the rights of the organizers.

"I strongly disagree with Mr. Humphrey on this issue. It illustrates another sharp difference in our basic philosophies."

Council's Comment

The council commented: "One would expect so highly paid a lawyer as Mr. Nixon to be aware of two elementary propositions: 1. Agricultural laborers are totally excluded from the protections, and also from the restrictions, of the Act. They cannot ask the Labor Board for an election. They can win recognition only by striking, and by enlisting the support of other unions and of sympathetic consumers. 2. Even workers and unions covered by the act have the right to picket or handbill retailers asking customers not to buy a struck product."

It said: "While we are surprised at Mr. Nixon's ignorance of the law, particularly since he boasts that he was one of the authors of Taft-Hartley, we agree with him that this issue illustrates the sharp difference between his and Mr. Humphrey's philosophies.

"Mr. Humphrey does tend to be on the side of the poor and the downtrodden; while Mr. Nixon is automatically with the big financial interests."

Full Backing Stressed For Hearst Strikers

New York—The embattled employes of the Los Angeles Herald-Examiner "deserve material as well as moral support, and we will see that they get it," the AFL-CIO Executive Council vowed here.

The council called upon all federation affiliates and their members to fully support the "courage and determination" of the 2,000 workers who have been on strike, or locked out at the Hearst publication since last December.

This support can be given in two ways, a council statement pointed out:

One, by "contributing generously" to the Herald-Examiner strike fund, which the council established in June with an initial $25,000 donation.

Two, by expressing labor's resentment against Hearst publications and the business firms which advertise consistently in the struck paper.

These firms and their advertising agencies, the council said, are not getting their money's worth" because the paper's circulation is "drastically lower" than it claims.

Moreover, the council continued, "they are contributing to a campaign to lower the standard of living in southern California—a campaign that would, if successful, reduce their sales volume."

"Third and most important," the council added, "they are building a reservoir of ill-will" among members of AFL-CIO unions who recognize that they are aiding Hearst in its strikebreaking efforts.

The statement pointed out that the "initial cause" of the dispute was the refusal of Hearst management to agree to wages and benefits "already established by peaceful collective bargaining with other newspapers in the area."

But the dispute "has since become, in effect, a challenge to the future effectiveness of trade unionism in southern California," the statement said.

This is so, it declared, because Hearst has chosen to publish using imported strikebreakers, protected by court injunctions and the police, while refusing all offers of mediation.

The statement concluded:

"Hearst's goal is not a settlement but a total victory over the 10 unions involved, a victory which he hopes will lead southern California back to the open shop, anti-union conditions of 40 years ago.

"Such an outcome would be an economic disaster, not just for the workers but businessmen and everyone else in the nation's most populous state."

McLaughlin Named Mediation Counsel

Dir. William E. Simkin of the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service announced the appointment of Richard P. McLaughlin as general counsel of the agency succeeding Morris L. Myers, who resigned to practice law in San Francisco.

McLaughlin was a legislative assistant in Congress from 1958 to 1959; worked with the Labor Dept. in 1959-64, and was a special assistant to Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz.

Warns of Suspension:

Council Sets Policy Against ALA Links

New York—The AFL-CIO Executive Council declared that "membership in or support of" the Alliance for Labor Action "does violence to the objectives and principles of the federation" and warned affiliates of the possibility of suspension or expulsion if they join or support the ALA.

The council adopted a statement tracing the background of the formation of the ALA by the Auto Workers and the Teamsters and declared "it is apparent that the purpose of this action is the formation of a dual organization rival to the AFL-CIO."

The statement noted that both the UAW and the Teamsters "have engaged in raids against the membership of AFL-CIO affiliates and in organizational activities in competition with affiliates of the federation."

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany told a press conference that it can be assumed that federation affiliates who formally become members of the ALA or formally support it face the possibility of suspension or expulsion under the federation's constitution.

He stressed that there is no automatic suspension and that each case will be handled when and if it arises.

Meany said anything that splits the labor movement is harmful and there is little doubt that this is a split in the labor movement.

The text of the council statement follows:

"In 1957 the AFL-CIO expelled the Intl. Brotherhood of Teamsters on charges of corruption. In spring of this year the United Auto workers was suspended as an AFL-CIO affiliate because of its refusal to pay its per capita tax to the federation. Thereafter, in July, it terminated its affiliation.

"Both of these organizations have engaged in raids against the membership of AFL-CIO affiliates and in organizational activities in competition with affiliates of the federation.

"On July 23, 1968, these two labor organizations formed a joint venture called the Alliance for Labor Action and urged unions, whether affiliated with the federation or not, to enlist under its banner. It is apparent that the purpose of this action is the formation of a dual organization, rival to the AFL-CIO.

"Membership in or support of this UAW-Teamster combine does violence to the objectives and principles of the federation as stated in its constitution, runs counter to the reciprocal constitutional pledges of its affiliates and constitutes support for and recognition of a suspended former affiliate and an expelled former affiliate. Such membership and support by an affiliate of the AFL-CIO therefore constitutes sufficient and valid ground for its suspension or expulsion under the constitution of the federation."

In another statement, the council declared that in view of the UAW's withdrawal from the AFL-CIO and its subsequent efforts to split the labor movement, the federation "cannot agree to the affiliation of the UAW to the Intl. Confederation of Free Trade Unions in any shape, manner or form."

Shipbuilders' President John Grogan Dies at 54

Jersey City—John J. Grogan, AFL-CIO vice president and president of the Marine & Shipbuilding Workers, died Sept. 16 shortly after being stricken by a heart seizure. He was 54.

Grogan was preparing to leave for the AFL-CIO Executive Council meeting in New York when he suffered the attack. Rushed to the Jersey City Medical Center, he died there shortly after arrival.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany described Grogan's death as "a terrible shock to all his associates in the AFL-CIO."

"He was a warm and decent man," Meany continued, "a dedicated trade union leader who had also served the people of his community in public office for two decades."

As an AFL-CIO vice president since 1963, Meany noted, Grogan had undertaken many "difficult" assignments, including one earlier this year as a U.S. delegate to the United Nations' Human Rights conference in Teheran, Iran.

An Executive Council resolution noted that death "has taken from our ranks our distinguished colleague and warm friend"—a leader who served labor with "honor and distinction" for more than two decades.

"John Grogan," the council said, "was a man whose friendship we cherished, whose companionship we enjoyed and whose warm personality endeared him to all who knew him."

Born in Hoboken, N.J., in March 1914, Grogan went to work when he was 15 in a shipyard there. He soon joined the AFL Shipfitters Union. He joined the newly formed CIO Shipbuilders in 1936 and became secretary-treasurer of its Local 15 in 1937.

In 1943 he became vice president and a member of the executive board of the union, a post he held until 1951 when he became president. He was re-elected at each successive union convention.

In 1943 Grogan also began a public career with his election to the New Jersey legislature. In 1947, Grogan challenged the "I am the law" doctrine of the Hague-McFeely political machine in his community and was elected Hoboken city commissioner. After being re-elected to that post, he was elected mayor of Hoboken in 1953. He served as mayor for 12 years, declining to run again in 1965.

He was elected to the office of Hudson County clerk in 1963 by the largest plurality in history and was renominated for that office in the recent primary election.

Grogan was elected a member of the AFL-CIO Executive Council on Oct. 8, 1963, and was re-elected by subsequent AFL-CIO conventions.

In 1954 he was on the U.S. worker delegation to the Intl. Labor Organization and in later years was named a delegate to several international conferences.

He is survived by his wife, Eileen McNulty Grogan; a daughter, Patricia; and a son, James, who is now serving with the Navy. Also surviving are two brothers and a sister.

Under the Shipbuilders' constitution, Vice Pres. Andrew A. Pettis will serve as president of the union.

Unions Mobilize for Humphrey-Muskie

Board Endorsement Spurs All-Out Drive

the board meeting was absolutely unanimous, that there were no other sentiments expressed.

He cited the success of the COPE registration campaigns in the major states noting that as of early September the number of trade union members registered in eight of the 14 major states increased by 1,160,000. He told reporters that COPE was getting out large quantities of effective literature on the candidates and the platforms and that voluntary contributions for political purposes were the "highest on record."

The election of Richard Nixon, Meany said in reply to a query, "would be a disaster for the ordinary people of this country" based on Nixon's past record.

Other Observations

Meany noted that there was an unusually low sentiment for Nixon and the Republican candidates generally in the trade union movement but that "a considerable number" of union members are being attracted by the demagogic campaign of George Wallace. He emphasized that a vote for Wallace would in effect be a vote for Nixon and that a major target of the trade union campaign will be to switch potential Wallace votes to Humphrey.

This will be accomplished, he added, by an intensive education campaign involving all the resources of the trade union movement that will result in a large outpouring of union members voting for Humphrey-Muskie.

In its analysis of the candidates the board reviewed Humphrey's record and declared:

"Seldom has so qualified a candidate for President been placed before the American voters. Never has a presidential candidate been so totally committed in word and deed to the fulfillment of the American dream. Never has there been a presidential candidate more clearly identified with the aims and aspirations of America's workers."

Surveying the state of the nation as the election campaign moved into its final six weeks, the board cited the eight years of uninterrupted economic growth, the ever-increasing prosperity and the basic social reforms which have given the "overwhelming majority of Americans" higher real incomes, greater economic security and greater material well-being "than any people, any time, anywhere."

'Left Behind'

It stressed also the minority that has been "left behind" and declared its determination that they "must—and will—share as well in the wealth of America."

Noting the widespread discontent, the statement pointed out that "discontent with the status quo is he hallmark of the labor movement, and indeed of the American people as a whole." What is disturbing, it added, is that some of the discontented have lost faith in America and its fundamental principles.

The statement compared the Republican and Democratic platforms on 10 major issues—backed up by an 80-page booklet containing detailed comparisons of the AFL-CIO position and the party platforms on nearly 50 specific items. The analysis declared that the Democratic platform:

- Offers a clear and straightforward program for correcting the major shortcoming of the National Labor Relations Act and the other protective legislation so vital to wage earners. It is a strong and clear document of support for collective bargaining and free unions.
- Calls for an intensification and extension of government policies which are the basis for the vast economic growth of the last eight years and the affluence of the great majority of Americans.
- Gives full recognition to the complexity of the urban crisis and the absolute need for a national approach.
- Offers sound hope that law, order and justice will prevail.
- Wholeheartedly espouses a specific, detailed attack on discrimination and deprivation of every kind.
- Is prepared to invest from the bottom to the top of the educational ladder.
- Says that social security benefit levels are not and have never been adequate.
- Calls for a tax system based on ability to pay compared to Republican proposals that would widen the gulf between the haves and the have-nots.
- Recognizes in a positive way that more consumer protection legislation is essential and specifically pledges itself to do this job.
- Offers as realistic a program on Viet Nam as could be evolved in a period of worldwide uncertainty and rapid change.

Turning to the presidential candidates, the board declared that nothing in Nixon's record suggests that he understands that the constitutional obligation to promote the general welfare "means the advancement of the social and economic well-being of the American people as a whole."

There is a real question of whether in the past eight years Nixon has become wiser or "merely more expedient," the board said, citing his "open and unabashed alliance with the most flagrant racists in his party's southern wing" to secure the GOP nomination.

Humphrey, it said, is in a direct comparison "the superior man." Never has Humphrey been found "faint-hearted or afraid. Never has he retreated from battle."

The board found Muskie experienced and skilled in the executive and legislative branches of government, fully qualified to fill the presidency if necessary. GOP candidate Spiro Agnew's record and recent tactics disclose not the "slightest qualification" for the presidency, "the only realistic yardstick."

NEW THRUST to labor's programs to meet the problems of the nation's cities emerged at the AFL-CIO Executive Council session. AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany and Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz, right, announced joint government-AFL-CIO sponsorship of the Human Resources Development Institute to recruit, train, employ and upgrade workers in 50 major cities. Meany also announced establishment of a new AFL-CIO Dept. of Urban Affairs. John E. Evans, second from left, will be its director; Julius Rothman, left, will be associate director.

at opponents of the nomination. (Stories Pages 1, 2, 4.)

In other statements, the council warned of the continuing threat of Soviet aggression and imperialism in reviewing the developments in Czechoslovakia and the Middle East, calling on the United States to supply immediately jet fighters to Israel. (Stories Page 5.)

Meany announced the appointment of John E. Evans, special assistant to Sec. of Housing & Urban Development Robert Weaver, as director of the Dept. of Urban Affairs. Julius Rothman, assistant Director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Social Security and Federation coordinator of poverty programs was designated as associate director. Assigned to the department is Boris Shishkin, secretary of the AFL-CIO Housing Committee.

Functions Set Forth

Meany said the new department would coordinate the efforts of the federation in the fields of housing and urban renewal, manpower (including job development and job training), mass transit and poverty and would work with other AFL-CIO departments on such local problems as schools, health services, civil rights, metropolitan areas.

He assigned the new department responsibility for working intensively with local AFL-CIO central bodies to stimulate their active and effective participation in critical problems facing their communities.

The department will work also with federal, state and local agencies, and voluntary, agencies and institutions seeking solutions to problems consistent with the programs of the AFL-CIO.

A major duty, Meany said, would be to assure effective labor participation in the urban coalition, both on the national and local level.

The department will work also with HUD, the new National Housing Partnership and the Human Resources Development Institute. Rothman will direct the new institute on behalf of the AFL-CIO.

The department will oversee also the operations of the mortgage investment trust fund created by the AFL-CIO in 1964 to help finance the construction of necessary and socially desirable housing.

The joint Meany-Wirtz announcement on HRDI declared that the project will "mobilize and utilize the vast resources of skilled talent and experience available within the labor movement to plan, develop, coordinate and operate manpower programs for hard-core unemployed" to help them become employed.

The project will be launched first in 10 cities to be selected by HRDI with assistance from the Labor Dept.'s Manpower Administration. The experience gained will be used to operate the projects in another 25 cities to be followed later in the remaining 15 cities. The target for the 50 programs is the spring of 1969.

The Labor Dept. provided $1.5 million to help initiate the program and the labor movement will contribute $200,000 worth of services and facilities.

The program has a number of targets including special programs to prepare minority youth and others to enter apprenticeship and other training projects; upgrading training programs; working with Jobs Opportunity in the Business Sector (JOBS) in its program to place the hard-core unemployed; providing information on job opportunities and the problems of the unemployed; work with the model cities programs to train target area residents for neighborhood rehabilitation programs.

In discussing the creation of the two new instruments, Meany noted that "the problems of our urban centers and their overcrowded slums and ghettos has long been of concern to the AFL-CIO. The record will show that, over the years, the AFL-CIO has fought for all those programs that would improve the quality of life for the poor and the minorities, who, to an increasing degree, are the inhabitants of our great cities.

Commitment Cited

"We are committed to rebuilding our cities, to provide a decent, healthy environment for all the people, and to providing good jobs at decent wages for all who can and want to work."

Evans, 48, had been secretary-treasurer of the Arizona AFL-CIO for four years when he was tapped in 1967 for the HUD post where he directed the Office of Labor Relations. He is a graduate of the University of Arizona, served as a Navy pilot and has worked as a teacher and researcher as well as in the Arizona copper mines.

Rothman, in the labor movement since 1936, has served as an organizer, education director, editor and union administrator. From 1947 to 1967, when he joined the Dept. of Social Security, he served as a labor representative in the field of community services.

Shishkin joined the AFL in 1933 as an economist and served as its research director until 1955 when he became director of the Dept. of Civil Rights of the AFL-CIO. He later become secretary of the housing committee and currently represents the federation in a variety of housing organizations.

UNANIMOUS ENDORSEMENT of Vice Pres. Hubert H. Humphrey for President, as the candidate "uniquely qualified to lead America onward to that better future," was voted by the 160-member AFL-CIO General Board at its meeting in New York.

Labor Rallied Behind Kayser-Roth Boycott

New York—Don't buy Kayser-Roth hosiery products, the AFL-CIO urged the nation's union members and their families.

The Executive Council called for the labor movement's full support to Dayton, Tenn., members of the Textile Workers Union of America who are battling a giant chain determined to break their union.

"Kayser-Roth must be taught that it cannot trample on the rights of workers with impunity," the Executive Council declared.

It called for a nationwide consumer boycott of women's hosiery sold under the brand names of Schiaparelli, Mojud, Kayser, Phoenix, Supp-Hose; it asked men not to buy Esquire, Bachelor's Friend and Supp-Hose brands.

And it spelled out the reasons in a resolution tracing the background of the strike which began on May 6—and is still continuing.

For three years, the company fought to keep the union out of its Dayton, Tenn., plant through firing of union supporters, spying on union meetings, illegal interrogation of workers and other forms of coercion.

Despite all this, the workers voted for the TWUA and the union was finally certified in September 1967.

In contract negotiations, the council's resolution relates, the company "showed the same fixed hostility to collective bargaining that it had demonstrated in the three previous years."

Negotiations, the resolution noted, were a "farce." While "flatly refusing to consider arbitration as the final step in resolving employe grievances," management "at the same time demanded a strict no-strike agreement to prohibit the workers from striking over unresolved grievances."

It "adamantly" refused to agree to a checkoff of union dues, even though it had accepted checkoff and arbitration at other plants.

"In a last ditch effort to prevent a strike, the union offered to submit all unresolved issues to binding arbitration, but this offer likewise was flatly refused." Since the strike, the general counsel of the National Labor Relations Board has issued a complaint charging the company with illegal refusal to bargain.

The Executive Council resolution notes that "many of the workers make only the federal minimum wage. Fringe benefits are grossly substandard. Working conditions are deplorable."

The Kayser-Roth chain is currently being merged into the Penn-Central Railroad and the council resolution also urged the new corporate owner "to follow decent labor relations in its new acquisition."

The council urged all AFL-CIO affiliates to follow through on the consumer "don't buy" campaign and to publicize their actions.

"The struggle to organize the textile industry in the South is of major importance to and deserves the full support of all segments of the labor movement," the AFL-CIO said.

Wide Backing Reported For Labor College

New York—In-depth interviews with union leaders at all levels and university educators have disclosed substantial support for the establishment of a labor institute or college, the AFL-CIO Executive Council was told.

In a progress report on the study currently being conducted on the establishment of a national labor studies institute authorized by the 1967 AFL-CIO convention, the council was told a final report would be ready by the winter 1969 meeting and will contain positive and alternative recommendations.

The study being conducted by the federation's Dept. of Education with the aid of a broadly based advisory committee has held a wide-ranging series of discussions as well as interviews seeking suggestions and ideas on program, curriculum, makeup of the student body and other matters.

The general feeling so far, Education Dir. Walter Davis reported, is that the institute should start with one facility located in Washington and that initial programs should address themselves to staff and specialty training looking toward the development of programs of a broader nature in the next several years.

Ronald Epstein Heads Group Health Project

Ronald Epstein has been named national director of the Group Health Association of America campaign to encourage the development of prepaid medical group practices through the country.

The U.S. Public Health Service is financing the five-year project with the support of the AFL-CIO, which is contributing $5,000 annually. State and city central bodies also are being recruited to serve as the consumer core for the comprehensive community health plans.

Epstein, formerly enrollment director of the Health Insurance Plan of Greater New York, will assume his duties with the Group Health Association on Oct. 1. He will be based in Washington.

Council Blasts 'Union Busting':

Teachers Get Strong Backing In New York School Dispute

New York—The AFL-CIO "stands fully behind the United Federation of Teachers in its present fight for justice for teachers and its continuing fight for a better educational system for all New York City's children," the Executive Council declared here.

The council strongly backed the UFT in a statement branding as "union-busting" the dismissal of 19 teachers last May 9 by the Ford Foundation-funded Ocean Hill-Brownsville "demonstration" school district in Brooklyn. The UFT—Teachers Local 2—voted to stop work following refusal of the governing board to respect a legal contract, the ruling of an arbitrator or the orders of city officials.

"At issue is the fundamental right to due process—a right crucial not only to every worker on his job, but to every other member of minority groups in our society for whom equal protection under law is vital," the council said.

Pointing out that "the very life of a union is dependent upon the agreement of parties to abide by written contracts," the statement said "the AFL-CIO deplores the inaction and opportunism of the city administration which has refused to enforce lawful procedures, and failed to keep its word on agreements reached."

Lindsay 'Appeaser'

Mayor John V. Lindsay, the council statement said, has "persistently condemned the UFT as 'extremist' while he appeases a small group of self-appointed leaders who threaten violence" and "ignores the demand of 3,000 parents in Ocean Hill-Brownsville, including an Assemblyman representing the area, for a new governing board election."

The result, the council charged, has been to "increase racial polarization" in this city and to "misdirect legitimate grievances of Negro parents in order to drive a deeper and deeper wedge between organized teachers and the minority community."

Jail Threatened

Meanwhile the Lindsay administration, while taking no action against the school district administration, "has threatened to jail UFT Pres. Albert Shanker for his efforts to preserve teacher unionism and a democratic public school system," the statement noted.

As the bargaining representative of the city's teachers, black and white, the UFT has "been in the forefront of the struggle for human rights and better education," the council said.

It continued: "With the UFT, the AFL-CIO supports the goals of parents and community representatives, particularly minority communities, for an effective voice in school policy-making. Such participation must occur in a democratic framework of due process, a substantial investment of financial resources and genuine commitment to quality integrated education."

Fight for Justice

The council declared "the UFT's fight for justice and due process for its members has important implications not only for the future of teacher unionism but for the growth and expansion of white collar and public service employe unions as well."

Adherence to just procedures and the protection of civil liberties and nondiscriminatory hiring and firing practices is "essential to the existence of these and all other unions and to their constructive relations with the public they serve."

The dispute over community control of teachers began before the close of the last school term when 19 teachers in the eight-school Ocean Hill-Brownsville district received registered letters at school informing them that their services were terminated, effective immediately.

"They had received no warning," the council stated. "There were no charges, and no opportunity to defend themselves at a hearing." District Administrator Rhody McCoy, asked why he had summarily dismissed the teachers, declared "they were out of tune with the political atmosphere of the community."

Among the dismissed teachers were two union shop stewards, one of whom was also the UFT's district chairman.

Firing Ruled Illegal

The council said that "despite a declaration by the Board of Education and the mayor that the dismissals were illegal, the teachers were kept from their jobs for the remainder of the school year by small groups of militants, governing board members and principals, and the administrator hired by the local board."

Teachers were told, the statement related, that "they would not be accepted back into the district until they promised that their allegiance was to the local board and not to their union. Other efforts at union-busting included the unlawful denial of summer school jobs to union members and the hiring of unlicensed college graduates, many of whom openly stated their primary intention was to seek draft deferments, as strikebreakers to replace teachers who participated in a stoppage in support of their colleagues."

By the beginning of the new school year Sept. 9, the case against 10 dismissed teachers had been heard by retired Judge Francis Rivers, who ruled that all 10 were innocent of any wrongdoing. The council said "still the local board refused to return these teachers, or the 200 others who supported them, to their jobs. Still the Board of Education and the mayor refused to take action to enforce due process under law."

"Faced with having 210 innocent teachers pushed out of their jobs despite a judge's decision, and faced with the prospect of similar union-busting tactics being used throughout the city against union members . . . the UFT was forced to resort to a city-wide strike to seek protection of its members.

"After two days an agreement was reached with the Board of Education and the mayor which assured the return of the teachers and provided for the protection of the union contract and teacher rights under the city-wide decentralization plan" about to be implemented.

Teachers Harassed

On returning to work, the statement related, Ocean Hill-Brownsville teachers "were harassed, threatened and again prevented from resuming their duties by the local governing board and its administration, which continues to use Ford Foundation funds to operate, and employs several hundred strikebreakers who have not been legally assigned to the district by the central Board of Education."

"Faced with a broken agreement and a clear lack of good faith or will to abide by the settlement on the part of the local board, the Board of Education and the mayor, the UFT again took strike action." The strike is set to continue, the union said, until the city takes steps to abide by its contract.

Bigotry, Politics Laid To Fortas Opposition

eminent professional capacity, and his integrity is unquestioned."

It examined the arguments raised by the two groups working together to prevent a vote on confirmation.

A bloc of Republican senators, led by Sen. Robert P. Griffin of Michigan, "professes to believe that Pres. Johnson should not have appointed anyone because he was—according to Sen. Griffin—a 'lame duck' President."

The council said "this claim flies in the face of logic and of history."

By the same illogic, Pres. Eisenhower should not have made two Supreme Court appointments in his second term and the Senate should not have unanimously confirmed Chief Justice John Marshall, who was appointed by Pres. John Adams in 1801 after Adams had actually been defeated for re-election. Nor should Eisenhower have made a Supreme Court appointment in the midst of his 1956 re-election campaign.

"Obviously," the Executive Council declared, "the ground of objection advanced by Sen. Griffin and his cabal is a mere pretext and cover for motives too discreditable to be publicly avowed."

The "southern clique," headed by Sen. Sam J. Ervin, Jr. (D-N.C.), is at least frank in saying that Fortas should not be confirmed because he is a member of the "Warren Court" and supported decisions "protecting the civil rights of minorities, according due process to those accused of crime, and guaranteeing an equal vote to every citizen."

The AFL-CIO, the council said, "fully supports" these decisions. "In any event we do not see how anyone can justify the employment of filibusters, in the Senate Committee on the Judiciary or on the Senate floor, to prevent the Senate from voting on confirmation. Discreditable means are being used in pursuit of a discreditable end."

Prejudice Cited

The council statement went on to say:

"Finally, frankness requires that we state our belief, and our regret, that racial and religious prejudice plays a role in the campaign to block confirmation of Justice Fortas, just as it did in the case of Justice Brandeis 50 years ago. We had hoped that America had put that sort of bigotry behind it forever."

Brandeis was the first Jew named to the Supreme Court. Fortas would be the first Chief Justice of the Jewish faith.

The council urged the Senate to "vote promptly" on the appointment and to vote for confirmation.

'Continued Threat':

Strong NATO Urged To Check Soviets

New York—The Soviet Union's invasion and occupation of Czechoslovakia "has awakened the free world" to the continued threat of Soviet aggression and imperialism, the AFL-CIO Executive Council declared.

The actions by the USSR, the council added in a statement, expose as unfounded "the widespread notion that Soviet communism has changed basically and that its regime has become more liberal."

The council called for a strengthening of NATO and for the United States to maintain sufficient forces in Europe "to discourage further Soviet aggression." It warned that efforts to relax international tensions are necessary "but they must never be allowed to undermine the unity and strength of the Western alliance."

The council urged that the United States "avoid any move" which would lead Moscow "to mistake our peaceful aims as a sign of weakness or indifference."

It commended the government for curtailing the cultural exchange programs with Soviet bloc countries and recommended consultation with NATO "concerning the imposition of economic sanctions until all Soviet troops have left Czechoslovakia."

ICFTU Praised

The AFL-CIO statement praised the vigorous condemnation of Soviet aggression by the Intl. Confederation of Free Trade Unions and the decision of ICFTU affiliates to break off exchanges with Soviet bloc countries.

"The invasion of Czechoslovakia has shown once more that the official position of the ICFTU against exchanges with the labor fronts of all Communist countries retains its validity and should be vigorously reaffirmed as especially timely today."

The council called on the ICFTU to establish an international assistance fund for Czechoslovakian refugees "to which we will pledge our generous support."

Reviewing the developments in Czechoslovakia, the council pointed out that there was no "counter-revolution" supported by the United States and Germany "as Moscow falsely charges." The Czech leaders were merely trying to preserve the Communist regime by eliminating the worst excesses of Stalinist oppression and exploitation and by making some concessions to the people's aspiration for freedom.

Reforms Crushed

But this reform movement was crushed because the Soviets feared its effects "on their own people who also yearn for freedom." The Soviet occupation of Czechoslovakia "has ominously changed the balance of power in Central Europe," the council declared, with the stationing of over a half million Russian soldiers in the country.

This "gravely menaces" European peace and freedom and intensifies the Soviet threat to Berlin and the Federal German Republic.

Had the United States warned in advance against an invasion of Czechoslovakia, the council said, "no one today would lend credence to the absured suggestion that the United States has a sphere-of-influence agreement with the USSR, giving Moscow a free hand in this aggression." The council called also on the United States "to open the doors of our country to Czechoslovakian refugees fleeing from Soviet tyranny."

SENIOR CITIZENS Golden Ring Council in New York looked to the Humphrey-Muskie ticket to meet their goals of improved retirement and medicare benefits. Health, Education & Welfare Sec. Wilbur J. Cohen, left, receives the group's first "Wilbur" award. With him are AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, Zalman Lichtenstein of the Golden Ring Council, Sen. Edmund S. Muskie and AFL-CIO Vice Pres. David Dubinsky.

AFGE Increases Dues To Fund Growth Plan

Las Vegas, Nev.—Delegates to the American Federation of Government Employes convention here voted a big two-step raise in the union's dues structure to finance continued organizing growth, expanded services and a new headquarters building.
